Mr. SPRIGGS also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2346) for the relief of Sarah A. Redmond; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TALBOTT. I desire to report a bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to be printed with the report and recommitted.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done during this call. Under the rules bills reported during this call must go to one of the Calendars. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at another time.

RED LAKE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 846, a bill (H. CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. AIKEN. I am directed by the Committee on Education to return certain papers relative to a resolution for the purchase of historical paintings. These papers were presented by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. WAIT], to accompany a resolution which was referred to the Committee on the Library. I ask that the Committee on Education be discharged from the further consideration of these papers, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Library.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am directed by the Committee on Labor to ask that certain papers heretofore referred to the Committee on Education and Labor before the division of that committee may be referred to the Committee on Labor.

There being no objection, the following resolutions were referred to the Committee on Labor:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 38) to provide for the enforcement of the eight-hour law; and Resolution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts concerning the employment of convict labor upon the works of the property of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. I move that the bill (H. R. 3520) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads be transferred to the House Calendar, where it belongs; and for that purpose I move the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be put on the House Calendar.

FORFEITED LAND GRANTS.

Mr. COBB. I now move that the House proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3520) declaring forfeited certain grants of land made to certain States in aid of the construction of railroads.

Mr. TUCKER and Mr. TALBOTT asked by unanimous consent to submit reports from committees.

Mr. COBB. I should like to yield to gentlemen, but I do not know how long it will take. This is an important matter, and we will get through with it in a little while. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the House Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I do not know whether the Chair fully understood my motion. I moved that the House go to the consideration of the House Calendar for the purpose of taking up the bill I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. Under the resolution adopted by the House some time ago, when the House proceeds to the consideration of the business on the House Calendar bills in relation to forfeiture of land grants have precedence over other business on the Calendar.

Mr. COBB. I ask to take up the bill H. R. 3520 for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (H. R. 3933) to declare a forfeiture of land granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

Mr. COBB. The other was first reported, but got on the wrong Calendar; otherwise it would have precedence.

The SPEAKER. The bill does not lose its place. If reported first, it will stand first on the Calendar. The Chair in his statement referred to the printed Calendar before the transfer was made.

Mr. COBB. I desire to say it is the intention of the members of the committee to press the passage of both bills to-day.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. It was read when up before.

Mr. VAN EATON. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). The gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBB. What does the gentleman desire?

Mr. VAN EATON. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. COBB. I consent that he may offer it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by adding after the word "act," in the fourteenth line, the following words: "Also except so much of said act as relates to the grant of lands in aid of a railroad from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico, commonly known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad."

Mr. COBB. The report accompanying this bill was read in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the other day, and unless some gentleman desires to have it read again I will not ask for its reading now.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Is the report lengthy?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report has been already read.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope there will be an explanation given of the details of this bill.

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; I propose to say a word upon it.

This bill relates to seven grants made to railroad companies, or to States, rather, for the benefit of railroad companies that might afterward be created or which might be in existence at the time of the passage of this act. The act was passed on the 3d of June, 1856. None of these roads——

Mr. CHACE. Did I understand the Chair to rule that the reading of the report on this bill is not in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair stated that the report had been already read. It is not in order now to demand the reading if objection is made.

Mr. CHACE. It has not been read to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was read at the time of the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, and can not be called for on every consideration of the bill.

Mr. COBB. As I was about saying, Mr. Speaker, none of these roads have been completed, none of them begun. Their grants simply stand in their name without any work whatever having been done upon the roads which these grants contemplated. I do not deem it necessary, therefore, to take up the time of the House in discussing in detail any of these grants. It is a mere question of policy now whether the grants shall be forfeited in view of the failure of the companies to construct the roads or not.

Under a decision of the Supreme Court in a similar case, although all of these grants contained the condition that in case the railroads are not completed in ten years from the date of the grant, at the end of that period the lands shall revert to the Government of the United States, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Shulenburg vs. Herriman it has been held that these were grants in præsenti and carry the legal title to the States to which they are made or to the railroad companies. That being so, the committee deemed it right and proper that there should be a declaration upon the part of the legislative department of the Government creating these grants declaring a forfeiture and restoring the lands to the public domain, reserving, as you will perceive by the bill, the rights of settlers, homesteaders, &c., made in good faith. None of these lands in any of these grants have been sold. In the case of the State of Alabama I believe one of these grants was not accepted at all. As to the other grants, no corporations were organized for the purpose of accepting them. This is about the substance of the facts in the case, and, as I have said, it seems scarcely necessary to detain the House longer. The expression of the House and the feeling, I take it, is such that if this was an original proposition to grant these lands to these States for the benefit of railroad corporations in constructing their roads, they would not be granted at all.

The only question is whether we will allow these grants to remain that were made twenty-seven years ago, seventeen years having expired since the expiration of the time when the grant contemplated the completion of the various lines of road. I do not believe the House will entertain for a moment the idea of continuing these grants longer.

Now, there is a minority report, and I will allude to that briefly, and perhaps will have nothing further to say.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before passing, I wish to ask the gentleman why it is that several roads have been excepted from the operation of this bill?

Mr. COBB. The only exception in the bill was with reference to the roads which have been completed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But there appear to be two or three other roads excepted from the forfeiture under the terms of this bill.

Mr. COBB. No; only those that were completed are excepted. We have excepted those which have been completed according to the original grant from the operation of this bill and from any forfeiture.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. But, if my friend will bear with me, on the second page of the bill it appears that several exceptions are made—one in Alabama, one in Louisiana, one I believe in Arkansas——

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will examine the report he will find that it goes fully into the details of the matter. It says that all of the roads which were completed are excepted from the operation of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Were those roads completed within the time limited by the act?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; that is the information the committee have.

Mr. CHACE. That those roads were completed within the time contemplated by the grant?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; of course not. The seven roads for the forfeiture of whose grants provision is here made were not completed. But there are other grants. This bill provides for the forfeiture of grants where the roads have not been completed or anything done by way of completion. It excepts from the operation of the repealing clause those roads and grants where the roads were completed.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Within the time?

Mr. COBB. Within the time fixed, of course.

Mr. CHACE. Then I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say these excepted roads were completed within the time contemplated by the act.

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir; that is the information the committee have. Therefore we have taken them out of the operation of this repealing or forfeiting act. These roads that are affected by this act, as I have distinctly stated before, are roads where no steps were taken to complete the road further, perhaps, than to organize. Not an inch of any one of these seven roads whose grants we propose to forfeit as provided for in this bill—not an inch of those roads was completed or is completed to-day; and, as I said, it is twenty-seven years since the grants were made, and they were required to complete the roads within ten years. Repeating myself, as the House is now giving more attention, I may say that if the roads were not completed within ten years the lands granted were to revert to the United States. None of these roads have been completed in any particular. These grants, then, stand tied up from settlement or purchase, and it is a question now for this House to determine whether it will forfeit these grants that stand in this position, the title, as I have already said, being in the States to which the grant was made in the first place.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. DUNN. I do not know that I understand fully what is excepted from the operation of this act. For instance in line 34, page 2, the bill says:

Also, so much of chapter 165, 14 Statutes at Large, page 83, as makes a grant of lands to the State of Arkansas to aid in the construction and extension of a railroad from the point where the Iron Mountain Railroad intersects the southern boundary of Missouri to a point at or near the town of Helena, on the Mississippi River.

Does this act forfeit that grant?

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. Is there not an ambiguity in the language as to whether that is excepted from the forfeiting clause or included in it?

Mr. COBB. At what line of the bill was the gentleman reading?

Mr. DUNN. I was reading from line 34.

Mr. COBB. I think that is very clear:

Also so much of chapter 165, 14 Statutes at Large, page 83, as makes a grant of lands to the State of Arkansas to aid in the construction and extension of a railroad——

Mr. DUNN. The question is whether that is excepted.

Mr. COBB. It is not excepted. It is included very clearly. If the gentleman will read the first part of the bill he will see it is.

Mr. DUNN. The first clause repeals the act mentioned "except"——

Mr. COBB. Then it states the exception and goes on and repeals those that are not excepted.

Mr. DUNN. Had not the language be better repeated in line 15 so as to say "also repeal" or "also except?"

Mr. COBB. I think not.

Mr. DUNN. I think there is an ambiguity.

Mr. COBB. I think there is no ambiguity at all. The bill provides—

That so much of the several acts and parts of acts of Congress as are below recited be, and they are hereby, repealed, namely.

And then it states the exceptions.

Mr. DUNN. If the committee is perfectly satisfied, I am.

Mr. COBB. The committee are satisfied, and I think the language is very clear.

Mr. DUNN. I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that there is possibly an ambiguity.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. There may be no ambiguity in the bill as it now stands; but I think there will be if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi should be adopted coming in at the end of line 14 and beginning with the word "also" just as the word "also" heads the section beginning line 15.

Mr. COBB. It is very clear that would be excepted. If the amendment is attached to the first section of the bill, why then the provision the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] reads would apply to that. As it is, it does not apply to it. Let me read again:

That so much of the several acts and parts of acts of Congress as are below recited be, and they are hereby, repealed, namely:

Chapter 83, 11 Statutes at Large, page 30, approved August 11, 1856, entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in the said State, and for other purposes," Except—

Now that is the exception. We declare in the first part of the bill all of these grants mentioned thereafter shall be repealed with the exception of this one, and we go on and set it forth.

Mr. DUNN. You say—

That so much of the several acts and parts of acts of Congress as are below recited be, and they are hereby, repealed.

And then you say "except"—

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNN. Does that exception apply to all below that word "except?"

Mr. COBB. Of course that applies only to what it says, and it says in as direct terms as language can express—

Mr. DUNN. Had it not better be made clear?

Mr. COBB. I will read again from the bill for the information of the House:

That so much of the several acts and parts of acts of Congress as are below recited be, and they are hereby, repealed, namely:

Chapter 83, 11 Statutes at Large, page 30, approved August 11, 1856, entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to construct railroads in said State, and for other purposes," except so much of said act, &c.

That is, the act making the grant to Mississippi is what is meant, and no stronger language can be used there.

Mr. DUNN. Let me suggest——

Mr. COBB. Let me continue:

Except so much of said act as relates to a grant of land in aid of "a railroad from Jackson to the line between the State of Mississippi and the State of Alabama," which road was completed within the time prescribed by said act.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Now, the amendment goes on right there and says "also," &c.; and then without any further distinction the bill continues: "Also, so much of chapter 41," &c.

Mr. COBB. The amendment is not adopted yet. I do not think the language can be made clearer.

Mr. DUNN. Oh, yes, it can.

Mr. COBB. If there is any doubt about it, I am perfectly willing the bill shall be amended, but I can not see how to do it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It may be clear now, but if the amendment shall be adopted the rest of the bill would be ambiguous.

Mr. COBB. There is no ambiguity about the amendment; it only adds another grant or a part of a grant to the exception.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If the amendment is read I think it will be seen that there will be an ambiguity.

Mr. COBB. I might say what I said at the beginning. This portion of the bill refers to four grants to four different railroads, or rather to one grant to four different railroads. Perhaps that is the reason why gentlemen do not appear to apprehend exactly the meaning and force of the language used by the committee. "Chapter 83, 11 Statutes at Large, page 30, approved August 11, 1856," contains grants to four different railroads.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The bill may be quite clear as it reads now, but if the amendment shall be adopted it will render what follows ambiguous.

Mr. COBB. We have not got to that yet. If the amendment shall be adopted then we can consider it.

Mr. PRYOR. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] in regard to the portion of the bill embraced in lines 22 and 23 of the printed bill. What grounds have the committee for repealing the grant in that instance?

Mr. COBB. Because there has been nothing done to further the object of the grant.

Mr. PRYOR. The gentleman will remember that the Memphis and Charleston Railroad was in a state of construction in 1852.

Mr. COBB. That is not the Memphis and Charleston road; it is another road.

Mr. PRYOR. I will read that portion of the bill to which I refer:

Also, to aid in the construction of the Memphis and Charleston road, in section 6 of said act.

Mr. COBB. That is a branch of the road, not the Memphis and Charleston road proper. I will read from the report what is said with regard to the Memphis and Charleston road from information received from the Interior Department:

The State of Alabama refused to accept the grant for this road, and the lands were restored to market February 19, 1858.

Mr. PRYOR. What road is that?

Mr. COBB. The Memphis and Charleston road, the very road you are talking about.

Your committee deem it prudent, however, to repeal the granting act so far as it refers to this road, and have provided for it in the bill presented.

That is the fact about it. If there are any other questions which gentlemen desire to ask just at this point I will try to answer them.

Now, one word with reference to the minority report filed with the majority report. The minority report is based solely upon the ground of policy. It is admitted that nothing has been done to complete these roads or to forward their interest in that direction.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON], who represents the minority of the committee, desires to be heard. I do not care to take up the time of the House any further, unless some gentleman desires to propound a question; and, if so, I will take pleasure in answering it so far as I can.

Mr. MULDROW. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] to hold that all land grants should be forfeited where no steps have been taken toward the completion of the work?

Mr. COBB. That is the object of this bill.

Mr. MULDROW. And I understand further that you propose to forfeit the land grants to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad?

Mr. COBB. Yes; because, as we are informed, nothing has been done in furtherance of the work.

Mr. MULDROW. On the contrary, the Memphis and Charleston Railroad is completed, except that part of it between Stevenson, in Alabama, and Memphis, in Tennessee. All the road that passes through Alabama was completed years ago. Yet this bill provides for the repeal of the law making the grant to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad through the State of Alabama as well as the State of Tennessee.

Mr. COBB. I did not understand the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] when he first spoke. To what road does he refer?

Mr. MULDROW. I understand that you propose to forfeit land grants only where no work has been begun toward the completion of the enterprise. Yet in this bill you propose to forfeit the land grant to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad, on which much work has been done.

Mr. COBB. I have not taken that position. I am in favor of forfeiting every acre and every inch of land granted to railroads where they have not earned it in strict conformity to law; that is my position.

This bill provides for the forfeiture of the land grant of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company. That grant, as I said a while ago—if the gentleman had listened he would surely have understood me—was never accepted by this corporation, and never accepted by the governor on behalf of the State; he refused to accept it. Yet I suppose the gentleman would insist that we ought to force this grant upon the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company. I read a while ago the statement in the report that—

The State of Alabama refused to accept the grant for this road, and the lands were restored to market February 19, 1858. Your committee deem it prudent, however, to repeal the granting act so far as it refers to this road, and have provided for it in the bill presented.

Mr. PRYOR. Then, as I understand the gentleman's position, this report, so far as the Memphis and Charleston Railroad is concerned, is based upon the fact, as contended by the committee, that the State of Alabama declined to accept the grant, not upon the ground that the road was not completed within the time required.

Mr. COBB. Not specially upon that ground. We did not look into that question. The State having refused to accept the grant, the lands having been restored to the public domain and offered for sale as lands usually have been in that State, we take it there is nothing but a technical title in the State of Alabama. This railroad company never claimed these lands, and has no pretense for claiming them. The State has refused to claim them. Still the committee believe that technically perhaps the title of these lands, under the decisions of the Supreme Court, still remains in the State of Alabama. Now, for the purpose of removing all doubt upon that question, we propose to forfeit these lands, thereby taking away the technical legal title which may have vested under the act. The State not claiming the lands, but having refused to accept the grant, the railroad company making no pretense of claiming them, and the lands having been restored by the Interior Department to the public domain, they are now subject to disposition as other public lands in that State, and have been ever since 1858. Therefore we propose to forfeit the technical title.

Mr. PRYOR. Or, in other words, to remove what you suppose may be a cloud on the title by reason of this grant.

Mr. COBB. I do not think it is a cloud——

A MEMBER. A shadow.

Mr. COBB. But we feel that through abundant caution, and in order to fully restore these lands to the public domain and quiet the title, it is the duty of Congress to forfeit this grant. The railroad company is not here claiming anything, the State has refused to accept the lands, and the Government ought to assert its title to them.

Mr. PRYOR. I want to disabuse the mind of the gentleman from Indiana of the idea that there has been any non-compliance by that railroad company with the obligation to construct their road. As a matter of fact—and I speak of what I know—nothing of the kind has happened so far as the Memphis and Charleston Railroad is concerned. Its work has been completed, and was completed within much less time than the act provided for. It may be possible—I am not gainsaying that statement, but I want to get at the reason for the proposed revocation of this grant, so that it may be placed on the proper ground—it may be that the State of Alabama and the company have declined to accept the grant, but I do not want this act to proceed upon the mistaken assumption that the company has not complied with the requirement as to the construction of the road, for it is known to the country that the road has been in active operation for years.

Mr. CALKINS. Will my colleague [Mr. COBB] allow a question for information?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. CALKINS. It was utterly impossible during the remarks of my colleague for us who remained on this side of the Hall to hear what he said. I wish to ask him whether any of the lands the title of which it is proposed to declare forfeited have been patented either to the States or the railroad companies mentioned in the bill?

Mr. COBB. No, sir; none of them.

Mr. CALKINS. Has any title passed to actual claimants or occupants?

Mr. COBB. Not from the railroad corporation or the State.

Mr. CALKINS. Has any title passed under any act of Congress, so that the titles of these claimants or occupants will be disturbed if this bill be passed?

Mr. COBB. No, sir. In some instances these lands have been settled upon; but there is a second section of the bill providing for the protection of persons who have made settlement or purchase in good faith.

Mr. CALKINS. That was the point I was coming to.

Mr. COBB. We have provided for that.

Mr. CALKINS. I see that the second section undertakes to protect certain occupants; and I was going to ask my colleague to state how these occupants claim titles to these lands.

Mr. COBB. Some of them by purchase from the Government, as I understand, and some by settlement under the pre-emption and homestead laws.

Mr. CALKINS. Do any of them claim title through or under these grants?

Mr. COBB. None from the State, none from the railroad companies. Whatever rights these settlers have were obtained under general laws of the United States.

Mr. MULDROW. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana upon what evidence the committee acted in assuming that the State of Alabama had declined to accept these lands for the benefit of this railroad company?

Mr. COBB. We have authority for that fact resting upon this information, that a telegram was received from the governor of the State of Alabama refusing to accept the grant. I believe there is a letter from the governor of the State of Alabama on file in the Interior Department wherein he refuses to accept the grant of lands for railroad purposes. The proof, sir, seems to be ample, and it was perfectly satisfactory to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TUCKER. When was that telegram received?

Mr. COBB. In 1855 or 1856.

Mr. MULDROW. Let me put this further question to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. MULDROW. Suppose the State of Alabama, acting as trustee to receive this land in trust for the railroad, declined to accept that trusteeship, and yet the road has been built. It was the design of Congress to give them the aid of these lands for the construction of the road; and now, because the State of Alabama as trustee refuses to accept the trust, is it equitable the road should be deprived of the benefit of the grant?

Mr. COBB. I can say to the gentleman from Alabama that so far as I know, and so far as any member of the committee has been able to find out, this road has never made a claim for this land grant. The burden is upon the road to show that they have asked for the grant of lands. In other words, Mr. Speaker, they did not accept the lands. Under the law now, having refused for twenty-seven years to accept this land grant, it would be held, certainly, by any court in the country that that fact itself would be held as an abandonment of their rights, whatever they may have been. It would be held as an abandonment even if they had accepted it in a formal way at first and then made no claim for the lands for twenty-seven years. It occurs to me, as I have already stated, Mr. Speaker, that any court in Christendom trying the question would declare, under the circumstances, the company had abandoned the grant.

Mr. MULDROW. They had no means by which they could accept it.

Mr. COBB. They never tried to accept it. They never asked for the land. They are not here now appealing for it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Most of it being sold.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman is speaking for the company he has a channel to speak through different from that from which I get my information. What he has said does not come through the proper channel of this Government, the Interior Department, for there is nothing of that sort to be found there. I know of no officer of the company, no stockholder, no man having any interest in it, unless my friend has, who asked for a moment this grant be sustained. It seems the gentleman asks, after twenty-seven years have passed away, after the governor has refused to accept the trust, and after these lands have been restored to the public domain for disposal under the general law—the railroad company, I repeat, not having asked or demanded it since that time—the gentleman now comes in and asks that this portion of the bill be stricken out. It is a remarkable request, it appears to me.

Mr. OATES. It was not the governor who declined to accept it, but the Legislature.

Mr. MULDROW. I do not speak for the railroad company.

Mr. COBB. Can there be any equity or justice in now giving to a railroad corporation these lands after it had first refused to accept them, and after they had refused to pay tax to the Commonwealth of Alabama on them for twenty-seven years—can there be equity and justice in giving this company these lands after such has been the fact? If there is, I am not able to see it, and I do not think any member of this House will be able to see it.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Especially when private individuals have gone there and invested their means and made their homes on those lands.

Mr. COBB. As my friend from Alabama says, especially since private individuals have taken up those lands and made their homes there. To undertake to take these lands away from those who now hold them and give them to this company under the circumstances would be a crime.

But I shall not say anything further at this time unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question.

Mr. PRYOR. Is there any information before the committee which would go to show that any individual, since the grant was made, has entered and paid for these lands?

Mr. COBB. I can only say that I have been informed by the Interior Department that settlements have been made on some of these lands, but what the circumstances are particularly I can not say. We did not go into that question, because, as I have said, the company refused or the State of Alabama refused to accept these lands in trust for this corporation, and therefore the committee have believed it was not necessary for us to go further than to provide, as we have done in the second section, that individuals having gone on these lands in good faith shall be protected.

Mr. EATON. When were these lands restored to the public domain?

Mr. COBB. In 1858.

Mr. EATON. It seems pretty late now to give them away.

Mr. COBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, I desire briefly to call the attention of the House to the views as set forth in the amendment I had the honor to offer to the bill under consideration. I desire in the first place to return my sincere thanks to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, as well as to the House, for the courtesy extended to myself when this bill was first brought up for consideration; for at that time I was physically unable to present my views as I would like to do, whatever may be the result of my attempt to-day. Furthermore, I desire to say that last week when the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was up for consideration two of my colleagues from Mississippi and myself voted against it. We knew that the people of our State had never ceased to hope for the benefits that were naturally expected to flow from this grant which we are now considering. We considered that we were instructed, when the matter came up, to vote against the forfeiture of that grant; and we believed that we would be placing ourselves in an antagonistic or contradictory position if we voted for a sweeping act of forfeiture one day and the next came in and asked the House to make an exception in our favor.

Now, speaking for myself alone, Mr. Speaker, I have this further to say: I did most heartily concur in the sentiments so well expressed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] on that question, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR], to the effect that it was rather sweeping legislation to be hurried through on such short consideration. I felt that there might be cases where there should be an exception; where the roads, although not completed, might fairly appeal to the justice and equity of this House; where we might not require the pound of flesh, although we did happen to have the bond.

I heartily concur with the general spirit and scope of the resolution to which I have referred. As a general thing I think these old grants, where they have not been availed of by the companies for whose benefit they were made, ought to be forfeited, but I think there may be exceptions. I think that there may be cases where we might very properly decline to make a forfeiture, and I think, Mr. Speaker, the case under consideration, covered by my amendment, is one of those exceptions, as I shall hope to show.

Let us look at it. In 1856, on the 11th day of August, there was approved an act of Congress granting lands to States in aid of certain new railroads. Among the rest, as expressed in the act, was a grant to the State of Mississippi in aid of the construction of a railroad from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico. This, I say, was on the 11th of August, 1856. The bill had the usual provisions for surveys, location, filing of maps, and sale of lands. The bill further provided that if the road was not completed in ten years no further sales should be made, and the lands should revert to the United States.

Well, now, at the outset, to be understood, to be plain, I admit before this House that this road has never been built or commenced, and yet I appeal to the sense of justice of this House not to forfeit this particular grant; and why? Has anything been done upon it?

Mr. Speaker, I find on reference to Executive Document No. 144, of the Forty-seventh Congress, which I hold in my hand, the report of the Secretary of the Interior upon this subject. He states that on the 27th day of November, 1860, a map of the definite location of the road was filed in his office. Mark the date, November 27, 1860. So that up to that time we find the beneficiaries of the grant were taking all proper initiatory steps to avail themselves of it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is only necessary for me to refer to the state of things prevailing in this country in November, 1860, to show you by the mere statement, stronger than any argument, that in that section of the country at least nothing further could be done in the way of railroad building at that particular time. In fact, you may say during the whole of the ten years covered by this grant in that section of the country it was literally a physical impossibility to construct a road. We know it now, we did not know it then, it was not long after this grant was made that the war cloud gathered above the horizon, so soon after to burst in the terrible tempest of battle.

Whatever could be done in the North and West, in the section where the grant is located no road could have been built clear up from the time the maps of location were filed until the time of forfeiture, August 11, 1866. At that time the war was just over. The people in that section were in the throes and troubles of reconstruction trying to build up a new order of things. In fact railroad building about that time was just the last thing they could think of.

So much for that, Mr. Chairman. I think just barely to state the date of the decade in which the act required that road to be built and to state the location of country in which it was, is to state a reason full and ample why that road could not be completed in the ten years.

But we are met with the argument that seventeen years and more have elapsed, and all that time you have done nothing. Mr. Speaker, we could not avail of that grant since the 11th of August, 1866, for the simple reason that the date of forfeiture had attached, and we could get no capital, no men of money to take these lands and base a loan or mortgage upon them and use them as the basis of credit for the construction of the road. No man would touch them after the forfeiture had attached.

But what else could we have done? It is said we might have shown an honest disposition to avail of them. So we have. It has been the dream of the people of the State of Mississippi for more than a generation to have this road built. The act of 1856 was so far the commencement and putting in practice of their desire.

Now, sir, as soon after the war, as soon after the troubles and turmoils consequent upon the war, as they possibly could the people of the State of Mississippi commenced moving in this matter, in convention, in Legislature, in public meetings and gatherings, expressing their desire that this land grant might be again put into force and effect by Congress. I am told by my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] that the first act of the State Legislature on this subject was in 1870. Mark the date. About as soon after the date of forfeiture as you could expect the people of that section to think about making railroads they memorialized the Legislature, in 1870, when the State was under Republican rule; showing this is no partisan measure, that all the people, without regard to party, desire this grant and desire the building of this road.

And so on from time to time the Legislature asked Congress to restore this grant or renew it. And, Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask to be read from the Clerk's desk now, the last memorial on that subject, the memorial of the Legislature of 1882; and I beg the attention of the House while it is read, to show that what I say about the position of the State of Mississippi is correct. I want the whole memorial read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A memorial to the Congress of the United States in reference to waiver of forfeiture of the grant in aid of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists would respectfully show to your honorable body that the State of Mississippi has made repeated but ineffectual efforts heretofore through its Legislature, in the form of resolutions and memorials to Congress, to obtain a revival of the grant of public lands made by the Government in 1856 to aid in the construction of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad; that this liberal and valuable donation was lost by no supineness or indifference of our people, but by the interruption of all works of internal improvement caused by the late war, and since its close to the prostration and poverty which it entailed. No enterprise in our State has ever received more repeated and cordial indorsement from our Legislatures and people than this. At its present session our Legislature has granted a new act of incorporation, with liberal provisions, thus again attesting the abiding and earnest interest felt by our people in this important work.

It is almost superfluous to dwell on the great benefits to our State which would result from the construction of this road. It would gratify a long-cherished aspiration of all Mississippians to have within our own borders a seaport town through which the export and import trade of the State could be conducted. It would speedily populate and develop the resources of a large section of our State hitherto isolated and neglected for want of facility of access, a section of immense resources in its magnificent pine forests, its bold perennial streams, which afford unlimited water-power, and its genial, salubrious climate, making it the appropriate seat of cotton and woolen manufacture on a large scale. There is no portion of our State so well adapted to sheep husbandry, stock-raising, and farming on a small scale. We are persuaded that its natural advantages would speedily attract a hardy and thrifty population from the West and North, and that the development of its great natural resources would add largely to the wealth of our State and its annual revenues. So long since as 1860, Professor Eugene W. Hilgard, of the University of Mississippi (distinguished throughout the country for his valuable contributions to science), says:

The most casual observer, as soon as personal inspection shall have made him conscious of the reality, can not fail to be impressed with the immense importance of opening a highway through which Mississippi may communicate over her own, with a portion of her territory which possesses both a harbor commensurate with the magnitude of her commercial interests, and a climate not only healthful and pleasant, but capable, moreover, of producing many of the choicest fruits of the tropics as well as the temperate zone. Along with the cotton bales of north and central Mississippi the lumber and turpentine of the vast pine forests of the South would find their way through this channel to the great highway of nations. Nor would the ample grazing grounds which separate these forests from the coast long remain without a landmark to guide the traveler. May the day not be far distant when one uninterrupted band of iron shall link together the wheat and cotton fields of the South and West with the live-oak and orange groves of the coast of Mississippi.

It is not our State and its people alone who would reap advantages from the construction of such a road. The work would possess a semi-national importance in affording to the grain-growers of the West and Northwest the shortest and cheapest line of transportation to the seaboard for the export of their large annual surplus products; while at the same time it would enable them to receive their supplies of sugar, coffee, and other tropical products, as well as foreign merchandise, at a great reduction in cost of transportation. The Legislature of Mississippi has just granted a charter to the Yazoo Valley and Mississippi River Railroad, to extend from Jackson via Yazoo City to Arkansas City, in the State of Arkansas. This franchise was obtained by the Chicago, Saint Louis and New Orleans Railroad, which, with ample capital, purposes building this line without delay. The addition of the remaining link from Jackson to Pascagoula, or other point on our seaboard opposite Ship Island Harbor, will then connect the grain fields of the West and Northwest by almost an air-line of railway with the shipping of the world at that point.

We must consider the most important practical question of the resources available for the work. It is manifest the road can not be built by corporate or individual subscriptions in our own State. The well known pecuniary condition of our people forbids such a hope. But we have good reason to believe that if the former grant of Government lands can be revived a substantial basis of credit will be created; and with this material aid assured, there will be no difficulty in enlisting Northern and foreign capital to insure the early completion and equipment of the road.

It is apparent that this revival of the Government land grant, or waiver of forfeiture on the terms and conditions of the original grant, becomes the all-important and indispensable condition of success in the undertaking. Hence, we make this direct appeal to Senators and Representatives in Congress, and earnestly request that they will, without delay, revive and extend the grant of 1856 at the present session of Congress. And as in duty bound your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

Resolutions of the Mississippi Legislature accompanying the memorial to Congress in reference to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad.

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to present to their respective Houses of the National Legislature in Congress assembled the foregoing memorial, and to urge upon their Houses suitable bills to secure the waiver of the forfeiture and extension of time asked in the foregoing memorial.

Resolved further, That his excellency the governor be requested to forward copies of the foregoing memorial and resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Adopted by the house of representatives March 8, 1882.

W. H. H. TISON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Adopted by the senate March 7, 1882.

R. O. REYNOLDS,
President of the Senate.

Approved March 9, 1882.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Speaker, the point I desire to make right here is this, that in addition to the memorial which has just been read by the Clerk, memorial after memorial has been sent up to this Congress by the State of Mississippi since the forfeiture of this grant in 1866. Taking this fact in connection with what I said before, I think I have made out a clear and reasonable case, in which neither non-user nor laches can be attributed to the beneficiaries of this particular grant.

I desire now to call the attention of the House for a moment to another phase of this matter, and I will be as brief as I can. In looking over the tables of land grants, I find that there have been granted—granted, I say, not patented, but voted by Congress—to corporations, not to States, in all 145,000,000 of acres, and to States there have been granted 35,000,000 of acres, or, say, 180,000,000 acres, or 280,000 square miles in all.

Now I wish to call the attention of the House, in no invidious spirit, with no sense of complaining, but to fortify the principle upon which I started out, of something like equal and exact justice or at least fair dealing. Let us for a moment see how the account stands with the States on the subject of land grants. I have shown you that to corporations there have been voted 145,000,000 acres; a quantity so vast that the mind can hardly grasp it. As has been well said, whole empires have been voted away to corporations. But let that pass.

How does the account stand with regard to the States? I hold in my hand a table showing the actual amount of acres patented—not granted, but absolutely patented to the States. At the risk of wearying the House I will run over it very briefly.

The account stands thus: Illinois, 2,595,053 acres; Florida, 1,857,458; Alabama, 1,857,458; Louisiana, 1,072,405; Mississippi, 937,159; Arkansas, 2,444,945; Iowa, 4,544,332; Missouri, 1,828,005; Michigan, 3,356,937; Wisconsin, 2,503,380; Minnesota, 7,572,963, and Kansas, 3,880,993.

I am not complaining that these different States have been so far benefited by the magnificent bounty of Congress. I only want to compare my own State with other States. The State of Mississippi has received less than a million of acres, while Minnesota has received over seven million of acres; not simply voted, but absolutely patented to the State, and of which it avails itself. And here we of Mississippi are to-day pleading with the House not to take away from us the little grant that is mentioned and referred to in the pending bill.

Let us speak about that a moment; I think the House ought to be advised about it. On examining the tables and the papers in the office of the Secretary of the Interior I find that he has made an approximate estimate of the amount of land in this grant as originally made; that amount is 652,800 acres. I wish to state to the House this further fact, that after the forfeiture of the 11th of August, 1866, the Government of the United States has allowed purchases to be made of lands embraced within this grant. A great quantity of the original grant has been bought, so that according to the best judges to-day it is estimated that there is available in the grant to the State of Mississippi not over 500,000 acres.

There is a bill pending before the House, one introduced by myself, in relation to the land grant to the State of Mississippi. If I can get the grant saved, or rather the forfeiture of it prevented, the bill which I have introduced will, if passed, regrant to the State of Mississippi just simply the half million of acres now left unsold, asking for no indemnity on account of lands that have been sold of the original grant.

I wish to state here that we want the rights of all purchasers and settlers to be faithfully protected. Whether this bill passes or not, whether my amendment is adopted or not, in any event, whatever bill may pass, the rights of all purchasers of lands will be protected. In case the House shall see fit to adopt my amendment and not allow this forfeiture, the amount of land that will be saved to the State of Mississippi will be simply 500,000 acres, which, added to the 900,000 acres we have already received, will make the amount granted to the State of Mississippi less than 1,500,000 acres, while other States, as I have shown, have received from 3,000,000 to 7,000,000 acres each absolutely granted to them.

There is another reason why this grant should be made good, and I wish to say a word on that subject. It was eminently right and proper that the grant should be made in the first place, and every single reason applying to the grant then applies to it now and with greater force.

The grant embraces a section of country covered for the most part with pine timber, most excellent pine timber. But it is far from market; the country is not thickly settled; not much of it has been taken up for farms or pastures. It consists of just such land as pays nothing in the world until the country is settled and its vast resources developed, just such a country as private enterprise never would construct a road through.

Another consideration. This is not a great trunk line; it is not a line connecting one great point with another great point, or one great section with another great section, like roads that connect the Atlantic with the Pacific. The object of this road is to connect the railroads near the center of the State of Mississippi, through vast tracts of pine forest, with the Southern Sea, so as to give our people in that part of the State and their products a seaport for their commerce, an outlet to the sea.

And, Mr. Chairman, it is a fair land, fair as any the sun shines on, from the initial point of the proposed route all the way to its terminus, gently sloping to the Southern Sea, holding vast possibilities of wealth in timber, in lumber, in field and herd, waiting only the magic contact of capital, skill, and energy to develop all these and return fourfold any benefactions bestowed upon it.

It may be possible that in a long range of years this road may be built without the aid of any grant; but I stand here to say that if there ever was a section of country, if there ever was a portion of a State, if there ever was a State, to which it was right to vote aid by a land grant, this is such a case. Take the map and look at this section of country. Trace it down from the center of the State through all this region of pine forest, far from market, far from any outlet, far from any chance of development, and you must see what a beneficence would be a grant of this land, what a vast benefit this railroad would be.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman from Mississippi permit a question?

Mr. VAN EATON. If I can answer it, I will do so.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the land grant in behalf of which the gentleman has been speaking should be excepted out of the operation of the forfeiture provided for in this bill, what assurances can the gentleman give the House that this road from Brandon to the Gulf will be constructed in the next few years?

Mr. VAN EATON. This assurance, that capitalists have been looking up that section of country, have been examining into the condition of this grant, with the view of assisting the people of the State to build this road if they could avail themselves of the grant; but they refused to touch the enterprise so long as the forfeiture hangs over the grant. More than that, these men who have the means, have given us assurance that they would build the road if they could have the benefit of the grant.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Is there a company incorporated which proposes to construct this road from Brandon to the Gulf?

Mr. VAN EATON. Such an act of incorporation has been passed more than once. The volume of the acts of the Legislature of Mississippi which I sent to the Clerk's desk contains another act of incorporation passed in 1882. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to this point. In that act of incorporation or recorporation the leading men of the State are named, without regard to party. Among those whom I just now think of are my colleague [Mr. BARKSDALE], Col. Jones S. Hamilton, one of the most enterprising men in our State, and George C. McKee, who formerly held a seat in this House, a leading Republican of our State. It is thus shown that this is a public enterprise in which all our people are interested, without regard to party.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Will the gentleman answer another question?

Mr. VAN EATON. I will try to do so.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Are we to understand that the reason this road has not been built heretofore is because of the situation of the grant, the fear that it might be rescinded by reason of the expiration of the time originally limited?

Mr. VAN EATON. That is true.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. If that be true, why will these men build this road within the next few years while this same doubt continues?

Mr. VAN EATON. They will not. I am trying to have that difficulty removed.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Then, in the third place, what objection is there to the forfeiture? Will you be worse off if the forfeiture be made than you are now?

Mr. VAN EATON. Only in this: we shall have lost the land and the road. If Congress does not enforce this forfeiture we intend to ask this House for such legislation of a moderate kind as will insure, if not the completion of the road, a forfeiture of the grant within a very short time at least. We do not ask or wish that the grant shall be hung up inoperative for a great length of time. It ought not to be.

Mr. BRUMM. What reason is there why this grant should not be forfeited that does not apply to every other grant forfeited by the bill? Is there any difference between this and other land grants? If there is none, why should it not suffer the same fate?

Mr. VAN EATON. I have tried to show as far as I possibly could why this grant should not be forfeited. Now, why these others should not be forfeited I do not know, and am not here to speak for them.

Mr. BRUMM. So far as you know they all stand upon the same footing?

Mr. VAN EATON. It may be so, but I am not their friend, their agent, or their attorney.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. VAN EATON. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker, when the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was presented to the House a few days ago I voted for it. That resolution declared in favor of the forfeiture of all land grants where nothing had been done by the parties to whom they were made. At the last session of Congress I introduced a bill into this House proposing to renew the grant to the State of Mississippi for a railroad from Brandon to Ship Island. I did it in obedience to the instructions of the Legislature of my State; and I did it because I thought it was proper to do so. I urged its passage before the Committee on Public Lands by all the means in my power. Able attorneys were employed to come here, who made learned briefs and eloquent speeches before that committee, and yet that committee failed to make any report in regard to that matter.

Now, sir, I would be perfectly willing to segregate this grant from others, and I would be willing to vote for it, although I could scarcely justify myself as being consistent; but when the broad principle is presented to me whether a hundred million of acres of public lands shall be held by these corporations without any roads having been built and without any taxes having been paid to the States in which they are located, I felt I was compelled to take a broader view of the matter and vote for the resolution. I say I believe this grant ought to be excepted; but when it comes to putting them all back, when it comes to saying these railroads shall hold on to millions of acres of the public lands so as not to allow any person whatever to enter on them for settlement and cultivation, I say we can not afford to do it.

Mr. VAN EATON. I was aware, Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Mississippi had introduced the bill he spoke of. I was also aware he was friendly to the measure under consideration. I have only this to say about that: I could not vote for the sweeping resolution of the gentleman from Indiana, knowing I intended, as I said in the outset, to ask the House to make this exception. I am just as much in favor of the general principle of forfeiting these grants, when reason can be shown they should be, as my colleague or any other member of the House. At the same time, as I have already said, I wished to leave myself in the situation where, if a case is shown to have merit, I can in my humble capacity vote for it and do what is just and right and equitable. That is all.

I shall detain the House but a few moments longer. I have tried to show the House why this road was not built; that before and up to the war, after doing all we could at that time, taking all the proper steps up to 1860, that for the six years following it was physically impossible, and that for all the years which followed, the seventeen years of negligence with which we have been taunted, men would not take hold of these lands on account of the defect that appeared in the title; and I do not blame them for that. I have shown that time and again our people, in every way they could, have come to this House and asked for an extension of this grant; and I say now, as I said before, that no negligence, no laches can be imputed to the people who purpose to avail themselves of this grant. That is the reason why I have offered this amendment asking this grant shall be excepted out of the face of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I do not come here in the character of a suppliant. I come here simply as a Representative from an equal State, coequal with any of her peers, appealing to the equity and sense of justice of this House.

In conclusion I have to say I speak for a land offering at this time the greatest encouragement for the investment of capital and the immigration of the enterprising; for a people who, harried by war and tried in the fires of reconstruction, rising superior to troubles and discouragements such as few peoples have encountered, are fast building up a new South; who extend the warmest of welcomes to all who come among them with honest intentions; and who, having left the things that are behind, join heart and hand with all who would add to the prosperity and increase the happiness of all the people of "a great, free, and prosperous realm." [Loud applause.]

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair). Does the gentleman from Mississippi desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I represent a district which is in part interested in the pending question, and desire to be heard in opposition to the bill which has been reported from the committee. If, however, any gentleman desires to be heard on the other side, I think I will yield the floor for the purpose of hearing him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will be recognized.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in accord with the proposition involved in the first section of this bill. I agree with the remark made by a gentleman when the resolution voted upon the other day was before the House for consideration, that the time has come to reverse this policy of extending Government aid in the shape of land grants for the construction of railroads, and I am happy to see that this House has approached the consideration of this question determined to take back into the hands of the General Government the vast domain that now lies encumbered by these shadowy titles.

But it is my single purpose to restore to the public domain these lands, and while taking them to ourselves not foolishly or recklessly to bestow them on somebody else. In this connection I challenge particularly the provisions of the second section of this bill. I want to know what it means, upon what interests it is to operate, and what will be its result or its effect upon the public lands.

The second section, it seems to me, is not well guarded. In the first section we propose to take back the public domain that was perhaps recklessly bestowed upon these corporate organizations. But by the second section what are we going to do? That provides—

> That in any and all cases, as to any lands embraced within the terms of any of the acts named in section 1 of this act, whenever the Department of the Interior, or its officers, or the local land officers, have treated said lands as open to selection, purchase, or homestead entry, and have allowed purchases, selections, and entries of any of said lands under the general laws of the United States, the acts of the Department of the Interior and its officers, and the local land officers, in permitting such entries, selections, and purchases, in making such sales, and in issuing patents, certificates, and lists thereon—

all such unauthorized acts are hereby ratified and confirmed. That is what it means.

Now, I know not what is hidden behind the scope of this section, but I can see well that there is room for a considerable job. I can see room for a very extensive speculation. These lands were granted in the year 1856, twenty-seven years ago, as we have been so frequently reminded to-day. They were withdrawn from market. At that time what was their value? I suppose not to exceed $1.25 an acre.

But twenty-seven years have come and gone, and what to-day is their value? I suppose that they are worth very much more now than they were at that time. Have these lands been entered by speculators at the old price? Have people been held back from competing for the purchase of the lands because, forsooth, they were encumbered by railroad claims? I do not know. It is impossible to know. The committee in their report make no statement upon this point. They touch but briefly upon the subject.

I do know that in my own State lands that have been affected by these railroad grants have risen enormously in value; and if to-day the incubus of the railroad grants could be removed and these lands put up at auction, the Treasury of the United States would gather into it fifty or sixty dollars an acre for them. This was done but recently in the State of Minnesota on pine lands, such as these are said to be. They were auctioned off by officers of the United States Government at from fifty to sixty dollars an acre. Have these lands, in anticipation of the passage of some such measure as this, been entered through the general or local land offices at $1.25 an acre? If so, who has engineered the speculation? To whom will accrue the profits? Let us have an explanation. Let us understand what we are doing.

Now, I will vote for the first section of this bill. I heartily approve of it. I do not know but that I shall vote for the second section if the House refuses to strike it out, as I am so anxious to reach definite results that will follow from the operation of the first section. But I prefer that the second section should be stricken out, or the first and second separated altogether; and I would like to see a motion made by some member of this committee, some one who knows more about it than I do, to strike out the second section. Let us simply adopt the policy of restoring these vast domains to the control of the Government, and then by itself in a subsequent act decide the question upon whom we will bestow them, or what price we will fix for their purchase.

Mr. STRAIT. I would like to ask the gentleman at what place this sale took place in Minnesota of which he has just spoken.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. At Duluth, I presume; but I do not know that fact.

Mr. STRAIT. I will tell the gentleman that lands were sold for three dollars and some cents per acre, which was the average price obtained for them, instead of $50 or $60 as he states.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. I happened to know a gentleman who paid the $60 for some tracts.

Mr. STRAIT. At the average price?

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. I do not know the average price.

Mr. STRAIT. It was three dollars and some cents per acre.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I trust the House will not commit itself to the declaration of indiscriminate forfeiture contained in the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands. And if it shall please this body to adopt the amendment of my colleague [Mr. VAN EATON], who is a member of the committee, I will ask the favorable judgment of the House upon a bill which I will send to the Clerk's desk to be read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Whereas the time limited for the construction of a railroad from the Gulf of Mexico to the town of Brandon, State of Mississippi, in the act aforesaid, having expired from causes which could not have been avoided, whereby the benefit of said grant has not been realized by the State: Therefore,
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the time required by the aforesaid act, approved August 11, 1856, for the construction of the road from the Gulf of Mexico to the town of Brandon, commonly known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, is hereby extended six years from the date of the approval of this act, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the said railroad according to the route and termini prescribed in the act of August 11, 1856, donating the land for the construction of the said road from the Gulf of Mexico to Brandon: Provided, That if said railroad be not completed within six years from the date of the approval of this act, then the lands described in the act of August 11, 1856, shall revert to the United States.
> SEC. 2. That the State of Mississippi be authorized to confer the privileges of the aforesaid act upon such company as its Legislature may incorporate for the construction of the railroad aforesaid, and that the right of way is hereby granted to the said company through the public lands belonging to the United States.

Mr. BARKSDALE. As has been stated, Mr. Speaker, in 1856 Congress donated to the State of Mississippi alternate sections of land on either side of a railroad projected from the Gulf of Mexico to the town of Brandon, where it was designed to be connected with the system of railroads then in operation or in contemplation. The donation was in pursuance of a generous and liberal public policy, which had operated beneficially in all the States to which grants had been made. Its intent was to promote the settlement and improvement of the public lands and to enhance those which were reserved to the Government by making their products accessible to market. Hence the act of donation prescribed that the land should be sold for double the minimum price of the public lands. This beneficent and liberal policy has been profitable in many ways to the Government and to the people.

It is unnecessary to discuss the legal principles involved in the grant. The very terms of the act and the report of the committee imply that the title will remain to the State until it is canceled by an affirmative act of Congress. The question presented for consideration by the bill of the committee and the amendment of my colleague [Mr. VAN EATON] is, shall this indiscriminate declaration of forfeiture be made? The answer of those who oppose the amendment is that the grant was made upon the condition that the lands should revert to the Government within ten years if the road was not completed, but it may reasonably be assumed that if the reasons are sufficient and satisfactory why this reversion should not be enforced it will not be; and these reasons do exist. They are abundant.

In the first place, the lands for the most part remain unsold. In the next place, the motives to enhance their settlement and improvement still remain. Therefore, if the policy was meritorious in the beginning it is equally so now. Not the mere question of time, but the great object sought to be accomplished by the policy should influence the action of the House. If the policy of the grant is wise, what difference can it make to the Government whether it be consummated in ten years, in fifteen years, in twenty years, or even in fifty years?

The question has been asked why the road has not been built. I am abundantly prepared to show, indeed my distinguished colleague [Mr. VAN EATON] has shown, that the failure is due to no lack of interest in the great enterprise on the part of the State of Mississippi. At the first meeting of the Legislature after the grant was made it was formally accepted. A commission was appointed to carry out its objects and an appropriation was made for surveying and locating the line of the road. In pursuance of the act the line was surveyed and located, and in 1860 the State transferred to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad her stock in other roads, which had cost her $1,300,000 in gold. These acts attest the fixed purpose of the State in good faith to avail herself of the benefits of the grant.

The prosecution of the enterprise, however, was arrested by a great historical event, upon which it is not necessary that I should now dwell. When the curtain dropped upon the scene in 1865 the time had expired for the completion of the road. By the hard fortune of war, from 1865 to 1870 Mississippi was reduced to a condition of Territorial vassalage and deprived of her Statehood. Her relations to the Federal Government were restored in 1870, and from that time to the present she has continued to appeal to Congress to renew the grant.

In addressing Congress with her petition, which has been read as a part of the remarks of my colleague [Mr. VAN EATON], let it be understood that my State does not ask this body to depart from an established usage nor to create a new precedent for her benefit. The examples are numerous in which similar indulgence to that which I ask for Mississippi has been granted to other States. Let me cite a few of these instances, for I have them here in abundance. In 1862 Congress passed an act supplemental to "an act granting the right of way to the State of Missouri and a portion of the public lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State," which was approved June 5, 1862. I ask the honorable gentleman from the State of Missouri to listen to the act:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the time required by the act to which this is supplemental for the completion of the road therein described "from the city of Saint Louis to such point on the western boundary of said State as may be designated by the authority of said State," as well as the time of reversion to the United States of the lands thereby granted to the State of Missouri for the use of said road, is hereby extended for ten years from the 10th day of June, 1862: Provided, That in case said company fail to complete said road within the time as thus extended the said lands shall then revert to the United States.—Lester's Land Laws, volume 2, page 52.

It is instructive to look to the motives that influenced Congress to grant the indulgence asked for by the State of Missouri. They are precisely the grounds on which I am advocating the claims of Mississippi. I will read from the Congressional Globe for the second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress, page 2431. Mr. Phelps, of Missouri, in advocacy of the bill, said:

The grant is not extended to the railroad company, but to the State of Missouri. It is the State that will obtain all the benefits of this bill.

The effects of the financial revulsion of 1857 extended in Missouri to 1858-'59. The civil war that has recently carried devastation through the country has been most severely felt there. The flight of its inhabitants, the destruction of their property, all prevented their being able at this time to construct that road. This bill merely extends the time within which the people of the State may receive the benefits intended to be conferred by Congress in the land grants made to that State.

When the bill went to the Senate, unanimously and without discussion, as the record shows, it passed that body.

In the volume which I hold in my hand (Lester's Land Laws) I find many other examples, one especially, to which I will call the attention of the House, and particularly the attention of honorable gentlemen representing the State of Michigan:

Be it enacted, &c., That the time limited for the completion of the Marquette and Ontonagon Railroad of the State of Michigan be, and the same is hereby, extended for the term of five years beyond the time fixed for its completion by the act of Congress of June 3, 1856, &c. (Volume 2, page 108.)

Again, I find an act approved March 3, 1865, entitled "An act to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads to which land grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin." I will not take up the time of the House by reading it; the purpose and object of the law are sufficiently expressed by the title.

Again, an act was passed March 3, 1865, "extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the States of Minnesota and Iowa, and for other purposes." Let the distinguished gentlemen who represent those States remember the example which I have cited in their own case. In this instance not only was the time extended but the quantity of land originally granted was very largely increased. There are other acts of extension which were granted in favor of Michigan.

The following is an act of similar purport for the benefit of Wisconsin, approved September 13, 1868:

Be it enacted, &c., That the time fixed by an act granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads in the State of Wisconsin, approved May 5, 1864, for the completion of the railroad from Tomah to Saint Croix River, or lake, be, and the same is hereby, extended for a period of three years to the West Wisconsin Railroad Company, a corporation established by the laws of the State of Wisconsin, &c.

I find an act, approved July 28, 1866, "to revive and extend the provisions of an act granting the right of way and making a grant of land to the States of Arkansas and Missouri, to aid in the construction of a railroad from a point upon the Mississippi opposite the mouth of the Ohio River, via Little Rock, to the Texas boundary near Fulton, in Arkansas, with branches to Fort Smith and the Mississippi River, approved February 9, 1853, and for other purposes." Now let the gentleman from Arkansas, as well as the gentleman from Missouri, remember what has been done in the interest of their own States before they decide to vote against the amendment of my colleague.

On page 226 of the volume above cited appears an act, approved May 7, 1866, extending the time for the completion of the Pacific Railroad, Eastern Division; also one passed May 21, 1866, extending the time for the construction of the first section of the Western Pacific Railroad.

Numerous other cases are contained in this volume, which I will not recite in detail. I have shown that it has been the invariable rule of Congress to extend the time for the completion of important enterprises when it has been petitioned to do so by the States in whose behalf the grants were made. All I ask is the application of the same rule to the State which I have the honor in part to represent. May I not reasonably appeal to members of this House to do as they have been or as they would be done by under similar circumstances?

Mr. Speaker, I trust that my State will not be made a vicarious sufferer for the alleged wrongdoing of others, and I protest against complicating her just claim and involving it in the same fate with those of powerful moneyed corporations which are charged, whether correctly or incorrectly I will not undertake here to decide, with asserting their right to grants which they have not earned. What I ask, and what I have a right to expect, is that each case will be considered upon its own merits. The same considerations of sound and enlightened public policy which originally induced the bestowal of the grant to Mississippi still exist and plead strongly in favor of its continuation.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I sympathize with my friend from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE], and also with his colleague [Mr. VAN EATON], my colleague on the committee, in their appeals to this House to adopt the amendment excepting from this bill the grant to the railroad company in their State. But, sir, in carrying out the policy which this House a few days ago unmistakably declared with reference to these railroad land grants, there was not in my judgment, nor is there now, after having heard the discussion, any good reason why this grant should be made an exception. I am unable to perceive why it should not stand upon the same basis with the grants to other corporations that have been negligent—but no more so than this corporation—in availing themselves of the provisions of these grants.

My friend from Mississippi has cited as precedents a number of cases in which this House has extended the period of the grants to various railroad companies; but unfortunately no such record is presented in the case of the corporation for whom he speaks. I have not been informed, nor I believe has any member on this floor asserted or shown, that there has been any act, or even any bill, introduced in this House until the present session for the purpose of extending that grant to any future time.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I will ask my friend from Alabama to what measures he refers.

Mr. OATES. To the bill the gentleman had read just now, the bill introduced this session.

Mr. BARKSDALE. With the gentleman's permission I beg leave to correct him. A bill having precisely this object in view was introduced by my colleague [Mr. SINGLETON] at the last session or during the last Congress.

Mr. OATES. Well, then, until the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress, it seems, no action was taken for the purpose of extending the time within which this corporation might avail itself of the provisions of the original grant.

Mr. MULDROW. My friend is again in error, for in the Forty-fifth Congress, I think—certainly not later than the Forty-sixth—I myself introduced a bill looking to the restoration of this grant.

Mr. OATES. This is the first information I have had even of that; and at any rate the measure has not been pressed very vigorously. I do not think it can be alleged in behalf of this grant that those who seek to avail themselves of its benefits have been very diligent. In pursuance, therefore, of the general policy, I see no reason for the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

But, Mr. Speaker, it was not with reference to this matter that I rose to address the House. Under all the grants embraced in this bill, except one, the companies to whom the grants were made have taken no action whatever, as I learn, toward the construction of their respective roads. With the exception of the Memphis and Charleston railroad, not a mile of road has been constructed by any of them, not a rail laid. With regard to the single road named, some explanation perhaps is necessary, because it has been stated on this floor, and it is a fact, that this road was completed before the expiration of the time named in the grant. The reason the committee have reported in favor of the forfeiture of this grant will be manifest when attention is called to the terms of the grant and the facts connected therewith. The act of June 2, 1856, provides in the first section:

That there be, and is hereby, granted to the State of Alabama for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads—every alternate section of land designated by odd numbers for six sections in width on each side of each of said roads.

Then follows a specification of the several lines of railroad—

Then the sixth section provides—

That a grant of lands shall be made to said State to aid in the construction of the following roads in said State, to wit: The Memphis and Charleston Railroad, extending from Memphis, on the Mississippi River, in Tennessee, to Stevenson, on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, in Alabama.

This last section further provides that this grant with others is made upon the same terms, conditions, and restrictions as are set forth in the preceding sections of the act. What do those preceding sections provide? In section third it is declared—

That the said lands hereby granted to the said State shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature thereof, for the purposes aforesaid and no other.

Then section fourth provides—

That the lands hereby granted to said State shall be disposed of by said State only in manner following, that is to say: That a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections for each of said roads, and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of each of said roads, may be sold; and when the governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any twenty continuous miles of any of said roads is completed, then another quantity of land hereby granted, not to exceed one hundred and twenty sections for each of said roads having twenty continuous miles completed as aforesaid and included within a continuous length of twenty miles of each of such roads, may be sold, and so from time to time until said roads are completed; and if any of said roads is not completed within ten years, no further sale shall be made, and the lands unsold shall revert to the United States.

Gentlemen will see that after the passage of this act it became necessary for the Legislature of the State of Alabama to take action on the subject. The lands were granted to that State in trust, and the State alone, under the grant, could administer the trust. Therefore it was necessary for the Legislature of that State to accept the trust and provide the machinery by which the lands could be sold in pursuance of the grant. The State, not acting through its governor alone but through its governor by authority of the Legislature, declined to accept the trust. I will read now from Executive Document No. 10, by the Secretary of the Interior.

This road was authorized by that portion of the act which provided for the Memphis and Charleston road, extending from Memphis, on the Mississippi River, to Stevenson, on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad, in Alabama. The State of Alabama refused to accept the grant for such road, and the lands withdrawn were restored to market by notice 595, February 19, 1858.

I can not well conceive how the Memphis and Charleston Company could have sold and disposed of any of these lands when the State of Alabama, acting through its Legislature and governor, refused to accept the grant.

I therefore conclude, Mr. Speaker, without further inquiry, that none of these lands were ever held by this company. In fact, perhaps it would be a hardship, perhaps this company would to-day object to this grant being confirmed and their company compelled to conform to its terms, because it obligates them, like nearly every other land grant, to carry the mails of the United States Government, as well as troops and supplies, on terms much less than otherwise the company would be entitled to charge. I have no information, and in fact the committee of which I have the honor to be a member have no information, that this company ever attempted to exercise any power in regard to this grant or ever disposed of an acre of this land.

Well, then, in logical order this brings me to answer, and I will do it very briefly, the argument of the gentleman from Michigan on the other side [Mr. HATCH] against the second section of the bill under consideration. Gentlemen will observe that the Secretary of the Interior put the lands embraced within the grant to the Memphis and Charleston Railroad Company upon the market. Those lands have been entered, and occupied, and improved, no doubt, very largely. Perhaps that action was not regular. I am not prepared to say whether this grant was so imperfect as it seems to have been regarded by the Secretary of the Interior, so that it was necessary to offer these lands at public sale before they were subjected to entry and homestead or not. There may be a doubt about that. The committee thought, to save the rights of any who may have purchased from the Government any of the lands granted to the railroads mentioned in this bill, to save them in their rights and to protect their homes, it was proper to incorporate this second section, which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That in any and all cases, as to any lands embraced within the terms of any of the acts named in section 1 of this act, whenever the Department of the Interior, or its officers, or the local land officers have treated said lands as open to selection, purchase, or homestead entry, and have allowed purchases, selections, and entries of any of said lands under the general laws of the United States, the acts of the Department of the Interior and its officers, and the local land officers, in permitting such entries, selections, and purchases, in making such sales, and in issuing patents, certificates, and lists thereon, are hereby ratified and validated, and the rights and titles of parties or persons holding patents or claiming right or title under certificates or lists of lands issued or certified by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or certificates issued by the officers of the local land offices, or who have made homestead entries or pre-emption settlements or claims upon any of said lands in any way affected by said grants, are hereby confirmed and made valid to the same extent as though said grants had never been made.

Now, one other suggestion in this connection. Suppose there is some irregularity, suppose some of the occupants of lands granted to these railroad corporations have not perfect titles and are occupying the lands and cultivating, are they not within the spirit of the general policy of this Congress touching the public lands? Why disturb them in their titles, why disturb them in their possessions, although their titles are deficient? If they located on these lands and are cultivating them they are within the spirit of the homestead laws, and therefore I say their titles should be confirmed. And that is all the second section of this bill proposes to do. And it seems to me there can be no misunderstanding of the object and purpose of the bill. They are to terminate these grants, with the solitary exception of the road from Jackson to Meridian, Miss., completed within the time, and nothing has been said in favor of that except what has been urged by my eloquent friends from Mississippi who have spoken on this subject.

Mr. PAYSON. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended taking any part in the discussion of this bill, nor do I intend to go into any question connected with the general merits of it, but I accept as a member of the Committee on Public Lands the invitation extended by the gentleman from Michigan on my left to explain to the House the necessity for the provision incorporated in section 2 of this bill. I beg gentlemen of the House to remember when all these acts were passed there was included in each one of them a provision as an express condition that unless these several roads were constructed within ten years the lands granted should revert to the General Government. The examination of the discussion in both Houses of Congress at the time these different bills were passed will show it was the opinion generally of lawyers this condition which was expressed in each was a condition precedent, so that, if any of the companies failed to complete their roads, then by operation of the law the lands would revert to the General Government, and the title be in it as before.

So in 1866, when the ten years had expired within which these roads were to be built, and no attempt had ever been made even to construct any portion of them, the Interior Department and the people generally believed that these lands were open to sale and settlement; and so, in actual good faith, hundreds of settlers went on the lands included within the limits of these railroad grants and made homestead entries and pre-emption settlement.

Mr. CHACE. Has the gentleman the evidence of the fact that the Interior Department entertained such a belief?

Mr. PAYSON. Yes, sir. I have in my hand Executive Document No. 144, which shows that all of these grants were restored to public sale at different times. I read now as to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad:

On August 15, 1856, prior to the location of the road, the lands falling within the probable limits of the road were withdrawn from sale or location by notice 567. A map of definite location of the road was filed in this office November 27, 1860; and no lands have been approved to the State for said road, neither has any portion of the road been constructed. The reservation of lands for the road ceased on August 11, 1856.

I say for the information of the gentleman from Rhode Island that the practice in the Interior Department is whenever a grant is made and a line of definite location filed for the construction of the road, that those lands within its operation are withdrawn. Then they have been restored by the Interior Department under a misapprehension of the law which I shall presently refer to.

Mr. Speaker, matters remained in this condition until 1874, when the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Shulenburg vs. Herriman, decided that instead of this condition being a condition precedent it was a condition subsequent; and I need not state to members of the bar about me what that distinction may be. It is enough to know, for those who may not understand it, that the effect of that decision was to hold that the legal title, as such, was in the grantee in all of these cases in the States respectively, and that it required an affirmative act of Congress to restore them to sale and settlement. But in the mean time hundreds and thousands of settlements had been made, and the gentleman from Mississippi last but one upon this floor is mistaken when he says that no sales of these lands have been made. Hundreds and thousands of acres have been sold under a pure misapprehension of the law by the Interior Department. These people are in possession. They purchased the lands in good faith; many of them settled upon them as homesteaders; and so, Mr. Speaker, out of abundant precaution, as much because of the absolute necessity for a provision of this kind where a citizen of the United States has purchased these lands in good faith, believing he had a right to purchase, and because the Interior Department made the sales believing they had the right so to do, the Committee on Public Lands believe it to be its duty to incorporate in this bill this provision, not only restoring the lands to the public domain as against the railway corporations claiming them and in whom the legal title exists to-day, but in addition to that to protect these innocent purchasers and grantees.

I say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HATCH] that there never has been an intimation either in the Forty-seventh Congress, where these matters were examined at length by the Judiciary Committee and of which I had the honor to be a member, or in the Committee on the Public Lands of this Congress—there never has been an intimation of jobbery or speculative purchase of a single acre of the lands affected by the scope and provisions of the bill under consideration.

If I have made myself understood by the House, Mr. Speaker, that is all I desire. If any gentleman desires to propound a question to me in reference to this bill, as a member of the committee representing it I shall attempt to give the information demanded.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PAYSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is there any State in which these lands are situated that makes any opposition to the forfeiture of these grants?

Mr. PAYSON. Not one.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Is there any railroad company originally the beneficiary of these grants which makes any opposition to this forfeiture.

Mr. PAYSON. Not one.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Are there any citizens in any State represented before the committee by counsel or otherwise who are opposed to the forfeiture?

Mr. PAYSON. Not a citizen, except in the case of the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad, represented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON]. There is not a claim of any kind against the forfeiture of these grants. There was not a representative of any State interested that has filed any opposition before the committee regarding this forfeiture; and the only opposition which appears there at all before the committee or the individual members of it has been made on the ground of equity, as suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi in relation to the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad.

Mr. COBB. I now demand the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. COBB. I decline to yield for further amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana declines to yield. If the previous question is ordered it will include the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. PAYSON. Before the question is taken on the motion for the previous question I desire to make a point of order. I insist that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi is not in order, for the reason that on Monday last a bill introduced by that gentleman himself was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, which includes the substance of this amendment; and under clause 4 of Rule XXI, as I recollect the rule, the amendment is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is too late to make the point of order on the amendment after it has been before the House for consideration for an hour or more.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think the gentleman in charge of the bill will agree to admit an amendment in line 22.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has declined to yield.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WOOD. As I understand the gentleman from Indiana has declined to yield for any further amendment, I move to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to report it back with the amendment which I hold in my hand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order at this time. The first question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. VAN EATON], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by adding after the word "act," in the fourteenth line, the following words:

"Also except so much of said act as relates to a grant of land in aid of a railroad from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico, commonly known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad."

So that it will read:

That so much of the several acts and parts of acts of Congress as are below recited be, and they are hereby, repealed, namely:

Chapter 83, 11 Statutes at Large, page 30, approved August 11, 1856, entitled "An act granting public lands in alternate sections to the State of Mississippi to aid in the construction of railroads in said State, and for other purposes," except so much of said act as relates to a grant of land in aid of "a railroad from Jackson to the line between the State of Mississippi and the State of Alabama," which road was completed within the time prescribed by said act.

Also, except so much of said act as relates to a grant of land in aid of "a railroad from Brandon to the Gulf of Mexico," commonly known as the Gulf and Ship Island Railroad.

The question being taken on the amendment, the Speaker pro tempore stated that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

Mr. BARKSDALE. At the suggestion of several gentlemen, I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COBB. I move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAND GRANT FORFEITURE OF TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The next business on the House Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3933) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company under the act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited, and that the whole of said lands be restored to the public domain and made subject to sale and settlement under existing laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. That in any and all cases, as to any lands embraced within the terms of the act named in section 1 of this act, whenever the Department of the Interior, or its officers, or the local land officers have treated said lands as open to selection, purchase, or homestead entry, and have allowed purchases, selections, and entries of any of said lands under the general laws of the United States, the acts of the Department of the Interior, and its officers, and the local land officers in permitting such entries, selections, and purchases, in making such sales, and in issuing patents, certificates, and lists thereon are hereby ratified and validated; and the rights and titles of parties or persons holding patents or claiming right or title under certificates or lists of lands issued or certified by the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or certificates issued by the officers of the local land offices, or who have made homestead entries or pre-emption settlements or claims of any kind upon any of said lands under the general laws of the United States, in any way affected adversely by said grant, are hereby confirmed and made valid to the same extent as though said grant had never been made; and all of said lands embraced within the provisions of said acts shall be restored to the public domain, subject to the saving of rights as provided in this section, as though said grant had never been made.

Mr. PAYSON. I think the report in connection with this bill had better be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the report is very long. It will take more than an hour to read it.

Mr. ANDERSON. I suggest that the reading be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If I have the floor for that purpose, I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PAYSON] has the floor.

Mr. PAYSON. With the understanding that this will come up as unfinished business on Saturday, I have no objection to the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that if this bill is not finished at the adjournment to-day it will be in the order of unfinished business, the consideration of the bill having been entered upon.

Mr. COBB. I am satisfied the temper of the House is to pass this bill, and they can do it in five minutes.

Mr. PAYSON. Upon the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana that this bill can readily be passed, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as the argument I would make in support of it the report I made on the bill for the committee. I ask that that may appear in the RECORD as my argument, and I then will move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the report be printed in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred certain bills relating to the grant of lands in aid of the Texas and Pacific Railway Company, having had the same under consideration, make the following report:

Your committee have given this case careful attention and earnest consideration, not only on account of the magnitude of the interests involved, but because this was the first grant considered by the committee where serious opposition was made to the proposal to declare forfeiture of the grant for breach of the condition on which it was made, in which several legal questions were presented at the outset and earnestly argued by eminent counsel, questions which are common to all the cases of lapsed grants pending before the committee, first among them being the question of the power of Congress to interfere in any event; so your committee have carefully examined the whole matter before recommending what they do, namely, that the accompanying bill be passed, declaring the grant forfeited for breach of the condition on which it was made, restoring the lands to the public domain for sale and settlement under existing law, and protecting the rights of settlers and claimants under the Government. We find the facts deemed essential to be as follows:

The Texas Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated by act of Congress approved March 3, 1871 (16 Statutes at Large, page 573). By section 1 of that act the route was defined and described as follows:

"From a point at or near Marshall, county of Harrison, State of Texas; thence by the most direct and eligible route, to be determined by said company, near the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, to a point at or near El Paso; thence by the most direct and eligible route, to be selected by said company, through New Mexico and Arizona, to a point on the Rio Colorado at or near the southeastern boundary of the State of California; thence by the most direct and eligible route to San Diego, Cal., to Ship's Channel, in the bay of San Diego, in the State of California, pursuing in the location thereof, as near as may be, the thirty-second parallel of north latitude."

Section 23 provides:

"That for the purpose of connecting the Texas Pacific Railroad with the city of San Francisco, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California is hereby authorized (subject to the laws of California) to construct a line of railroad from a point at or near Tehichipi Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado River, with the same rights, grants, and privileges, and subject to the same limitations, restrictions, and conditions, as were granted to said Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California by the act of July 27, 1866."

Section 9 provides for a land grant which, as described by the Secretary of the Interior, Executive Document 144, Forty-seventh Congress, first section, is—

"A grant of every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile on each side of the line as adopted by the company through the Territories of the United States, and ten alternate sections per mile on each side of the line in California. Exception is made of lands sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, and lands to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may have attached at the time the line of the road is definitely fixed.

"Indemnity is provided for lands thus lost to the grant out of alternate odd-numbered sections not more than ten miles from the limits of the sections granted. Provision is also made for indemnity for lands lost by reason of the near approach of the line of the road to the boundary of Mexico, and also for mineral lands excluded from the grant out of odd-numbered sections nearest the line of the road."

Section 17 of the act required the company to commence the construction of the road simultaneously at San Diego, Cal., and at a point at or near Marshall, Tex., and prosecute the work so that the entire road should be constructed within ten years after the passage of the act.

By the act of May 2, 1872, however, the time for the construction and completion of the road was extended to May 2, 1882, and the title of the company changed to the Texas and Pacific Railway Company.

Section 4 of the act is as follows:

"That the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company shall have power and lawful authority to purchase the stock, land grants, franchises, and appurtenances of, and consolidate on such terms as may be agreed upon between the parties with, any railroad company or companies heretofore chartered by Congressional, State, or Territorial authority on the route prescribed in the first section in this act, but no such consolidation shall be with any competing line of railroads to the Pacific Ocean."

Section 5 reads:

"That the said company shall have power and authority to make running arrangements with any railroad company or companies heretofore chartered or that may be hereafter chartered by Congressional, State, or Territorial authority; also to purchase lands, or to accept donations or grants of lands, or other property from States or individuals for the purpose of aiding in carrying out the objects of this company."

Section 6 reads:

"That the rights, lands, land grants, franchises, privileges, and appurtenances, and property of every description belonging to each of the purchased or consolidated railroad company or companies as herein provided shall vest in and become absolutely the property of the Texas Pacific Railroad Company: Provided, That in all contracts made and entered into by said company with any and all other railroad company or companies, to perfect such aforesaid consolidation or purchase, the indebtedness or other legal obligations of said company or companies shall be assumed by the said Texas Pacific Railroad Company, as may be agreed upon, and no such consolidation or purchase shall impair any lien which may exist on any of the railroads so consolidated or purchased; but said company shall not assume the debts or obligations of any company with which it may consolidate or purchase as aforesaid to an amount greater than the cash value of the assets received from the same."

Section 15 provides—

"That all railroads constructed, or that may be hereafter constructed, to intersect said Texas Pacific Railroad shall have the right to connect with that line;" that no discriminations shall be made, &c.

Section 18 provides for the appointment of a commission to examine the road as constructed, and for a report to the President for approval, preliminary to the issue of patents for the land.

Section 23 reads:

"That for the purpose of connecting the Texas Pacific Railroad with the city of San Francisco the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California is hereby authorized (subject to the laws of California) to construct a line of railroad from a point at or near Tehichipi Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad, at or near the Colorado River, with the same rights, grants, and privileges, and subject to the same limitations, restrictions, and conditions as were granted to the said Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California by the act of July 27, 1866: Provided, however, That this section shall in no way affect or impair the rights, present or prospective, of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, or any other railroad."

Pending the construction of the railroad of the Texas Pacific Railroad, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of Arizona, and the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of New Mexico were chartered by the Legislatures of those Territories respectively, the objects of these corporations being to construct a line of railroad from a point (Yuma) on the Colorado River (which was the proposed point of junction of the Southern Pacific Railroad of California with the Texas Pacific Railroad) eastwardly to Texas, and practically along the line of the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, substantially identical with the route proposed by the Texas Pacific from El Paso (on the line between Texas and New Mexico) westwardly to Yuma.

These two corporations last named, it should perhaps be stated, are practically identical with the Southern Pacific of California, all three forming, in fact, one corporation—the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. This is believed to be all the legislation necessary to be noticed in connection with the question in hand.

Work was begun by the Texas Pacific Company at Marshall, in Texas, and by the Southern Pacific Company in California, the latter progressing toward the point of junction as proposed, Yuma, and the former westwardly toward El Paso, on its line by that point toward Yuma. It is enough to say that when the Southern Pacific reached Yuma, about April, 1877, the Texas Pacific had its line in Texas only completed to Fort Worth, distant some 1,200 miles from Yuma.

The delay in its construction seems to have been caused by the great depression in monetary matters following the panic of 1873, and the inability of the managers of the enterprise (headed then by Mr. Thomas Scott) to sell the bonds of the company to realize funds for the prosecution of the work.

Mr. Scott then came to Congress for relief, asking in substance that the Government guarantee the interest on a large amount of bonds which he proposed to issue, and asserting that it would be impossible for his company to complete the work on which it had entered and give the country a through line of competing road to the Pacific coast, as was contemplated by the act of 1871, unless this additional aid (which he claimed was really only a loan of credit) was given.

Then began the struggle between these two corporations, which continued until November, 1881, until it was ended by a contract between the Southern Pacific Company and the Texas and Pacific Company, then represented by Mr. Jay Gould, who had succeeded Mr. Scott as the head of the last-named corporation.

For reasons which will be apparent later in this report your committee deem it very essential to keep in mind the relations which these companies sustained toward each other during the period construction was progressing of the road of each, and to remember that the clearly expressed intention on the part of Congress in the act making this grant was to provide for a competing through line of railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean, and that San Diego was to be the western terminus. At that time the position of the only through transcontinental line of transportation, owned by the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific Companies, was well understood by the people and their representatives in Congress.

The Congress had in the charters to these two corporations given them bounties to aid in the construction of their roads most prodigal in their extravagance, but the enterprise of building a transcontinental line of railroad was believed to be necessary for a proper defense of the country in time of war, as well as for the proper transaction of business between the East and West.

The events are too recent to need recital here of the monumental fraud, treachery, and depredation committed by these corporations upon the public.

The managers of these two corporations procured in 1864 the passage of an act sacrificing every interest of the people that was protected by the acts incorporating them.

The second mortgages of the companies, aggregating over sixty-four millions of dollars, were made a prior lien over the lien of the Government for its claim of about the same amount, and the first lien of the Government made second. Indeed, as was said in debate on the bill, nothing that the ingenuity of man could invent for their benefit was withheld.

Consolidation from ocean to ocean was expressly permitted, and the result was what we have all witnessed and as a people we have experienced.

As soon as the civil war closed the old project of a Southern transcontinental route was revived, and it was favored by many of the statesmen of that period on the ground that it would aid the South in recuperating, and it was only just, as the North had had the benefit of the immense grants and enormous aids given to the other companies; and above all it was plausibly and properly argued that the construction of a rival competing through line along the thirty-second parallel to San Diego would remedy the monopolistic evils so apparent as to freight and passenger tariffs over the Central and Union Pacific roads.

The new route was called the "open highway," and, under the leadership and management of General Frémont, the new enterprise, known as the Memphis and El Paso, was put on its feet.

It received immense grants of land in Texas from the Legislature (the United States having no public lands in that State); was encouraged by Congress, and was prospering well, until, in the attempt to secure the investment of foreign capital in the enterprise, General Frémont was arrested on a charge of fraud in Paris.

This brought the scheme to an end apparently, until Mr. Scott, of the Pennsylvania Railroad, was induced to interest himself in the plan. To give the enterprise the appearance of a new project, and divested of the odium attaching to the ignominious failure of the old one, the name of Memphis and El Paso was abandoned and that of the Texas and Pacific adopted. All the land grants made by Texas to the Memphis and El Paso were transferred to the Texas Pacific; the citizens of San Diego, made large, valuable donations of lands and property to the new company for terminal facilities, and the assistance of Congress secured by the passage of the act of 1871 making this grant, to aid the "open highway"; to secure a "thorough competing line" to San Diego, and to prevent, as far as it seemed possible to do so, any arrangement or contract of purchase or sale or consolidation" with any competing line of railroads to the Pacific Ocean (sections 4 and 5).

So these two ideas are clearly apparent: that Congress intended to authorize this special enterprise to act in the construction of its proposed road to San Diego, which road was to be a competitive line with the Central and Union to the Pacific Ocean, and carefully guarded against the loss of the identity of the corporation it was creating by providing that all purchases, consolidation, property rights acquired, &c., should be the property of the Texas Pacific Company (section 6).

This was the condition of affairs when Mr. Scott became interested in the enterprise, and so continued until the panic of 1873, when active work in Texas was suspended for lack of necessary means.

We all remember that for a time investors could not be induced to embark in the most promising of schemes of railroad building after the great disaster to the Northern Pacific.

So Mr. Scott came to Congress and urged that, as an act of justice to a great enterprise, in the interest of a healthy competition, a guaranty of the interest only on the bonds of his company.

This appeal of Mr. Scott to the Forty-fifth Congress met with sturdy, strenuous opposition by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company.

That corporation, seeing the importance of the vast and increasing transcontinental traffic, and desirous of controlling it itself, commenced operations for securing it by, first, defeating the agent created by Congress to build the road, foreseeing that the difficulties under which the Texas Pacific were laboring were insurmountable unless the helping hand of Congress could be extended to it; second, by procuring the necessary authority to build east of Yuma, and then constructing its own road to the Mississippi Valley and the Gulf coast in Texas.

It should be borne in mind that up to this time the Southern Pacific had no rights east of Yuma, on the west bank of the Colorado River, in California. The only authority it had from Congress was in the last section of the act of 1871 to build a line of road from just above Los Angeles, Cal., to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado River; and, indeed, that is all the recognition Congress has ever given it. At Yuma the power of the Southern Pacific Company ceased so far as Congress was concerned.

How the Southern Pacific labored to defeat the Texas Pacific from securing the aid desired is best shown by a few extracts from letters written by Mr. Huntington, the principal manager of the Central Pacific, to Mr. Colton, the ostensible head of the Southern Pacific, which letters have become public in a litigation in California for a division of the vast profits arising from the consummation of this scheme. The authenticity of these letters has never been denied, and what they tend to or do prove will be noticed hereafter.

Just now the disclosures made by these letters are exceedingly opportune, and we insert a few of over three hundred of the same general character and tone.

These are the specimen letters:

NEW YORK, November 17, 1874.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of the 7th and 9th instant are received. I notice that you are yet on Luttrell's trail. I hope you will get some one to convince him that we are good fellows, and that should not be a hard thing to do, for I have no doubt of it myself. I notice what you say about getting control of the A. and P. franchise by getting a majority of the stock. My opinion is that a majority of that stock is in the hands of those that control the A. and P. and Texas P. You no doubt are aware that they went in with the Texas P. some two years ago, and that the two companies agreed to run the A. and P. down to meet the Texas P. somewhere in Texas, and then run one line through to the Pacific; but will find out all I can and let you know.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, November 28, 1874.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of November 27 is received, with inclosures. It certainly was a shabby thing in Vining to write such a letter. Towne wrote me and sent me a copy of the letter. I saw Dillon and he seemed very much offended at V. for writing it, and said nothing of the kind should happen again. I think I shall show your letter to Gould, but they are not our kind of people. I have sent out some copies of Tom Scott's bill as amended by me. Read it carefully and let me know what you think of it. Of course the San Diego people may not like it unless you agree to build a road from their place out to connect with our road, and you may think best to do that. It certainly is very important to S. F. that we build the S. P. into Arizona, and it would be well for you at once to write some letters for the influential men of S. F. to sign, to send to all our M. C. and Senators, to go for the bill as we want it; and if you do not think it right as it is, fix it and send it back, but if we could get it as it is I would be satisfied. Storr says it will make Scott very mad, and he thought it best not to send it, and maybe he is right; but if Scott kicks at it, I propose to say to Congress "we will build east of the Colorado to meet the Texas P. without aid, and then see how many members will dare give him aid to do what we offered to do without. My only fear then would be the cry that the C. P. and the S. P. was all one and would be a vast monopoly, &c., and that is what we must guard against, and that is one reason why you should be in Washington. I send copy of my letter to Scott on sending the bill; he sent it for me to fix to suit me. The U. P. people are not yet ready to order steamers.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, November 20, 1874.

FRIEND COLTON: Herewith I send copy of bill that Tom Scott proposes to put through Congress this winter. Now I wish you would at once get as many of the associates together as you can, and let me then know what you want. Scott sent me three copies fixed as he wants them, and asked me to help him pass them through Congress, and if I would not do it as he has fixed it, then he asked me to fix it so that I will, or in a way that I will support it. Now do attend to this at once, and in the mean time I will fix it here and see how near we are together when yours gets here. Scott is prepared to pay, or promises to pay, a large amount of money to pass his bill, but I do not think he can pass it, although I think this coming session of Congress will be composed of the hungriest set of men that ever got together, and that the d—— only knows what they will do. But as Scott's bill proposes to give up the A. and P. land grant (the west end of it), I am not sure that it would not be as well to let the bill stand in that way, we stopping the Texas Pacific at the Colorado River. If we ask to come this side of the Colorado it will be hard to stop the Texas P. from going west of it. I think the Texas P. or some of their friends will be likely to take the ground that the S. P. is controlled by the same parties that control the Central and that there must be two separate corporations that run roads into San Francisco, and it will be very hard for us to make head against that argument, and I am disposed to think that Colton had better come over and spend a few weeks at least in Washington. Would it not be well for you to send some party down to Arizona to get a bill passed in the Territorial Legislature granting the right to build a railroad east from the Colorado River (leaving the river near Fort Mohave)? Have the franchise free from taxation, or its property, and so that the rates of fares and freights can not be interfered with until the dividends on the common stock shall exceed 10 per cent. I think that would be about as good as a land grant. It would not do to have it known that we had any interest in it, for the reason that it would cost us much more money to get such a bill through if it was known that it was for us; and then Scott would fight it if he thought we had anything to do with it. If such a bill was passed I think there could at least be got from Congress a wide strip for right of way, machine-shops, &c.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, December 10, 1874.

FRIEND COLTON: Your two letters of November 29th are received. The Texas Pacific bill, as amended by me, is on the way to California. As it is somewhat different in theory from your views as set forth in your letter, I will not reply to you in detail before you receive the bill. I agree with you that there will no bill pass this session granting such aid as is asked for. I think we must add section to the bill as sent out that will allow, or may be compel, us to build a road to connect San Diego with our line. On account of this legislation I think it important that the S. P. should be disconnected from the Central as much as it well can be. And, as you say, I think it should have a superintendent that does not connect with the C. P., although I think it would be difficult to get another man as good as Towne. I agree with you fully when you say our telegraph superintendent is no good. I sent you on the 8th copy of my letter to Scott. I have just received his reply. I will have copy of it made and sent to you, also my reply, before this goes, and will send them with this. This S. P. is an important matter, and should be attended to at once. I am glad you are coming over.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

DECEMBER 8, 1874.

DEAR SIR: Herewith I hand you two copies of the proposed bill for your road, with such alterations as I want embodied therein. As it is a hard time for building railroads just now, and as we are all interested in the construction of this road, I trust that these alterations will meet your approval, and that such arrangements will be made as will secure the early completion of the road.

Truly, yours,

C. P. HUNTINGTON, President.

Hon. THOMAS A. SCOTT,
President Texas and Pacific Railway Company, Philadelphia, Pa.

(No. 6.)

TEXAS AND PACIFIC RAILWAY CO.,
OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Philadelphia, December 9, 1874.

MY DEAR SIR: I have your letter of December 8th, and am sorry you took the trouble you have with our bill. We expect to build our road to San Diego, as already pledged to the public to do. We had hoped that it would be to your interest to connect with us at San Gorgonio Pass. Your suggestions are totally inadmissible, and I am rather surprised to have you make them after the many statements you have made to me in regard to this matter.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS A. SCOTT, President.

C. P. HUNTINGTON, Esq.,
Vice-President, New York.

NEW YORK, January 17, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: * * * I have received several letters and telegrams from Washington to-day, all calling me there, as Scott will certainly pass his Texas Pacific bill if I do not come over, and I shall go over to-night, but I think he could not pass his bill if I should help him; but of course I can not know this for certain, and just what effort to make against him is what troubles me. It costs money to fix things so that I would know his bill would not pass. I believe with $200,000 I can pass our bill, but I take it that it is not worth that much to us.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 8.)

NEW YORK, March 25, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Your telegram in relation to passenger coaches is received and is having attention. Tom Scott has gone, or is going very soon, over the Texas Pacific road, and so on into Mexico, and I hear of several prominent parties going to Mexico with him. He has commenced to get up his Texas Pacific connected with some Mexican scheme, and I have no doubt but that he will be before Congress next winter in great force, but we ought to be in condition to at least keep him this side of the Colorado River. I have been at work considerable of the time since you left getting up pamphlet in relation to the S. P., giving many reasons why the bonds should be very good, and I think after you have read the book you will take some of the securities. Colburn is putting the facts in a readable shape. I find him to be a very valuable man. Can not you do something to bring up the gross earnings of the S. P.? They are very small for so much road as is being operated. I think that road should have a first-class superintendent. I send with this copy of B. S. Manufacturing Company letter in relation to curtains for sleeping-car.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 9.)

NEW YORK, April 7, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Your three letters of April 27 and one of 28, Nos. 23, 24, 25, and 26, are received. I read your letter No. 25 where it refers to matters here with much satisfaction, as it shows that you understand the whole situation between P. M., O. and O. and U. P. and C. P. Any one fully understanding the position of the different companies would see at a glance that the C. P. is not entirely master of the situation, but I am very well satisfied that if we hold steadily to our purposes and not strain our credit too much we shall finally beat all the wild speculators like Jones and Gould. If I mistake not Jones is a small gun compared with Gould. I have set matters to work in the South that I think will switch most of the South off from Tom Scott's Texas and Pacific bill. I am having articles written and set afloat in the papers here about O. and O. Co., and they make the rounds by being recopied, and as it costs nothing, it is a cheap way of advertising. I am also having articles written and published as though written in the places where we buy cars and locomotives, &c., for the S. P. It gives the S. P. some notoriety without cost. I notice what you say of C. P. stock. If you will read my letters to Stanford, Nos. 510, 521, 529, and some others that I do not recollect numbers of, you will have my views. I am often asked by my associates in California about my views in the matters that I have written to the others of, and allow me to say that all letters that I number consecutively I have supposed would be read by all, and then go into the basket together. As to more fifty-pound steel or iron rails, I must say that at the present outlook it seems to me that we have as many contracted for as it is safe to have when we include the cost of buying them.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, May 8, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of 29th April, No. 28, was received. I send with this receipted bill of the six coaches bought of Gilbert, Brush & Co. All the material that I buy here is paid for by the Central Pacific. Some of it, like these coaches, I know are for the S. P., but just whether they are to be charged to the S. P. or the Western Development Company I do not know. Then some other things—say rails—I do not know whether they will go on to the S. P. or not, and you will see the necessity of watching the material as it arrives out, and see that it is charged to the proper company, and when material is ordered if you would let me know to or for what company I would then see that it was charged here to the proper party.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, May 28, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of the 20th is received, with newspaper clippings. I do not think Booth made many votes by his Grand Hotel speech. The governor said—Governor S.—some good things to the Chronicle interviewer; but I think it unfortunate that he should so closely connect the C. P. with the S. P., as that is the only weapon our enemies have to fight us with in Congress.

NEW YORK, September 15, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Scott is stirring up the South on his Texas Pacific. Parties are sending me papers every day—some for him, some against him. I have written three letters to-day to different parties in the South on T. P. R. R. matters. I think it is of much importance that we have some rights in Arizona, and if you could get them I think you should do so at once. You know my views, and I had a long talk with Gage on the matter, and if we could get two franchises to run through the State I think we should do so at once. We should not be known in it, but should be sure that we have the control, in black and white, before they become a law. I will write again in a few days. Somehow I have not got my ideas in line yet.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, September 18, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Scott is doing all that he possibly can to help him in the passage of his Texas Pacific bill through the next Congress. Scott gets parties to write letters and has them published in the Southern papers. I send one with this as sample. This, as you will see, was written by G. T. Beauregard to Senator Gordon, of Atlanta, Ga. He is making the old fight over again—that it is the Central Pacific that is fighting him in this, and that they (the C. P.) do not intend to let the South have a road if they can help it. Our people in California made a great mistake when they undone what we done last winter to separate these two interests. But I see no way to help it, so we must make the fight under this disadvantage. Simonton has lost much here in his fight against Ralston, and I should not be surprised if he lost his position with the Associated Press.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

P. S.—Of course I hold that Colton and his friends hold the S. P. Co.

(No. 14.)

NEW YORK, September 27, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of the 18th, with inclosure, as stated, is received. You must be very busy with all of your associates out of the city. I notice by McCarthy's letter to Mr. Crocker that the people of San Diego will join with us if he will agree to build east from their city, and I am inclined to think we had better do that, as that would strengthen Wigginton very much to have his people ask him to fight for a bill as we want it. Scott is making the strongest possible effort to pass his bill the coming session of Congress. He gets every little gathering in the South to pass resolutions favoring the Texas Pacific bill, then those that the Texas Pacific owes, [their] name is legion, and of course they are all for it; then he is promising a connection with all the broken-down roads in the South, with a promise of money to help them all if his bill passes, and by some kind of a turn he is settling up with all those that hold him personally, and that is to help him, as it makes his promises worth something with the broken-down fellows that he is agreeing to help. If we had a franchise to build a road or two roads through Arizona (we controlling, but having it in the name of another party), then have some party in Washington to make a local fight and asking for the guarantee of their bonds by the United States, and if that could not be obtained, offering to build the road without any aid, it could be used against Scott in such a way that I do not believe any politician would dare vote for it.

Can not you have Safford call the Legislature together and grant such charters as we want at a cost of say $25,000. If we could get such a charter as I spoke to you of it would be worth much money to us. If there is anything done it must be done quickly. I am very sorry that Sargent is feeling so hard toward us, but I shall endeavor to see him before Congress meets. I have bought the tunnel bolts at three and a half currency instead of nine cents gold, as was being paid by Mr. Crocker when I was in California. I think money is too cheap with you all in California, and that we can be beat in building railroads by those that place more value on a dollar than we do, and I think when any one of us goes to the front in a car that weighs say twenty tons, it adds to the cost of every mile of road that we build thereafter more than $100 per mile. I wish you would let me know who ordered the officers' car that is now running on the S. P. Please let me know what the new transfer-boat cost.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, October 4, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of the 23d and 25th of September, Nos. 68 and 69, are received. I expect to go to Washington next week and I will look into the matter of which you write. That matter of directors has been talked of by the U. P. people and others for some years, and I should not be surprised if the Texas Pacific (Tom Scott's) should annoy us in that way if he could. Sam. Morton was just in, and says that he obtained a judgment a few days since against Frémont's old road that was consolidated with the Texas Pacific for $23,000, and that there is other claims against it that Tom Scott promised to pay; and Morton says he has applied for a receiver, and is sure to get it in less than ten days if Scott does not pay him his money. I hear something every day of what Scott is doing in the South for his Texas Pacific. I can not believe that he will get through; but one of our weak points will be having no rights in Arizona under which we can build roads. I am glad to hear that you are getting our finances in a better condition than they have been, and hope with you that you will pay our old friend Cohen what we owe him. Nothing new here. Our matters moving about as usual.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, October 9, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: * * * It seems to me that we can as well protect the Central by carrying the Mohave branch of the S. P. out 700 or 800 miles from San Francisco as though we went to Salt Lake, and if we have to build as far east as Salt Lake, it should be on some line farther south, where we could connect with something more agreeable than the U. P. I think it very important that we have two franchises to run from the Colorado River through Arizona to the east line of the Territory. Such ones as those I spoke to you of would be very valuable to us. I suppose they would cost less to have other parties than ourselves stand at the front while they are being obtained; that is, if they should be free from taxation and interference with the fares and freight rates. But then after the charters were obtained I think they would serve us best to have it known that they were controlled by the S. P. I am endeavoring to get a combination of interests to build a road from New Orleans to El Paso. I had one party in to-day largely interested in a road on that line running west from New Orleans into Texas (it was El Van Hoffman), and he asked me what right we had to build roads in Arizona. I told him I did not know, but I had no doubt we could get the right if we had not got it. Please let me know how you would build in the Territory at this time if you wished to do so. I received a letter to-day from Washington. It stated that Scott was there a few days ago and talked very loud about Texas P. That he should surely pass his bill the coming session of Congress.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, October 18, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: * * * In your interesting letter of the 5th you mention San Diego matters. Now, it is well to switch that people from the Texas Pacific road; but I would suggest that you keep on asking them what they will do, but not make them any definite proposition, for if you do it will be sent East at once, and I am working with the South and saying to them (and getting some good articles published) that our interest lays with them; that what San Francisco and California wants is a direct connection with New Orleans and other Gulf ports, and that our interest lays that way, and we oppose the Texas Pacific because we think if it is built it will prevent for many years our getting such a connection, and I have not had any talk with the Atlantic and Pacific for the above reasons. You are mistaken about the directors' car on the S. P. It was built before I was president, and was on the road before I knew anything about it. I was making no particular objection to it, but I thought I would kind of like to know how it came on the road. I am glad to learn, as I do by yours of the 7th, that you are settling for east-bound business in California with P. M. S. S. Co., for they are the —— to do anything with here. As to Oregon matters, we had best keep them with us as long as we can, and I have sometimes thought it would be well to tell them what we would do, as the N. P. people are again in the field, but they will not be likely to hurt any one for some time, unless some fellow should lend them some money; then that fellow no doubt would get hurt.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

NEW YORK, November 10, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of October 23, 1875, No. 85, is before me. Dr. Gwin is also here. I think the doctor can do us some good if he can work under cover, but if he is to come to the surface as our man, I think it would be better that he should not come, as he is very obnoxious to very many on the Republican side of the House, and then there is so many things about our business that he does not know, and he has not the time to learn it before Congress comes and goes. It was very unfortunate that he came over in directors' car with Mr. Crocker. I received a letter to-day from a party in Massachusetts that said that Gorham and Sargent were very much offended because Gwin was, or rather had, come over to look after our interest in Washington. I am, however, disposed to think that Gwin can do us some good, but not as our agent, but as an anti-subsidy Democrat, and also as a Southern man with much influence in the South in showing the Southern people that the Texas and Pacific R. R. is in no way a Southern Pacific road, but a road, if built by the Government, would prevent the Southern States from having a road to the Pacific for many years. But Gwin must not be known as our man. * * *

Yours, etc.,

C. P. H.

(No. 19.)

NEW YORK, November 13, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Your dispatch that you had sent $200,000 gold is received. Dr. Gwin left for the South yesterday. I think he can do us considerable good if he sticks for hard money and anti-subsidy schemes, but if it was understood by the public that he was here in our interest it would no doubt hurt us. When he left I told him he must not write to me, but when he wanted I should know his whereabouts, etc., to write to R. T. Colburn, of Elizabeth, N. J. I have had several interviews with the Houston and Texas Central Railroad people. This road is built from Galveston to Austin, and is the only live road in Texas. It has a land grant to the west line of the State (Texas) of 4,769,280 acres. It is owned by William E. Dodge, Moses Taylor, W. M. Rice, and other strong men of this city. I saw Dodge a few days since with the view of having them build to El Paso, and we build to that point to meet them. He said he thought they would do it. He said he was opposed to the Government granting any aid to his or any other road. D. has been sick ever since I saw him, so I went to-day and saw Moses Taylor. He said he liked the idea, and that he would talk it up with his people, etc. There will be no Government aid granted this session, and if we can get the H. and T. Central to stand in with us and offer to build a line through, we build to El Paso from the west and they from the east, I think Scott's fish will be cooked. Budd is doing good work in the Gulf States. Has the 70 shares of glass stock been got in? How are you progressing with the machine-shop grounds? I borrowed yesterday $100,000 easy for 4, 5, and 6 months at 7 per cent. No commission. I think I shall take up some twelve-months' paper at 12 per cent.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 20.)

NEW YORK, November 23, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of the 13th, No. 95, is received, and I am glad that you see your way clear to send me $1,500,000 for interest before the 1st of January, as our payments are very large in December, and this fight with the Texas Pacific will hurt us to the utmost that they can in the way of all kinds of false reports. They of course will have some friends in Congress. They will offer resolutions to investigate us, stating that we have forfeited our charter, etc. I was told a few days ago that Scott said he would make us let go of his Texas Pacific. The South are getting very much in earnest in their opposition to Scott's project. I get papers from the South almost every day pitching into him. I have not heard from Gwin since he left.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 21.)

NEW YORK, November 24, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Your dispatch of the 22d, advising of the sending of another $100,000 in gold, is received. Colonel Morton, whom you no doubt will recollect, was in the office to-day, and said he had had a long conference with Bond, V. P. of the Texas Pacific road, and Morton said some one asked him to find out what I wanted. I said to M. that I did not think the S. P. had any proposition to make; that if the Texas P. had any to make it would be considered, but it was my opinion that no subsidy bill could pass Congress this session if all the railroads in the country were working for it. I think we shall hear from them again. Do we want to help the bill, even if we were allowed to go to El Paso by the act, if it should pass? Crocker was in the office to-day, and I spoke to him about the S. P. sending me a special power of attorney to act for the S. P. before Congress, and make any proposition to build the S. P. to meet railroads on this side, &c. Mr. C. said he would attend to it, but I write this to remind him, as he took no memorandum. I want you to make such a proposition as I wrote to you for some days since. I am getting the South well waked up on Scott's Southern, Northern project.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 22.)

NEW YORK, December 16, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Your two letters of the 6th, Nos. 109 and 110, are received, with inclosures. I have looked over the two bills that you sent. They are very well, but I do not think that we shall be able to pass either of them, and I am no ways clear that we want to pass the A. and P. amendment if we could, as it would add so much to the work to be done by the S. P. that I think it would prevent our selling a S. P. bond longer than we could afford to wait. I have been trying to amend the Texas Pacific act so as to allow the officers of the S. P. to take an interest in the construction co. that would be likely to build the road, as was thought best to have some of the officers of the railroad co. that were financially strong take an interest in the building co.; and I recollect that it was at one time thought there could not be outsiders found that would take all the stock of the construction co. I shall do what I can to get the Texas Pacific act amended so as to allow the S. P. to build east of the Colorado River: but I much doubt being able to do anything, for if Scott can not pass his Texas Pacific bill he can do much to hinder us from passing ours. Then the A. and P. will oppose it with what power they have. Then, of course, the U. P. will oppose under cover, if not otherwise; at least I know we should if we were in their place. Then the politicians would naturally be against it, as they would think it would do them good to prevent this grant going to the S. P., as if not it would be likely to come back to the people. I shall do what I can, but you had better make your calculations to build the road east of the Colorado River on what you can get out of the Territories and the road itself.

If you expect to get anything in Arizona and New Mexico, I would suggest that you do not do as we did in Utah—wait until the enemy was in possession. Of course you notice the vote of the House yesterday on subsidies—223 against and 33 for. I was just told that Scott said after the vote that it was no indication that he would not pass his Texas Pacific bill. I have received several letters from Texas in the last few days. They would like to work with the S. P., but are fearful of the Texas P., as I have taken the ground that there would be no Government money aid granted and the United States has no land in Texas, and as the Legislature does not meet in Texas until March, so they can get nothing from the State this winter, hence they are all disposed to fight shy for the present; but I think when the Texas Legislature meets the Texas Central Railroad Co. will ask $10,000 per mile of the State from Austin to El Paso, and they have a land grant of nearly 5,000,000 acres.

I have been thinking that it possibly would be well for the S. P. to ask direct of Texas say $10,000 per mile from Austin to El Paso, and there is a very important land grant from Texas to the Austin and Pacific Railroad Co. I am told that this grants sixteen sections per mile from Austin to El Paso, and they have three years from next May to build the first twenty-five miles. What do you all think of it? I have just bought $40,000 Central paper that had about three months to run at 10 per cent.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 23.)

NEW YORK, December 22, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Your letters of the 11th inst., Nos. 111 and 112, are received; also, your dispatch that you would send $125,000 in gold. You need send more gold for the January interest. I notice the progress on the tunnels; they go slow. I hope the work on that next to the longest one in the Tehichipi will be pushed. I am glad to notice that you are thinking of commencing it soon. What is the exact length of the San Fernando tunnel? I think the doctor will return to California in January. I have just returned from Washington. The doctor (Gwin) was unfortunate about the Railroad Committee; that is, there was not a man put on the committee that was on his list, and I must say I was deceived; and he was often with Kerr, and K. was at his rooms and spent nearly one evening. The committee is not necessarily a Texas Pacific, but it is a commercial committee, and I have not much fear but that they can be convinced that ours is the right bill for the country. If things could have been left as we fixed them last winter there would have been little difficulty in defeating Scott's bill; but their only argument is, it is controlled by the Central. That does not amount to much beyond this: It allows members to vote for Scott's bill for one reason and give the other—that it was to break up a great monopoly, &c. If these —— interviewers would keep out of the way it would be much easier traveling. I send a few clippings.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 24.)

NEW YORK, December 17, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: I expect to have a bill ready early next week so amending the Texas Pacific act as to allow the S. P. to build east of the Colorado River; or, rather, will have some changes made in the bill you sent over. The vote in the House the other day will do much good in helping Speaker Kerr in making up the railroad and land committees in such a way that they will not be likely to report in favor of any subsidies. Of course the South were not all for Scott's bill before we commenced working there; but we have done good work, and I am getting Southern papers every day from the line of his travels that speak right out against the Texas Pacific. See clippings inclosed. The Railroad Gazette, in publishing the proceedings of the Saint Louis convention, made some mistakes which I have endeavored to correct, as you will notice by copy of letters sent to you. Nearly all the papers here have taken favorable notice of it. I send slips from World and Tribune. The editor's article in the Railroad Gazette I did not see until after its publication. I have looked over Governor Irwin's message; it seems to be well enough, although not just such a one on railroad matters as I expected.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 25.)

NEW YORK, March 4, 1876.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of Feb. 24, No. 142, is received. I have been in Washington most of the time since Congress met, and you say truly when you write that you think I have had a rough fight here this winter. The Railroad Committee of the House was set up for Scott, and it has been a very difficult matter to switch a majority of the committee away from him, but I think it has been done; but Scott is very able, and then he promises everything to everybody, which helps him for the day and in this fight, and just what he may yet do I can not say. * * * And I think it of so much importance that he is not allowed to build a road parallel to ours with Government aid that I shall endeavor to get our bill passed through the Senate this winter, if possible (and the House, too). If we only get it through the Senate, and could then get built some road in Arizona before Congress comes together next winter, I think there would be but little doubt we would win the fight. What do you all think of it? * * *

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 26.)

NEW YORK, March 22, 1876.

FRIEND COLTON: * * * I am having a very lively fight in Washington, but things do not look bad.

Scott is making a very dirty fight, and I shall try very hard to pay him off, and if I do not live to see the grass growing over him I shall be mistaken.

I am doing all I can to demoralize Scott in Texas. He has got to have legislation in that State to extend time on his land grant or else it is lost to him.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 27.)

NEW YORK, May 12, 1876.

FRIEND COLTON: Your letters of April 29th and May 2d and 4th, Nos. 155, 156, and 157, are received, with inclosures as therein stated. I am very glad to learn that you are able to be out again. Bad time for any of the S. P. party to be sick, as we have fight enough to go around and give each one all he cares for, that is if his wants in that line are anyways reasonable. I sent Hopkins an article yesterday cut from the Commercial Advertiser; to-day I met one of the editors, Norcutt; he told me Scott paid for having it published; that he would not have let it gone into the paper if it had been left to him, &c. With this I send slip from to-day's Times. Just what is to come out of this fight I can not say, but I expect to live to see the grass growing over these fellows; but in the mean time we shall be hurt some. I have just learned that the slip from the Times (or the matter contained therein) has gone to Europe by cable. Scott is spending money to get these things sent out, and the fight will go on for some time, or at least so long as he thinks by so doing he can make us get out of the way of his Texas and P. swindle, which I do not propose to do. See correspondence with Judge Bell, of Texas. I wish you would write on paper that would allow of my filing your letters. From the memorandum sent of the work done and to be done on the Tehichipi tunnels it would seem as though the rails ought to be laid to the summit by July 1st. This evening's papers have just come in, and they have a long article about the petition presented to-day by A. A. Sargent, calling for a committee to investigate C. P. C. and F., &c.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 28.)

NEW YORK, May 28, 1875.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of the 20th is received, with N. P. clippings. I do not think Booth made many votes by his Grand Hotel speech. The governor said—Governor S.—some good things to the Chronicle interviewer; but I think it unfortunate that he should so closely connect the C. P. with the S. P., as that is the only weapon our enemies have to fight us with in Congress. * * *

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 29.)

NEW YORK, November 15, 1876.

FRIEND COLTON: I had a meeting in Philadelphia last night with Tom Scott. We meet again here to-morrow. I do not have my own way altogether, but I think that we can agree upon some bill that we can all work for. We shall have to prorate on through business more than I would like. And I think there should be a bridge company organized (that we are not known in) to build over the Colorado River at, say, Arrowsbury or any other point on the river, then build at the point where the railroad crosses, under contract with the railroad company. In this way we could tax the through business on this line if we so desired. * * *

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 30.)

NEW YORK, December 4, 1876.

FRIEND COLTON: * * * I send copy of the bill, although not altogether agreed to yet. You will notice it allows of a bridge outside of the railroad corporation at the Colorado River; or, as you will see, the road from the west goes to the river and starts from the river to go east; but there must be nothing said about this bridge. If there should be it will kill it, and it is possible we may need this bridge outside the railroad company. * * *

Yours, &c.

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

A BLACK-MAIL BRIDGE.

NEW YORK, December 7, 1876.

FRIEND COLTON: Your letters, Nov. 28 and 29, Nos. 7, 8, and 9, have just come to hand. As to the bridge over the Colorado River, it is a matter that I care nothing about, if you do not. But in fixing up the S. P. and T. and P. matter it occurred to me that we should have to prorate with the T and P. As the S. P. would be over mountains and through a country where water and fuel will be expensive, it occurred to me that a bridge with an arbitrary [control] would be well, to help us to get what we really ought to have, and protect our interests generally. As I said before, if you don't want it I don't. * * *

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 31.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 20, 1876.

FRIEND COLTON: I am having the roughest fight with Scott that I have ever had, but I hope to drive him into something that we can accept. I should not have much trouble if matters could have been left as we fixed them when you were here, but since some of our people has convinced the public that the S. P. is being built by the C. P. and they have raised the cry of monopoly against us, it makes it very hard for us; but such is life. You must send us considerable money by the 1st of January to pay interest; my being away from New York so much of late has prevented me from making loans there, as money has been hard to get, and Fogg has not been able to renew our paper only to a very limited extent, and we shall have to pay this month, with what we have paid, say $1,800,000. Then, in January, say interest $12,000 and bills payable $800,000. You must put off your bills and pay-rolls there for two or three months if it is necessary. You had better have it telegraphed as often as you can how you are pushing on the road toward Fort Yuma.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 32.)

SCOTT AND THE LOBBY.

NEW YORK, October 3, 1877.

FRIEND COLTON: Herewith I send memorandum of bills payable and transactions in September. You will notice the amount to be paid this month is very large, and just how much of it can be borrowed here is uncertain, but much of it, I hope; but a portion will have to come from the earnings of the road in California.

Your letters, Nos. 12, 13, and 14, are received. I shall go to Washington to-morrow night to see about the Colorado bridge. I think it can be fixed, but Scott is doing his very best. There has been, I think, more work done since Congress adjourned for the T. and P. than was ever done before for any interest in the whole history of this country, but if we spend as much money in laying rails east of the Colorado as he spends on his Washington lobby, we shall, in my opinion, surely beat him. I shall do all I can here, but I do not feel as well as I wished I did, and somehow dread the coming fight.

I will endeavor to write you again to-morrow.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 33.)

NEW YORK, March 20, 1877.

FRIEND COLTON: Your letters of March 7th and 9th, Nos. 33 and 34, are received. I notice what you write in your No. 33 relating to the C. P. sending goods via Chicago. Now, I have no interest as to the route over which this business travels, except it takes the route that will best advance the whole interest of the C. P., which it seemed to me would be best done by our sending a part via Saint Louis and a portion via Chicago. There is considerable complaint, which shows itself in Washington, because all the business goes through Chicago and none via Saint Louis and Cincinnati, and so we have the same amount for the C. P. It would seem best we divide this business. And as to the time that is made on the Northern line, I think you would have no trouble in getting the Southern lines to agree to take it via New Orleans that is now taken, and they certainly would have no trouble in filling the contract as to the time.

Scott is at work, and I think is doing more than ever before, preparing to put his Texas Pacific through next winter, and possibly at the extra session, if there is one. I have little or no fears of his doing anything at the extra session, but if he can convince Congress that the S. P. is controlled by the C. P. (and I think with what aid he can get from my associates in California) I believe he can pass his bill to build on the direct line between Fort Yuma and San Diego, and I think I know enough of Washington to know how he can do it.

I have just received telegram from Crocker in relation to daily mails east of Yuma, but of that I will write him.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 34.)

NEW YORK, May 17, 1877.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of the 9th, No. 48, is received. What you say about our stopping at Fort Yuma is well, and would be almost conclusive if the S. P. was not owned and controlled by the C. P.; but when we tell Congress we are willing to build this road the answer is always the same. Of course you are to protect the Central, but what the country wants is a competing road. Now, many members of Congress believe all this stuff, and others talk it for reasons that I need not mention here, but if they are not convinced, think the open highway will satisfy their constituents that they were working for the good of the whole country. When the Texas and P. Co. were asking aid to go through the San Gorgonio Pass one argument was: We have built a road there with our own money. Will Congress furnish the means for Colonel Scott to go on and destroy property that we have in good faith located? No one would do that. But their proposition now is to build direct to San Diego under the cry of an open highway for the people. I do not believe they can get the aid from the Government necessary to do it, but they will not be prevented from doing it because the Central Pacific will do it without aid, but because the country is so generally committed against any subsidy, or because there is some interest fairly invested that would be destroyed by the building the open highway.

We certainly are not prepared to build east of the Colorado River this season. If I have a clear view of what I think ought to be done I will write you.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 35.)

NEW YORK, October 5, 1877.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours, No. 15, is received. I notice your remarks on our matters in California. I have no doubt there is many things to annoy you. The dispatches about crossing the Colorado come over very well. I think Gould has had as much to do with stopping us on the bridge as Scott has, although I have had no reason for so thinking up to this morning (see clip from Tribune) except Jim Wilson, of Iowa, is their man and has much influence with McCrary, Secretary of War. Wilson was in Washington when the first order went out to stop work on the bridge, and Gould came in twice and Dillon once to tell me that the Secretary of the Interior had his war paint on, and was to attack us in his message, &c. I thought at the time they were trying to cover up something and rather supposed it was to check us on the S. P.

I met George M. Pullman last night. He told me that he met General Dodge a few days since, and that D. told him that Gould said to him (D.) that he would build as fast from Salt Lake west as we built east of the Colorado. I am disposed to think that you in California have never fully realized how much of a menace to the U. P. was the building of the S. P. east from Yuma, and I am satisfied that we want to so fix the S. P. that the U. P. interest will be just as safe as the C. P. Just how to do it is not so clear, but I am inclined to think we shall have to give the U. P. a one-half interest in all the road east of Yuma, or, say, ten twenty-seconds of the whole road, and the latter I think they would not care to do and give us what the stock has fairly cost us, which, you will recollect, as near as we could get at it, was 20 per cent.; but this is an important matter and has got to be met, as those great interests are only valuable so long as they can be worked in harmony. Talk this matter over and let me have your views.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

THE PRESIDENT CROSS.

No. 361.] NEW YORK, October 10, 1877.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours of September 28th is received, and its contents carefully noted. I shall do all I can, but it is very difficult to keep any money; but I shall do all I can.

I went to Washington night before last and returned last night. I think I have the bridge question settled for the present. I found it harder to do than I expected. The Secretary of War told me that they had had it up in two Cabinet meetings, and had concluded not to do anything, as Congress would come together next week; but I got him out of that idea in about twenty minutes. I then saw three others of the Cabinet; then I went and saw the President. He was a little cross at first; said we had defied the Government, &c.; but I soon got him out of that belief. I said to him that we were very much in earnest about building the S. P. I said to him that I had written out after we were given the right to go on and complete the bridge, after being once stopped, that they (you) had better push the work night and day, as we had been stopped once without any reason known to us, and that we might be again, and that I guessed the boys very likely quit work and went to supper, and the military quit at the same time and got their supper and went to bed, supposing the workmen would do the same, but instead of going to bed went back and laid the track across the bridge, so as to be sure and have it so trains would cross before they received any order to quit. The President laughed heartily at that, and said he guessed we meant business. He then said, "What do you propose to do if we let you run over the bridge?" I said, "Push the road right on through Arizona." He said, "Will you do that? If you will, that will suit me first-rate."

Now, I think you had better spend a little money building east from Yuma and have it telegraphed over as often as you can; it will do us much good here.

I would like to hear now and then how the Ione coal is being used.

I have telegraphed to Crocker to have it understood there that the draw was closed by pressure from the people of Arizona, and not saying we had anything to do with it.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

HAYES'S FALSE REPORT DECLINED.

NEW YORK, October 15, 1877.

FRIEND COLTON: * * * Very likely such a report as Mr. H. would give us would be worth the price he asks; but as the crops are short this year in California, and as what we might call an off-year with us, I am disposed to think we had better let it pass for this year.

I do not think General Sherman telegraphed to any one on this side about the bridge at Yuma.

General McDowell wrote to the Secretary of War recommending that the bridge be put back just as it was when orders were given us to stop. I wish you would get a strong letter from General Sherman that the bridge is in the right place, harms no one, but is of very great benefit to the military, as well as all the interests in Arizona and Northern Mexico, &c. We may need it; as I think it very likely Scott may try to get a resolution through Congress to stop our building in Arizona, and perhaps to stop our crossing the bridge. I send with this a clip from to-day's Times. It will not hurt us, although you will notice it has its hit at us.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

(No. 37.)

NEW YORK, June 3, 1878.

FRIEND COLTON: Yours (Nos. 89 and 90) are received. As to rails to lay twenty-two miles on west side of Sacramento River, I wrote Stanford a few days since. Could not get rails. I notice what you say about sale of land on account of Central Pacific; also, about building any more road.

I quite agree with you in the main; but all the reasons that ever existed why we should build east of Yuma now exist. Only the one reason why we should not, viz, not got the money, prevents me from urging the extension of that line. I put (something?) in the omnibus bill to kill the T. and P., and I think it will do it. I have received three telegrams to come to Washington to-night. I go.

Yours, truly,

C. P. HUNTINGTON.

These letters tell the story plainly of the hostile position of the Southern Pacific toward the Texas Pacific during all these years, and that it neither had nor claimed any rights east of Yuma. But its grasping character was exhibited at the first opportunity. Having resolved to build east, at Yuma only one desirable location for a bridge over the Colorado was found. This the Southern Pacific desired to appropriate, anticipating, what afterward occurred, that the Texas Pacific would attempt precisely the same thing.

This point was in the military reservation, and of course could not be legally condemned or appropriated under its right-of-way act, as that did not extend it any rights on military reservations.

In October, 1876, the Texas Pacific applied to the military authorities at Yuma for leave to break ground on the reservation for the crossing of the river. This permission was granted, but in November following it was revoked.

In April, 1877, the Southern Pacific was given permission to lay its track provisionally through a corner of the reservation, and the open contest between these two corporations began.

The details as to this reservation are given in Executive Document 33, second session Forty-fifth Congress in full.

It is enough to state here that the Southern Pacific was successful, under the leave to cross "temporarily a portion of the reservation," in not only building its permanent railroad across it, but in building a permanent railroad, and, through its construction company, a toll bridge over the river, which enables them to do as proposed in letters No. 29, 30, "to tax the through business of the country." This in utter defiance of the War Department, against the positive orders of the Secretary of War.

General McDowell wrote, October 3, 1877: "The post commander was powerless, all the troops having been withdrawn to the field." Nor has it yet ever procured the consent of the Government to occupy this reservation. It has been a continual trespasser to this day.

Failing to procure authority from Congress to build east of Yuma, the Southern Pacific procured charters from the Territorial Legislatures of Arizona and New Mexico to proceed and build through those Territories over the line selected by the Texas Pacific; and on commencing its work under these charters the Texas Pacific invoked the aid of the judiciary. It filed a bill for an injunction and a receiver as to the improvements of the Southern Pacific, and the relief prayed was given; but the Southern Pacific continued its work, paying no attention to the order, and the litigation continued as pending until settled by a decree, entered at the March term, 1882, of the court, not on a judicial investigation, but by agreement of all the parties.

On the question as to the relation of these two companies during all the years the two lines were being constructed, your committee do not find a single act performed by either that was not hostile in its character as to the other.

Again, on the question as to whether the Southern Pacific had either the intention of asking or the hope or expectation of receiving a dollar of aid or an acre of land, we find that in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses, as against the request of Mr. Scott for guarantee to his road, statement after statement and argument after argument was made by the representatives of the Southern Pacific that aid of any character was entirely useless and an unjustifiable expenditure of the public money and property.

It was argued by them that their company was practically demonstrating the non-necessity of governmental aid to the enterprise of building a railroad along the thirty-second parallel by building its own there and without aid, which it neither asked nor desired.

Mr. Huntington, in 1878, wrote:

"If it were once understood that no subsidies would hereafter be granted by Congress, the incomplete gap (between Fort Worth, the western terminus of the Texas Pacific then, and Yuma) would be filled within five years by private capital alone, without asking or committing in any way the national revenues to the work."

Before the Senate committee, in 1878, he said:

"We are ready to construct right along, and willing to provide an outlet to the East for ourselves without cost to the Government."

And again:

"The question before you is whether you will give the Texas Pacific a guarantee of nearly forty millions of bonds for building a road, 200 miles of which is useless and 600 miles of which we offer to build without aid."

Scores of men in Washington to-day recall the earnest statements of Mr. Huntington, made during the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, in opposition to the Texas Pacific, that the Southern Pacific could and would build the road without a dollar of aid or an acre of land if the Texas Pacific was kept out of the way.

In the current daily papers at this date appears a letter from ex-Senator Gordon, explanatory of his course in supporting the Southern Pacific plan of opposing Scott, which your committee deem worth notice. Among other things he says:

"Mr. Scott was asking a guarantee on about fifty millions of bonds. Mr. Huntington, on the other hand, was asking nothing of Congress either by way of indorsement of his bonds or as subsidy in lands. He asked only to be let alone and allowed to build the road on the same general line, and was actually constructing it without any Government aid. * * * I opposed the Scott bill and favored the Huntington plan. He declared he could and would build the road without a dollar of Government aid or subsidy. He did it. He declared he would make the eastern terminus of his lines southern ports and only southern ports. He has done it."

Resuming the history of the case: Failing to get the subsidy desired, the affairs of the Texas Pacific remained in statu quo for a time, the Southern Pacific prosecuting the work of building its road vigorously. When Mr. Jay Gould took charge of the Texas Pacific affairs work was rapidly done on the line toward the west in Texas, so that in November, 1881, the Texas Pacific had reached Sierra Blanca, Tex., about 91 miles east of El Paso, and the Southern Pacific fully completed to within a few miles of that point.

On the 26th of November, 1881, an agreement was made between Mr. Huntington and Mr. Gould, representing the two corporations, of which this is an abstract:

It is made between C. P. Huntington on one side, representing the Southern Pacific, and the Galveston, Harrisburg and San Antonio roads and their connections eastward as far as New Orleans, and Jay Gould on the other side, representing the Texas and Pacific, including its New Orleans connection, the Iron Mountain, the International, Missouri, Kansas and Texas, and Missouri Pacific Companies. It provides that the tracks of the two systems shall be joined when they meet 100 miles or thereabouts east of El Paso, and both parties are to use the portion between the junction and El Paso on equal terms, the Texas and Pacific reserving the right to run its own trains into El Paso on paying half cost of maintenance, taxes, and interest on half cost of construction, $10,000 per mile. Through business is to be done on a pro rata basis by both companies, and this stands all the way to San Diego, Los Angeles, and San Francisco, although the franchise of the Texas and Pacific was by its charter limited to San Diego; and rates are to be as low between competitive points as by any other transcontinental routes. No discrimination is to be made by the Gould roads for or against any of the termini on the Mississippi or Gulf, either as to rates, time, or otherwise, or among the railroad lines eastward thereof, but east-bound unconsigned business for points reached by them in Northern Texas, Arkansas, and Missouri is to be delivered to them at El Paso or the junction, as the case may be.

The agreement does not prevent or interfere with the completion of the Huntington road through Texas via San Antonio and Houston, but provides that after its completion the New Orleans and seaboard business thereof shall be divided equally between the two lines and their connection, the Huntington road from Houston to New Orleans being accorded the privilege of using 100 miles of the Texas and Pacific nearest to New Orleans when necessary on the above terms. The two systems of roads intersect and cross each other at Houston, and between this point and Galveston they use the Galveston road, running through trains if necessary. The through business to and from El Paso and the Pacific will be divided on the basis of one-third to the Texas and Pacific and its connections, and two-thirds to the line via San Antonio, that being the shortest line.

In consideration for the privileges of using jointly the road into El Paso, and of a perpetual privilege in Los Angeles and San Francisco, as well as San Diego equal to the most favored, the Texas and Pacific has relinquished its claim to the land grant, right of way, and franchises west of El Paso to the Southern Pacific Companies. The Texas and Pacific engages not to extend its road west of El Paso so long as the covenants with the Southern Pacific are observed, and the Southern Pacific agrees not to parallel the Texas and Pacific east of El Paso or either of the roads mentioned, in Texas Arkansas, or Missouri. The usual provision is made for arbitration between any of the parties for the settlement of disputes, and the respective superintendents are to carry out the details of the arrangements as to the interchange of traffic and the rates of compensation.

The Texas Pacific relinquishes and will convey to the Southern Pacific its claim to this land grant, right of way, and franchises west of El Paso.

Pursuant to this contract a deed was executed by the Texas Pacific on January 18, 1882, to the Southern Pacific, purporting to convey all the grantor had or could take west of El Paso; and in March, 1882, in the district court of the third judicial district of New Mexico, the bill of the Texas Pacific, filed and pending to prevent the Southern Pacific from building within the land grant to the Texas Pacific, was amended so as to make the Central Pacific a party to the litigation; and by agreement of all the parties a decree was entered on stipulation validating the agreement of November, 1881, and the deed of January 18, 1882, and especially that the road named in the decree shall be operated in perpetuity as a single continuous line.

Another important fact is that the Central Pacific Railroad Company now controls and operates all these roads from El Paso west, under leases from the nominal corporations owning them; it paying for the Southern Pacific of California $250 per mile per month; for the Southern Pacific of Arizona $135 per mile per month and taxes; for the Southern Pacific of New Mexico, the same rent; for the bridges over the Colorado and Rio Grande, $1,000 per month each; and for the Los Angeles and San Diego, $100 per mile per month and taxes. These rents and all operating expenses of the line are included in the expense account of the Central Pacific.

From the foregoing facts, none of which were disputed, even before your committee, we draw these conclusions, namely:

That the Southern Pacific was a hostile enterprise to the Texas Pacific until all its road had been constructed to Sierra Blanca, Tex., and until the contract of November, 1881, was consummated.

That it shrank from nothing that tended to defeat the work the Texas Pacific was engaged in, namely, the construction of a competing through line of railroad to the Pacific Ocean.

That while the Southern Pacific was nominally an independent corporation, it was in fact practically the Central Pacific.

That the Southern Pacific was built with the money of the Central Pacific outside of the securities based upon it, and is operated and controlled by it.

That so far as Congress is concerned the Southern Pacific never had any rights east of Yuma upon which it could base a claim against the Government, either legal or equitable.

That the Southern Pacific built its road expressly without the intention, expectation, or hope of receiving a dollar of aid or an acre of land therefor from the Government.

That by its action it aided in defeating the building of the road contemplated by Congress.

That no attention has ever been paid by it toward making San Diego a terminal point, but, on the contrary, so far as either of these companies is concerned, there is not a railroad within upward of one hundred miles of that place.

That, as suggested in letter No. 29 above, in order "to tax the through business on the line," two bridge companies have been organized, one owning the bridge over the Rio Grande and the other the bridge over the Colorado.

That, in connection with the facts in this report presented, common notoriety shows that the transcontinental transportation question now stands in this condition:

The next route north of this, the Atlantic and Pacific, is controlled by the Central Pacific west of the Colorado and by Mr. Gould east of it.

The Central Pacific and the Union Pacific, with Mr. Gould's connections east of Omaha, control the middle route.

By subsidizing the Pacific Mail the Central Pacific keeps the water route under control.

The Northern Pacific is not only in a "pool" with the Central, but an agreement has been made between them whereby the territory of the great Northwest has been divided between them as to transportation, as though ownership of the country followed building of railroads into it, subject to which practical assertion of ownership the transportation of freight for the entire Pacific coast is under the control of the few men who adopt as their rule for charges "all the traffic will bear," and who have introduced for the first time in the history of common carriage, and in the only place in the civilized world, the practice of "special contracts," whereby a citizen of the Republic, to avail himself of the necessary benefits of the improved methods of transportation by steam and rail equally with those these men choose to favor with reasonable rates of charges, must contract that he will not deal in the property freighted with any but those having like contracts with himself, and giving the managers of these corporations the right of espionage over their books and papers to ascertain the details of their business and whether such contract has been violated.

These are the men who ask, on grounds of equity, that this vast grant of land, an empire in area, and estimated by themselves at forty millions of dollars in value, shall be given them.

Your committee has had no difficulty in disposing of the claim on the basis of the "equity."

Nor have we been perplexed in solving the question as to the legal right of the Southern Pacific to this grant.

As has been stated, we have had the benefit of legal argument by some of the most eminent counsel in the land, and the claim by this company to the grant on legal grounds may be stated in this way:

"By the act making the grant the title to the land passed to the Texas Pacific—the act was a grant in præsenti, with a condition subsequent.

"The Texas Pacific, thus being vested with the legal title, although subject to the condition subsequent, which contained, among other things, the building of the road to San Diego and the completing the whole line by May 2, 1882, and that there should be no consolidation with any competing line, yet the legal title was an assignable interest, which could be conveyed, and that by the deed made by the Texas Pacific, January 18, 1882, to the Southern Pacific, it became vested with the legal title to all the land, and because the Congress did not, in making the grant and coupling with it a condition subsequent, in express terms reserve to itself the power to declare the grant forfeited for breach of the condition if it should not be complied with, therefore no right of forfeiture exists, and the hands of Congress are tied, and the Government is powerless to resume the grant by reason of such omission."

In other words, generally stated, the distinguished counsel for the company declares that in law the power to declare a forfeiture of a grant made on condition subsequent for breach of the condition must be reserved to the grantor by express terms in the act making the grant or it does not exist.

No authority was produced to the committee except the statement of the attorneys asserting this extraordinary doctrine in support of it; but the interests being so great, we have examined the books on the question, and are not able to find a single authority in support of the proposition, and we believe none can be found.

On the contrary, Washburn on Real Property (vol. 2, 3d ed., p. 15) asserts the rule to be—

"Where the condition of a grant is express there is no need of reserving a right of entry for a breach thereof in order to enable the grantor to avail himself of it."

(See also Jackson vs. Allen, 3 Cowan, 220; Gray vs. Blanchard, 8 Pick., 284; Littleton, sec. 331.)

Indeed, all the decided cases we can find, as well as the text-books, are in harmony and to the same effect; so we do not present argument upon it here.

Counsel also urge that, under the law, a forfeiture of a grant is purely a judicial question, one for the courts alone, and that Congress has no power in the matter.

We are of different opinion. It seems perfectly clear to this committee that a declaration of forfeiture is only the act of the grantor, asserting his right to resume the grant, to be exercised at his option, terminating an estate for breach of the condition on which it is granted. The power rests with him; it is at his option whether he will exercise it or not; purely a matter of discretion, with the exercise of which the courts have nothing to do, and until it is exercised there is nothing on which the court can act.

When forfeiture is declared and resumption of ownership asserted by the grantor, then the court may be invoked to declare whether the right existed or whether it had been effectively exercised; but the question of forfeiture is with the grantor, personal or legislative, as the grant is private or public, and the judiciary has no jurisdiction whatever until after the grantor has acted to assert his or its right to declare the forfeiture, and then the grantee may invoke the judiciary.

To us this is too clear to be regarded as debatable or needing elaboration.

But the counsel insisted also that if the committee should declare that the right to declare a forfeiture did exist, then the Southern Pacific had the right to the grant on the ground that it had substantially complied with the requirements of the act as they should have been performed by the Texas Pacific in the building of a road to the Pacific coast; that while the Southern Pacific was practically a volunteer in the prosecution of the work, not having authority from Congress to undertake and prosecute the work, yet having built a railroad along substantially the same line which the Texas Pacific would have followed, and having given the country, by the building and the contract of November, 1881, with the Texas Pacific, a line of railroad to San Francisco, and the Texas Pacific being satisfied, the Government is bound to be, and give them the grant. And in the argument used, the illustration of a reward offered for lost goods, the finder is always a volunteer and entitled to the reward; that it is immaterial to the loser who finds and restores his goods. They evade the question of the necessity of San Diego being made a terminal point, as well as that that city has been avoided and no road located or built to it by them, or in which they are interested.

But waiving the question of full performance, has this last claim a basis in the law?

Before the claimant company can be held to be entitled to this grant it must be found that the conditions of the grant have all been complied with by it or its grantor; that it is the legal "successor and assign" of the Texas and Pacific; and also that such succession is not the result of a combination or consolidation with the Texas and Pacific "by rival or competing through line of railroad to the Pacific Ocean."

Neither of these propositions can be held in favor of the claimant here. The Southern Pacific is not the "successor and assign" of the Texas Pacific. These words have a well-defined significance, and when used in connection with a corporation, sole or aggregate, have invariably been held to be words of limitation, like the word "heirs" in a conveyance to an individual.

The successors of a corporation correspond to the heirs of a natural person. (Burrill's Law Dict., title Successors; Bouvier's Law Dict.; Angell & Ames, Corp., sec. 192; 2 Kernan Rep., 129.)

We confidently assert that not a case can be found (except the Attorney-General's opinion in the N. O., B. R. and V. case) where the words "successors and assigns" are used as applied to a corporation when that body simply succeeds by purchase or contract to a part or all of the assets of another corporation, but not including its franchise or right to exist as a corporate body. No construction is better settled in the law.

The Southern Pacific simply asserts a right under a deed from the Texas Pacific as grantee of what is assumed by both to be part of the assets of the Texas Pacific, but the granting corporation, the Texas Pacific Company, still exists and remains, with all the vitality and activity it ever possessed as an artificial creature, losing none of its identity, although by this contract it attempts to divest itself of part of its powers and a portion of its tangible assets. But the Southern Pacific is simply the vendee or grantee of the Texas Pacific as to the items named; this and nothing more. The Texas Pacific can not so exist and at the same time have an existing "successor."

In a case like this a very clear distinction is to be taken between legally succeeding to a portion of a property of a corporation as vendee or grantee and being the legal "successor" to the corporation itself. Mere privity by contract alone will create the first, but creation or selection by public authority and an entire legal substitution of person is necessary in the latter case. In this case Congress passed the act for the express and avowed purpose of causing the construction of a short and competitive route along the thirty-second parallel from the Mississippi to San Diego Bay. The points which were to be connected as well as the corporation which should perform the work and be the recipient of the bounty of the Government for the performance of the work were all determined by Congress and expressly named.

The position of the transcontinental line, Central and Union Pacific, was well understood by the people and their Representatives in Congress then, and too recent now to require a restatement. Railway communication between the oceans was an absolute necessity, but the extortions and discriminations of the Central and Union Pacific (and apparently beyond the power of their creator to prevent) caused an urgent demand on the part of the people for another and a competitive route across the continent. To provide this the act of 1871, attempted; the terminal points were fixed; the bay of San Diego named as a western terminus of this to-be grand line, and work to be begun simultaneously at either end and rapidly prosecuted. San Francisco was by section 23 to be connected with the new road only; not to be a terminal point, as it now is. The road was contemplated to the ocean at San Diego, with a branch to San Francisco. This is clearly a substantial requirement.

In every section of the act clearly appears the expressed intention that the Texas Pacific Company shall prosecute the work. This company is organized, and for the clearly expressed purpose, as stated; this company may purchase stock of other companies, or may consolidate, but not with any competing line, but all such purchases and consolidations should vest the property in the Texas Pacific Railway Company. This company was to file maps, to build and complete the road and telegraph line, to execute mortgages, &c., and (section 17) the Texas Pacific Company to construct the road within ten years. Nowhere does it appear, even by implication, that any other party, by privity of contract merely, should have any rights in the matter, either to perform the conditions imposed or succeed to any of the privileges conferred.

The Texas Pacific was to be a competitor to the other lines across the continent, as well those projected as completed; and so everything shows that Congress intended that the corporation it created for the purpose, or its legal successors, should perform the duties, afford the facilities, and receive the benefit provided for by this act. It must be kept in mind that the Southern Pacific had no authority, direct or implied, from the United States to do any act east of the Colorado. It was only authorized to connect with the Texas Pacific at or near the Colorado, for the purpose of connecting San Francisco with the new route; there and at that point its power ceased, so far as Congress was concerned. All that it has done since was at its own instance; it was not induced by the land grant to build east of Yuma; the Government did not request it, but did all in its power, in its feeble way and with the small military force at its disposal, to prevent the occupancy of the Yuma reservation and the Colorado River, but unsuccessfully; it pursued its course as a rival road to the one chartered by Congress, and for the purpose, now clearly apparent, of defeating the expressed will of the people for a competing road across the continent, by securing for itself, in connection with the Central Pacific, the entire control of the vast and increasing transcontinental transportation.

The claim of the Southern Pacific to be treated as a successor of the Texas Pacific under the law is based solely on the fact that it has succeeded as a rival to the Texas Pacific in building a road where the Texas Pacific proposed to build one, preventing the Texas Pacific from accomplishing the object of its creation, and in return for a concession of part of the freightage of the future, and an agreement not only to compete, but not to extend lines to the injury of the other, the Texas Pacific assumed to convey what it never had the least right to control, either legally or equitably, and the Southern Pacific asserts a clear right as grantee to what its grantor had not the shadow of a subsisting claim, and as to which it has put beyond itself the power to ever earn or claim. San Diego was named as a terminal point by Congress, and for very obvious reasons.

The Central Pacific reached San Francisco, and the natural depot and entrepôt for the proposed competitive line on the Pacific would be San Diego; not a railroad is within 100 miles of it, except on paper, now, so far as these companies are concerned, and all the benefits conferred by the road taken to San Francisco and made to inure to the benefit of the company it was to compete with. The facts which we state in this report show that the Southern Pacific is in fact the Central Pacific, practically the same directory in both, the former operated under a lease to the latter; all the expenses charged in the account of the Central Pacific. These claims might equally as well be made by the Central Pacific by name as by the Southern Pacific. The same logic that would justify granting this application would compel doing the same act for the Central Pacific if it had performed the acts done nominally by the Southern Pacific.

The difficulty with the reasoning of the counsel for the applicant is, that they assume that all that was contemplated by Congress was that a railroad should be built along the 32d parallel, and that it is absolutely immaterial who or what company builds it, or what the relation or bearing of the builder may be toward the people or the question of transportation, so that the company named in the granting act is satisfied, either by compulsion or purchase; in effect making the latter company the agents of the Government to bestow a gratuity upon the corporation which had defeated not only the company appointed by Congress to do its work, but Congress itself. This is required, and must appear; that the railroad contemplated by the granting act shall be built or procured, and by the designated party or its legal successor, one which stands in its place and stead under the restrictions and provisions of the granting act; and if purchase or consolidation be attempted or effected, that the corporation designated by Congress shall be the major factor in the case: that it shall absorb the others, and be the owner of the "corpus," and not, as in this case, when the process has been reversed. The act provides a grant for "aiding in the construction of the railroad and telegraph line herein provided for," &c., not a railroad constructed by the Central Pacific or the Union Pacific, or the Atlantic and Pacific companies, or either of them, but by a company it created, its successors or assigns, as a competitive line.

Again while counsel waived argument upon the question before us, we submit that the condition in the grant prohibiting consolidation with rival or competing lines has been absolutely violated by the Texas and Pacific in the making of the contract of November, 1881.

Practically and legally, so far as it affects the public or the question of transportation, that contract was one of consolidation, and with a rival, hostile line. It provides for traffic arrangements a pool of receipts, a perpetual user, an absolute community of interest, an agreement not to construct parallel lines, and a surrender of all rights and franchises beyond the connecting point, so far as it was possible for the Texas and Pacific to surrender and convey.

Looking over the whole case, then, we find that Congress organized a particular corporation for an avowed, specific purpose; agreed to give it 15,000,000 of acres of land, if within ten years it should build its road from Marshall, Texas, to San Diego Bay, as provided.

Congress prohibited it from making any arrangements with others which would destroy its own identity or interfere with the proposed or expected results.

Congress provided that in any consolidation it might make, or contracts with regard to property rights, the property acquired, rights secured, or consolidation effected, all should be the property of the Texas and Pacific.

This company has not accomplished a single object for which it was created.

It has never been in a position or condition in which it could perform, or even attempt to perform, substantially one single act required of it.

It never reached a point nearer than 90 miles of where it could earn an acre of ground; it was never in sight of "the promised land."

Failing to do any act it was bound and required to do, it attempted to do every act possible which it was prohibited from doing.

Organized to build across the continent, it solemnly bound itself with its rival and enemy never to attempt to do it. Created to compete with the Central Pacific, it makes a perpetual alliance with it, and a perpetual pool as to charges and rates. Established to promote a healthy, beneficial competition, it bargains away, so far as it is able, its franchises, or right to exist as a corporation in all the territory where Congress had sole jurisdiction, and parceled out, as suited the convenience of itself and its opponent, the carrying trade of one-third of the territory of the Republic. Given life for a special purpose, it uses every means within its power to defeat the object of its creation, and, as a fitting climax to all this iniquity, it endeavors to supplant Congress as a donor of the public domain, as a part of the transaction, which was its own suicide. The Southern Pacific claims to "stand in the shoes" of the Texas and Pacific.

Your committee agree that "standing in the shoes" would do if the Southern Pacific filled the shoes. But it does not.

It never had authority or recognition by Congress east of Yuma. All its attempts before Congress to secure recognition there have repeatedly failed as made. For its own purposes, at its own instance, in its own way, by methods which many honest, good men have denounced, greedy to embrace all the land with its network of rails to secure monopoly of transportation, surmounting opposition and beating down all obstacles in its way, and in doing so crushing the agent Congress had selected as the instrument to build a road there, doing nothing, absolutely nothing, by the governmental authority or assent even, and having succeeded in defeating a necessary work and rendering absolutely abortive the attempt to have one competing transportation route to the Pacific built, it coolly asks Congress to bestow upon it fifteen millions of acres of land, to give it the ownership of an area sufficient for perhaps one hundred thousand homes as a reward for that result.

So your committee report the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it pass, suggesting here that it may not be improper to adopt the same rule as to Mr. Huntington that he proposed as to Mr. Scott in his letter of November 8, 1874, No. 2, above, "but if Scott kicks at it, I propose to say to Congress, 'We will build east of the Colorado to meet the Texas Pacific without aid, and then see how many members will dare to give him aid to do what we offered to do without.'" We plead guilty to a curiosity to see how many members of this House will "dare to vote" to give this grant to him now, for doing what he then proposed to do and did without aid or promise of any. We are confirmed in our conclusion by the action of the Judiciary Committee of the House of the Forty-seventh Congress, where, as we are advised, fourteen of the fifteen members of that committee concurred in the opinion that the Southern Pacific Railroad Company had neither legal nor equitable claim to any part of the grant, and that under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States action on the part of Congress is necessary to restore this land to the public domain. No legal rights can be divested or lost by the proposed action, and whatever legal rights exist can only be ascertained after forfeiture.

We ought, perhaps, to apologize for the length of this report; but the interests are so vast, the value of the property so great, the claim of the railroad company insisted upon with so much zeal and apparent candor and earnestness, and, moreover, this being the pioneer case in the list of proposed forfeitures of lapsed land grants to railroads before this Congress, we have thought it not inexpedient to thoroughly canvass the questions presented, although subjecting ourselves to the charge of prolixity.

A bill to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company under the act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited, and that the whole of said lands be restored to the public domain and made subject to sale and settlement under existing laws of the United States.

SEC. 2. That in any and all cases, as to any lands embraced within the terms of the act named in section 1 of this act, whenever the Department of the Interior, or its officers, or the local land officers, have treated said lands as open to selection, purchase, or homestead entry, and have allowed purchases, selections, and entries of any of said lands under the general laws of the United States, the acts of the Department of the Interior, and its officers, and the local land offices, in permitting such entries, selections, and purchases, in making such sales and in issuing patents, certificates, and lists thereon, are hereby ratified and validated; and the rights and titles of parties or persons holding patents or claiming right or title under certificates or lists of lands issued or certified by the Secretary of the Interior, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or certificates issued by the officers of the local land offices, or who have made homestead entries or pre-emption settlements or claims of any kind upon any of said lands, under the general laws of the United States, in any way affected adversely by said grant, are hereby confirmed and made valid to the same extent as though said grant had never been made; and all of said lands embraced within the provisions of said acts shall be restored to the public domain, subject to the saving of rights as provided in this section, as though said grant had never been made.

After the passage of the bill,

Mr. REED said: Before we pass from this subject I would like to ask permission to have printed in the RECORD the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the last Congress upon this subject, following the report of the committee of this Congress, as embracing the views which some of us entertain, as a justification of our action in this case.

Mr. PAYSON. I think that is right.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The report of the majority as well as the views of the minority?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. SPRINGER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED]?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object, because it will only unnecessarily cumber the RECORD.

Mr. REED. I hope the gentleman will not object. The report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the last Congress is referred to in the report of the Committee on Public Lands of this Congress and is corroborative of that report. There are only four pages of it; five pages including the views of the minority.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I withdraw my objection.

There being no further objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The report, with the views of the minority, is as follows:

Mr. REED (August 3, 1882), from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred H. Res. 286, submit the following report:

The Texas and Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated under the name of the Texas Pacific by the act of March 3, 1871. By section 1 of that act the route was defined and described as follows:

"From a point at or near Marshall, county of Harrison, State of Texas; thence by the most direct and eligible route, to be determined by said company, near the thirty-second parallel of north latitude, to a point at or near El Paso; thence by the most direct and eligible route, to be selected by said company, through New Mexico and Arizona, to a point on the Rio Colorado at or near the southeastern boundary of the State of California; thence by the most direct and eligible route to San Diego, Cal., to Ship's Channel, in the bay of San Diego, in the State of California, pursuing in the location thereof, as near as may be, the thirty-second parallel of north latitude."

Section 23 provides—

"That for the purpose of connecting the Texas Pacific Railroad with the city of San Francisco, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California is hereby authorized (subject to the laws of California) to construct a line of railroad from a point at or near Tehichipi Pass, by way of Los Angeles, to the Texas Pacific Railroad at or near the Colorado River, with the same rights, grants, and privileges, and subject to the same limitations, restrictions, and conditions, as were granted to said Southern Pacific Railroad Company of California by the act of July 27, 1866."

Section 9 provides for a land grant, which, as described by the Secretary of the Interior, Executive Document 144, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, is—

"A grant of every alternate section of public land, not mineral, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of twenty alternate sections per mile on each side of the line as adopted by the company through the Territories of the United States, and ten alternate sections per mile on each side of the line in California. Exception is made of lands sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, and lands to which a pre-emption or homestead claim may have attached at the time the line of the road is definitely fixed.

"Indemnity is provided for lands thus lost to the grant out of alternate odd-numbered sections not more than ten miles from the limits of the sections granted. Provision is also made for indemnity for lands lost by reason of the near approach of the line of the road to the boundary of Mexico, and also for mineral lands excluded from the grant out of odd-numbered sections nearest the line of the road."

The same authority estimates the quantity of land embraced in the grant at 14,309,760 acres.

The Texas and Pacific Company was required to commence the construction of its road at San Diego and at Marshall simultaneously, and to complete it in ten years. The act of May 2, 1872 (17 statutes, 59), extended the time of completion to May 2, 1882, which time at the date of this report has expired.

The Secretary of the Interior further reports that—

"The length of the entire line is estimated at 1,483 miles. Proof of the construction of 181 miles of this road in Texas has been furnished, but no evidence of construction beyond that has reached this office."

The committee are informed that the construction has proceeded much farther in the State of Texas than the last figures indicate, but the exact number of miles is not material, as none of it is west of El Paso on the Texas line.

To this should be added the fact that at the hearing before the committee it seemed that whatever railroad had been built from San Diego eastward had been built by another company.

This statement shows that the Texas and Pacific have never completed any part of the route for which the land grant was made to them, and have never earned or claimed to have earned any part of the land. It is also understood that they do not propose to build any such road or to attempt to do it. In fact, they have agreed not to do so, and have attempted to transfer to another company all their title to and rights in the land grant in question. So far from intending to earn the lands, they have renounced them. They have abandoned the undertaking so far as this part of their route is concerned, and it is understood that they have agreed not to build, in accordance with the charter, west of El Paso.

While the ten years which were allowed for the building of the Texas and Pacific were passing, another corporation, the Southern Pacific, started out of San Francisco to meet the Texas and Pacific at the Colorado River. When it reached the Colorado it found that the Texas and Pacific had not built in the Territories, and was asking Congress for a guarantee of the interest on its bonds, in addition to the grant, to enable it to go on.

The Southern Pacific thereupon began to build to El Paso, claiming that no guaranty was needed, and no land grant even, and without guaranty or land grant it occupied substantially the route on which the act of March, 1871, contemplated that the Texas and Pacific would build. After the completion of the Southern Pacific to El Paso, it entered into an agreement with the Texas and Pacific, which was not produced before the committee. It was admitted, however, that the latter company had released its title to the land grant to the Southern Pacific, and that that corporation was now the claimant of the lands.

If the Texas and Pacific still claimed the lands, the strongest argument which it could have urged would have been found in the seventeenth section of the act of March, 1871. The language of that section, while not identical with that contained in the eighth and ninth sections of the charter of the Northern Pacific, nevertheless resembles it, and under that section an argument might have been advanced that the only right which the United States had reserved for themselves was to complete the road. Had the facts shown that the Texas and Pacific had begun its work in good faith, had already expended large sums of money in an effort to build the road, was in the act of building it as rapidly as possible, that there was no pretense that it could be finished earlier than it was being finished, there might have arisen a very serious question as to the power and duty of Congress in the premises But the Texas and Pacific, one party to the grant or contract, having made no effort to carry it out, having renounced it, both informally and formally, both by acts and by writing, there can be no question of the right of the United States, the other party, to resume possession of the proposed grant, unless the Southern Pacific have acquired some rights by virtue of some deed of release.

On behalf of the Southern Pacific it is urged that the words used in the ninth section, "and assigns," in the phrase "there is hereby granted to the said Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, every alternate section," &c., authorize the latter company to transfer the lands in question in bulk to any other person who would receive it charged with the same trust; that the Southern Pacific, having received the lands at a time when they had completed a railroad which was the same, or nearly the same, in location as that described in the act of March, 1871, received the lands discharged from the trust by reason of its fulfillment. In the opinion of the committee the words "and assigns" do not, in this case, have this meaning. We think these words describe the nature of the estate, are words of limitation, and do not constitute the grantee an agent of the United States to select another corporation which has performed similar work and make it the beneficiary of the grant. Nor do they constitute the grantee an agent to bestow a gratuity. It is further claimed on behalf of the Southern Pacific that the sections—notably section 4—authorizing consolidations give the authority needed for the transfer. Whether these sections would, under any state of facts, confer such power need not now be determined, for no facts have been laid before us which show any consolidation whereby the Texas and Pacific has absorbed the Southern Pacific. So far as this transaction is concerned the process would seem to have been reversed.

The consolidations contemplated by sections 4, 5, and 6 were those whereby other companies were to become part and parcel of the Texas and Pacific. If the Southern Pacific had become part and parcel of the Texas and Pacific, it could not be the claimant here.

It is further urged on behalf of the Southern Pacific that, inasmuch as that company have done what the United States offered to give the granted land to the Texas and Pacific if it would do it, equity requires that the land grant should be transferred.

To this, as a request for a gratuity, no objection can be made. That would rest in the sound judgment of Congress. But this request is put upon the ground of a claim founded upon equity and good conscience. The reply seems simple. Congress would never have been justified in offering the lands had it not deemed the offer necessary to secure the road. Now that events have demonstrated its non-necessity the reason for offering it has entirely failed. The Southern Pacific was not induced by it to build. It built from other motives; not at the request of the United States, nor even for the benefit of the United States. It happened for its own purposes to build the road the United States wanted, and prevented the company from building it which the United States had authorized. It is difficult to see how this state of facts lays the United States under any obligation, either in equity or good conscience.

To these considerations may be added the fact that action on the part of the United States is necessary to enable the United States to restore this land to the public domain. Whatever legal rights parties have can be ascertained better after an act of forfeiture than before, and none of them will be lost.

No question of policy can arise here such as would arise if this were an enterprise not yet completed, but in the process of completion, which such an act would interrupt. Whatever road is to be built has been built.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying resolution:

"Joint resolution to declare the forfeiture of lands granted the Texas Pacific Railroad Company under act of March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto.

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company under the act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Texas Pacific Railroad Company and to aid in the construction of its road, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1871, and acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, be, and they are hereby, declared forfeited, and that the whole of said lands be restored to the public domain and made subject to sale and settlement under existing laws of the United States."

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following as the views of the minority:

While concurring in the recommendation of the committee, the undersigned are unwilling to be committed, even by the remotest implication, to the doctrine that the United States might be deprived of its right to enforce a forfeiture of the lands granted to this or any other railroad company for breach of the conditions upon which such grant was made simply because Congress may have reserved the power "to adopt such measures as it may deem necessary and proper to secure the speedy completion of the road" in aid of which the lands were granted, and because the company, notwithstanding the breach, may be proceeding with its work.

The undersigned are aware that it is substantially so argued in the report of the committee in the case of the Northern Pacific Railroad, as they are unable to perceive any difference in the legal effect of the language upon which the conclusion was made to hinge in that instance and that employed in the seventeenth section of the act granting lands to the Texas Pacific Company; but they dissented from the doctrine then, and dissent from it now.

Nothing could be better settled or more universally conceded than that the grantor of an estate upon conditions subsequent may, unless his right be expressly waived or lost by his own laches, re-enter upon a breach of any condition upon which the estate may depend, and that upon such re-entry the estate of the grantor becomes void ab initio, the person who re-enters being seised of his original estate in the same manner as if he had never conveyed it away; and it is equally as well settled that laches are never to be imputed to the Government. Both of these principles were recently asserted by this committee with great clearness and force in the case of the Ontonagon and Brulé land grant.

If, therefore, the Government, as grantor, has the right, without regard to the lapse of time, to reinvest itself of such an estate for a breach of any of the conditions upon which it had previously granted it, it is impossible to see how it can be deprived of the power to do so simply because it has reserved to itself the right to do something in addition to the exercise of the mere right of forfeiture. A question as to the policy of insisting upon such forfeiture is one thing; the naked legal right to enforce it is quite another.

The undersigned, therefore, cannot assent to any reasoning or intimation in the report tending to establish the proposition that the right of absolute forfeiture does not exist either in this grant or that to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company in case of a breach of any condition upon which such grant was made.

So the bill was passed.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. MILLARD with Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. DIBBLE with Mr. BELFORD.

Mr. PAIGE with Mr. WILSON, of Iowa.

Mr. VALENTINE with Mr. HARDY.

Mr. WASHBURN with Mr. SHELLEY.

Mr. CAMPBELL with Mr. RICE.

Mr. COX, of New York, with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. MONEY with Mr. WADSWORTH.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to state that I am paired on all political questions with my colleague Mr. BLACKBURN; but not considering this to be a political question, and having been informed that my colleague, if here, would vote for the bill, I have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina. My colleague Mr. HEMPHILL is absent on account of sickness; if present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. STRAIT. My colleague Mr. WASHBURN is absent; if here, he would vote "ay."

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. My colleague Mr. O'NEILL is detained at home on account of sickness.

Mr. HANBACK. I was unavoidably absent when my name was called; if I had been present, I would have voted "ay."

Mr. PAYSON. The gentleman from Colorado, Mr. BELFORD, is detained from the House by illness. He desired me to say, if he was absent when this bill was passed, that if present he would vote for it.

Mr. REED. My colleague Mr. BOUTELLE is absent on account of sickness; I have no doubt he would vote "ay" if present.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. PAYSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, from the Committee on Agriculture, by unanimous consent, reported the following; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That House bill 3967 "to provide for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide for the prevention and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals," be made a special order for Tuesday, February 5, 1884, and to continue from day to day until disposed of, not to interfere with regular appropriation or revenue bills.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, if there be no objection, will lay before the House several executive communications.

There was no objection.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Patents, showing the operations of his office for the year ending December 31, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN HOG PRODUCTS IN GERMANY AND FRANCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House a message from the President of the United States; which was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in response to the resolutions of the House of Representatives, the following report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, relative to the restrictions upon the importation of American hog products into Germany and France.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 31, 1884.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that this message, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move the reference to the Committee on Agriculture. This message is in response to a resolution of inquiry reported from that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] has moved the reference to the Committee on Commerce. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] moves the reference to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have not yielded the floor. I desire to say that this message is in response to a resolution offered by myself, which was referred to no committee, but was adopted in this House by unanimous consent. Subsequently, a week or two afterward, a similar resolution came in from the Committee on Agriculture. This question is now under consideration by the Committee on Commerce, several bills upon the subject having been referred to that committee. No other committee has any bill on the subject except the Ways and Means Committee, which does not propose to act upon it. I think the House ought to refer these documents to the Committee on Commerce, who are already considering the subject, with bills before them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] insisted on his motion?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will ask the Chair whether the message from the President is in response to the resolution reported from the Committee on Agriculture or the resolution to which the gentleman from Illinois refers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The message states that it is in response to a resolution of inquiry, but does not state what resolution.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Does not the resolution accompany the message?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My resolution was offered a couple of weeks before the resolution from the Committee on Agriculture; and the Committee on Commerce is now considering the subject—expects, I understand, to consider it to-morrow.

Mr. CABELL. Mr. Speaker, there was a motion to adjourn some time ago. Is not that the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked permission to present several executive communications, of which this message was one. There having been no objection, the message was presented, and it is now before the House for reference.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I understand the gentleman from Missouri withdraws his motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands, the motion of the gentleman from Missouri is withdrawn.

Mr. CURTIN. This correspondence is communicated to the House in answer to a resolution offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My friend from Pennsylvania is mistaken.

Mr. CURTIN. No, I am not mistaken.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The gentleman from Iowa did not offer the resolution requesting this information.

Mr. CURTIN. Yes, sir, the gentleman from Iowa did; and bills on the subject have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My resolution was offered two or three weeks before the gentleman from Missouri attempted to move in the matter.

Mr. CURTIN. That is of no consequence. This is an answer to an inquiry of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, because we have been in constant communication with the Secretary of State while this correspondence has been in course of preparation.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has the Committee on Foreign Affairs any bill before it on this subject?

Mr. CURTIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I was not aware of that.

Mr. CURTIN. And the correspondence has reference to the interpretation of treaties with foreign countries. The resolution was offered by the gentleman from Iowa; the language is clear and distinct; and we have been in constant consultation with the Secretary of State during the preparation of this correspondence. I know what I am speaking about.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think my friend will discover that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Iowa was simply a resolution of instruction to the Committee on Foreign Affairs to consider and report what they might deem to be a proper measure on this subject.

Mr. CURTIN. And it had reference to treaties with foreign countries.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I know that; but it did not call for executive information.

Mr. CURTIN. This correspondence has been brought out by constant intercourse on the part of the Foreign Affairs Committee with the Secretary of State.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Now, I ask the gentleman whether he will not admit that the first resolution calling for information on this subject was introduced by myself and adopted by the House before any resolution from the gentleman from Iowa or from the Committee on Agriculture. Allow me to say further that there have been three or four bills in regard to this matter introduced and referred to the Committee on Commerce, which has already taken cognizance of those bills, has been considering them, and is perhaps about ready to report. Why divide this subject among several committees of the House?

Mr. CURTIN. I have no doubt the Secretary of State will furnish you with any information he has on the subject.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. He has already done it. I submit this is in answer to my resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The message of the President of the United States says it is in answer to "resolutions" of the House, not to the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, but to several resolutions, among the number one introduced by my colleague [Mr. KASSON], and one introduced by myself which was reported by the Committee on Agriculture and adopted. It is in the plural and is not limited to the single resolution of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Who offered the first resolution in the House?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. It does not matter. The first committee which reported was the Committee on Agriculture, and they reported the resolution I had the honor to introduce. This message is comprehensive and covers the whole question, and I trust, Mr. Speaker, it will be ordered to be printed, as it is a matter of great importance. I ask that order be now made by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion was that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on Commerce. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] moves it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that motion will be in order.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. State it.

Mr. BLAND. I moved some time ago the House adjourn and the Chair recognized that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not. The gentleman was not entitled to the floor when he made it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I do not yield the floor to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I insist on my motion being put.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri is out of order.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is it.

Mr. BLAND. That this question is not debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That point of order is well taken.

Mr. BLAND. I insist on its enforcement.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish to say a word——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask to be heard by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAND. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am entirely indifferent to what committee it goes, provided some committee will report on it for our action. It can be referred to the Committee on Commerce, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on Agriculture, or the Committee on Ways and Means, and I do not care which one shall take charge of it, if the committee will take cognizance of it and act on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of any motion the message will be laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that that body had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making appropriation for the relief of A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, and further insisted on its amendment disagreed to by the House, and asked for a further conference between the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. SAULSBURY as managers of said conference on its part.

It further announced that it had passed the bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of taxes on tobacco and to provide for expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, with amendments; in which concurrence was requested.

It further announced that it insisted on its amendments to the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians, disagreed to by the House, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK as managers of said conference on its part.

IMMEDIATE DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 3948, with Senate amendments, for reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to the rebate of the tax on tobacco and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Territorial Legislature of New Mexico, and for other purposes.

The bill was taken from the Speaker's table, and, with the Senate amendments, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

GREELY EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the message from the Senate in relation to the Greely expedition may also be taken from the Speaker's table, and the joint resolution referred, with the amendments of the Senate, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The title of the joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 119, making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, comprising what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

The joint resolution was taken from the Speaker's table, and, with the Senate amendments, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CABELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

RIGHT OF WAY OVER LAKE TRAVERSE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The Speaker pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 29th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon the subject of the right of way of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railroad through Lake Traverse Indian reservation in Dakota.

The subject is commended to the consideration of Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

There was no objection.

To Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. VALENTINE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. COVINGTON, until February 5, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. COSGROVE, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the commission and accompanying papers of Lieut. Benjamin F. Gutman, of Missouri.

On motion of Mr. WAIT, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House papers in connection with Maj. James A. Betts, asking to be retired with the pay of lieutenant-colonel, there being no adverse report.

The motion of Mr. BLAND was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 1, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CLERICAL FORCE IN THE DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Attorney-General, asking for an increase of the clerical force in the Department of Justice; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

DISCHARGE OF EMPLOYÉS DURING VACATION OF CONGRESS.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference the resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule II be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Provided, That no employé shall be removed except for cause during the vacation of Congress."

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

PERNETTA HENDLEY.

Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4386) for the relief of Pernetta Hendley; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK FOR COMMITTEE.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to submit a privileged resolution for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be allowed a clerk, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DOCKERY. There is a substitute——

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have the report read, in order that it may be spread upon the record.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the resolution of Mr. YOUNG—

"That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be allowed a clerk, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House,"— respectfully report the following substitute, and ask that it do now pass:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be allowed a clerk, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the same rate of compensation now paid committee clerks for the present Congress."

Mr. KASSON. I should like the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] to explain whether this makes a permanent clerk; and also, as the report does not state it, what is the occasion for this.

Mr. DOCKERY. There is a further report which I ask the Clerk to read, and which will explain the necessity.

The Clerk read as follows:

In support of the resolution we offer the following statement of facts:

By the provisions of the thirty-fourth section of the eleventh rule of the House of Representatives the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department is charged with the duty of examining the accounts and expenditures of that Department of the Government, the manner of keeping the same, the correctness of such expenditures, their conformity with appropriation laws, the proper application of public moneys, the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands, retrenchment, the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States, the economy and accountability of public officers, the abolishment of useless offices, the reduction or increase of the pay of officers, and further provides that all these subjects shall be within the jurisdiction of said committee.

Your committee believe these to be important duties, and that no committee of the House can properly discharge them without the aid of a competent clerk, whose entire time and services should be at the command of the committee.

In addition to these general duties assigned by law to this committee, your committee find that other special duties have been assigned it by order of the House, which will necessarily require a considerable amount of clerical labor, and which can not be properly discharged without it. A recent resolution of the House has directed it to make an investigation of the manner in which an important public work on the Hot Springs reservation is being conducted, with a view to ascertain its durability, its conformity to the requirements of law, and its probable effect upon the health of the town of Hot Springs; and, also, with a view of ascertaining whether or not the money appropriated by the Government for the construction of said work has been properly expended. This investigation, if properly made, will necessarily involve an examination of a number of contracts, plans, specifications, and accounts, which will require more time and clerical labor than any member of a committee could well devote to it.

Your committee also find that the Secretary of the Interior has directed a letter to this committee calling attention to the manner of disbursing public money to various institutions under the care of and supported by the Government, and suggesting that the same be examined with a view to greater economy and efficiency in its expenditure. This would also, if entered upon, require the services and assistance of a clerk.

In view of the facts above stated your committee respectfully recommend that the resolution be adopted by the House, with an amendment fixing the compensation of the clerk therein provided for at six dollars per day during the sessions of Congress.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the adoption of the substitute reported by the committee for the resolution referred to them.

The substitute was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SLOCUM. I call for the regular order.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I desire to submit a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is it of a public or a private nature?

APPROPRIATION FOR DESTITUTE INDIANS.

Mr. ELLIS. I rise to a privileged question. The Senate have desired a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

The SPEAKER. That is such a matter of privilege as the Chair thinks ought to be entertained even after a call for the regular order on Friday, relating as it does to a communication from the Senate concerning a conference upon amendments to an appropriation bill.

Mr. ELLIS. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment to the joint resolution and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. ELLIS, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. HOLMAN, and the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. RYAN.

COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. The privileged matter to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair and the House is a resolution that the Committee on Elections have leave of the House to sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if there be no objection, will entertain that resolution. The resolution submitted by the gentleman from Georgia will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections and subcommittees of said committee have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BAYNE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. BAYNE. I move that the morning hour be dispensed with.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to have printed some extra copies of the report of the Committee on Pensions, report 115, as the supply is exhausted. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is insisted on by other gentlemen, and unless that is withdrawn the Chair can not entertain these requests.

The question being taken on Mr. BAYNE'S motion to dispense with the morning hour, there were—ayes 146, noes 11.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the House now go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar to consider the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. And I further move that after two hours and forty-five minutes from the commencement of the consideration of that bill in the committee general debate be closed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] moves that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar for the further consideration of the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter; and pending that motion the gentleman moves that at the expiration of two hours and forty-five minutes from the time the consideration of that bill shall be commenced general debate shall close.

Mr. STEELE. There are several gentlemen on the list to speak upon that bill. They have prepared speeches, hoping that they may be heard. I trust that gentlemen on the other side will not undertake to cut off debate to-day. Let us have all of to-day for general debate. The gentleman from Maine, Mr. BOUTELLE, is prepared to speak and should have an opportunity to be heard. It was the understanding that he should be given time to speak upon this bill. I trust that gentlemen on the other side will not take advantage of numbers to cut off debate to-day.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I do not believe that any other private bill that ever came up before the House has had the full and free debate which this bill has had. It has been discussed in all its aspects and in every particular. I would say to my friend from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] that if the general debate is allowed to run for to-day and to-morrow, and even to continue afterward, at the end of the time fixed for closing general debate there will be gentlemen who will want to speak.

I can say this with more freedom because I myself had intended to speak on this bill. I was one of the members of the committee that reported it, and one of the first whose names were upon the list of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole. But I gave up my time in order that the Private Calendar might not be blocked for the entire session. From what I know of the temper of the House I think that the debate ought to close at the time mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM]. Members will then have an opportunity to debate under the five-minute rule, and no doubt those gentlemen who may not have time to speak will be allowed to print their speeches in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. This question is not debatable, but the Chair indulges members now in order to ascertain if some understanding can not be arrived at.

Mr. REED. I would suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] to make the time for general debate three hours and forty-five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSHEND (to Mr. SLOCUM). Do that.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And have it understood that the previous question will be considered as ordered at the end of that time.

Mr. REED. We are willing that general debate shall close in three hours and forty-five minutes. I think the situation is such that at least that much should be allowed. Members have had their names on the list of those desiring to speak for a great number of days. I think if that is done it would be satisfactory to every one.

Mr. SLOCUM. I will adopt the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. STEELE. The debate then to proceed under the five-minute rule.

Mr. COX, of New York. You cannot get rid of that.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That will be a matter for the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] accepts the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that there be three hours and forty-five minutes' general debate upon the bill now pending in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. If there is no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The motion of Mr. SLOCUM that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calender was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, and resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. Before the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] proceeds, I will ask him to yield, that the House may accede to the request of the Senate for a committee of conference.

Mr. WOLFORD. Not to be taken out of my time.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly not.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the committee will rise informally for the purpose indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

There was no objection.

The committee rose informally; and the Speaker resumed the chair.

GREELY RELIEF EXPEDITION.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask consent of the House that the message from the Senate in relation to the joint resolution making an appropriation for the relief of the Greely expedition be taken from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time.

The SPEAKER. The resolution of the Senate will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House 119 making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions; and that the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the said joint resolution disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. HALE, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. SAULSBURY be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adhere to its disagreement to the amendanents of the Senate, and agree to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

The Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HUTCHINS, and Mr. CALKINS.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole will now resume its session.

FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair).

The CHAIRMAN. The House now resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. By order of the House all general debate upon this bill has been limited to three hours and forty-five minutes. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] is entitled to the floor for forty-two minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. WOLFORD addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask that the time of my colleague be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that the time for general debate has been limited by order of the House, and the Chair has already allotted the time. An extension could not be made unless the committee should rise so as to obtain an order of the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask that additional time be allowed my colleague, by unanimous consent, not to come out of the time which has been fixed by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It must come out of the time of other gentlemen, because the time for general debate has been limited.

Mr. WOLFORD. I can soon get through.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will have additional time.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be granted unless it comes out of the time of other gentlemen.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Can not my colleague's time be extended by unanimous consent? Every other gentleman who has spoken on this bill has had his time extended if he desired it.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be true; but the House has made an order limiting the time for debate, and the Chair must enforce that order.

Mr. ROBERTSON. We can rescind that order by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole can not set aside an order of the House as to the limitation of time. Unless the House should rescind its order the Chair will insist that every member occupying the floor shall be confined to the time prescribed by the rules.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask that my colleague be allowed to print the remainder of his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Kentucky will be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WOLFORD. There was an argument that I wanted to make, and to reply as a personal privilege to a question propounded to me by my distinguished friend and colleague [Mr. WHITE]. I hope to have the privilege of printing that, too. [Cries of "Yes!" "Yes!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITE. I have no objection to that, provided the gentleman will print also what he said in the city of Lexington on the day referred to.

Mr. WOLFORD. That is exactly what I propose to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the request that the gentleman be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD, and heard no objection.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Chairman, it has been said to me several times since this bill has been pending that it is unnecessary for those opposed to Fitz-John Porter's restoration to the Army to make any further opposition to the bill, because "It is going to pass." I know that. I understand perfectly well that this bill will pass. I understand perfectly well that the leaf turned down twenty-two years ago in the book of history is to be opened, and the action then taken is to be reversed. But those of us who are opposed to this action will not adopt the means which we believe Fitz-John Porter used on the memorable 27th and 29th of August, 1862, and refuse to fire a shot at the enemy. On the contrary, we will adopt as our example the gallant conduct of the brave sailors and marines on board the ship Cumberland, who, when she was swept fore and aft, shot through and through, and was sinking to the bottom of the sea, fired their guns at the enemy and then mounted the yardarms, and as she went down gave three cheers for their country and their flag. [Applause.]

You may reverse history, you may undo what was done then, and you may call that a vindication. But I deny it. More than four millions of the voters of this country will deny it.

I admit there is a condition of affairs now that may make it possible, nay, probable, for you to pass this bill all the way through. If there is such a condition of affairs I shall appeal from that action to our superiors, the people; and when you hear from them, you and I alike must bow to their decision.

An old rule of law is, that if you are to try a case as a judge or juror you must place yourself in the condition of the person being tried, so near as may be, at the time the controversy occurred, and look at the circumstances from that standpoint. A man in Tartary or China can not be tried according to the common law, but according to the laws of those countries. You can not try this case twenty-two years after it happened unless you surround yourselves with the precise condition of things which existed then. That is the first thing for every member of this House to do—not to try it from the standpoint we occupy now, but from the standpoint that was occupied then; and having placed ourselves in that situation, we are competent to award a verdict.

And this, Mr. Chairman, leads me to speak for a moment to the Schofield board.

Mr. BAYNE. That leads you to the main trial.

Mr. CALKINS. I will come to that soon enough for my friend's benefit. There has not been an advocate nor an apologist for Fitz-John Porter on this floor who has not planted himself on the award or finding made by the Schofield board. Without it they have no basis upon which to stand—not even General Grant's letter, because that was written after the Schofield board had reported and is based on it.

What was the Schofield board? I appeal to you, each one of you, on both sides, to answer, what was that Schofield board? Every gentleman on this floor admits it was organized without authority of law. It was organized by an arbitrary act of the President; and when organized it had no power to subpœna witnesses or administer oaths. Every man who made his statement before that board could have willfully falsified any fact and would have been answerable to no tribunal and committed no offense in law. And this board, so constituted without authority of law, extrajudicial, made a finding, and upon that finding you plant your arguments to overthrow the verdict and judgment of a constitutional court, organized under the forms of law, amenable to the oath of office, and answerable under the severest penalties for violations of duty.

Let me illustrate. Recently the Supreme Court of the United States decided the civil rights law to be unconstitutional. There can be found three eminent lawyers in the United States who entirely disagree with the Supreme Court in its decision. Now, suppose the President of the United States should select, without law and without authority, three lawyers to sit and deliberate on this decision and render an award, and having done so adversely to that decision we should bring it in here and seriously predicate an argument on such a finding as that against the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and the court itself, what would you gentlemen who favor Fitz-John Porter do? Why, you would tear it into shreds and throw it in our teeth, as you would have a right to do; and yet the only basis you have to stand upon is a decision as void and of as little effect as a decision of that kind would be.

But you state that General Grant has written a letter, and that he has acquitted General Porter. And the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] has seemed utterly dazed that any gentleman on this side of the House should dare disagree with General Grant. He went further, and declared on the floor that there were not to exceed ten men in the entire House who could ever be competent to try and determine the questions here involved. I suppose my friend included himself in the ten.

I admit General Grant has written both the letter referred to by my friend from Michigan [MR. CUTCHEON] and the letter published in the North American Review, from both of which, and from each of which, a glance will tell you that his decision, if I correctly understand him, was based on a misapprehension of the facts.

I think more of General Grant than any of Fitz-John Porter's friends do. I commenced my services in the Army in a humble way under him. He had then just been promoted to a brigadier-general. Some gentlemen who I see here to-day were with me at that time. My understanding has always been that General Grant's soldiers obeyed his orders. When he ordered a disembarkation at Fort Henry the water was up to our waists, but we obeyed. When he ordered a charge upon Fort Donelson three days in succession against an abatis almost impassable, I never saw a soldier in that army refuse obedience. At Shiloh, on that bloody Sunday when twenty thousand men out of eighty thousand on both sides were placed hors de combat, I never saw a soldier that did not execute the orders of General Grant. And so, Mr. Chairman, from there to Arkansas Post and around to Champion Hills, at Vicksburg and Jackson, his soldiers obeyed his orders, and because they did obey and only for this reason he obtained the exalted position which he now occupies in the world. [Applause.] O, brave commander, I honor you—I love you! But you have yielded in an evil day to the social influences, it may be, which surround you, or because you have been misled by Porter and his friends, and have said this man ought to go acquit. I beg to say to you none of your officers ever dared to disobey a like order of yours. [Applause.]

Mr. ROSECRANS. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana a question?

Mr. CALKINS. Not now, general; I will yield pretty soon to you for a question.

In 1862 General Fitz-John Porter was a major-general of volunteers, and was in command of the Fifth Army Corps of the Army of the Potomac. His conduct, Mr. Chairman, had been gallant theretofore, and he had given evidence of devotion to his country which was equal to any man's in the service. I am glad to do him that act of justice today; and inasmuch as he was a trained soldier and knew his duty, and by so far as he was advanced beyond ordinary men in this particular calling is the standard he himself has erected by which he must be judged.

Fitz-John Porter was tried and convicted before a court-martial and cashiered from the Army, the sentence being that he "be cashiered, * * * and forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or honor under the Government of the United States." He was charged with and convicted of the consecutive violation of three orders, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA, BRISTOE STATION,
August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start before 1 o'clock to-night and go forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here at daylight to-morrow morning.

Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with the loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is returning along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where General McDowell is. If Morell has joined you, send word for him to push forward immediately. Also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction.

It is necessary on all accounts that you be here at daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, as he is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks also that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction, leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard until he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately. If Banks is at the junction, instruct Colonel Cleary to run the trains back to Cedar Run, and post a regiment and section of artillery with it

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER, Warrenton Junction.

This order was received by Porter at 9.30 in the evening, and was disobeyed by him. Instead of moving at 1 o'clock as ordered, he did not leave until 3, which brought him to Bristoe a few minutes after 10 the next day, instead of at daylight, as General Pope expected.

The distance between Bristoe and Warrenton Junction is about nine miles.

The next order was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Generals MCDOWELL and PORTER:

You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter orders to that effect an hour and a half ago.

Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and are now not far from Gainesville.

I desire that as soon as communication is established between this place and your own, the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run, at Centreville; I presume it will be, also, on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of General McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall on the enemy's flank and rear.

I do not know even Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to join all the divisions of his corps as soon as practicable.

If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be held in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or to-morrow morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy are moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or the next day.

My headquarters for the present will be with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

Porter at this time was at Manassas.

The third order was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
August 29, 1862—4.30 p. m.

Major-General PORTER: Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and if possible on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage his flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to the right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

These orders were all issued within the short space of forty-eight hours, and the disobedience of each occurred within that time. Such was the finding of the court-martial that tried General Porter and passed sentence of dismissal upon him.

THE ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.

When the Army of the Potomac was organized, and while General McClellan was in command of it, it was handled with that caution and care which a general may properly adopt for a defensive army. I am not here to cast any aspersions upon General McClellan, but simply to assert a truth which no persons know better than the gentlemen who confronted him at that time. They, of all men in the army, are able to speak with reference to his caution. One instance is proven by the fact that after the confederates had evacuated Manassas it was found they had kept McClellan for a long time looking into the ends of "Quaker guns" after having removed their artillery from the frowning earthworks they had there erected. I will not detract one iota from his record. But he had a degree of caution which amounted almost to absolute inaction, and he managed the Army of the Potomac in that way until that trite saying "All quiet along the Potomac" became a by-word throughout the whole country.

General Porter was General McClellan's friend. He was his boon companion. He leaned upon him. He breathed the same atmosphere, and argued from the same standpoint.

Now, I want to read some of the most remarkable history that ever took place in the shape of correspondence between the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy and its commanding general. It is well known that the Army of the Potomac was transferred to the Peninsula.

and after the seven days' fight it took shelter at Harrison's Landing under the protection of our iron-clad fleet. At Harrison's Landing General McClellan clung to the idea of proceeding to Richmond with the energy of despair, and when he was ordered by General Halleck to bring his army back to succor Pope and throw it between Washington and the rebel army, which was then marching upon this city, he answered, in a spirit of insubordination, as follows:

If I save this army now, I tell you plainly that I owe no thanks to you nor to any other person in Washington. * * *
You have done your best to sacrifice this army.

On July 12 his telegram to the President shows that he was fearful of being removed from the command of the army.

Halleck issued the order for the withdrawal of his army from Harrison's Landing on August 3. It was repeated August 4, with directions to use "all possible dispatch." On August 9 Halleck informed him that the enemy was massing to crush Pope, and his (McClellan's) "delay is not satisfactory," and that he must move "with all possible celerity."

On August 10 Halleck telegraphs him that the enemy is again fighting Pope, and "there must be no further delay in your movements. Much has already occurred which is entirely unexpected and must be satisfactorily explained."

To this dispatch McClellan answered that he had not sufficient transportation. August 12 Halleck replied—

Nearly every steam vessel in the country is now under your control. * * * In addition to the steamers there is a large fleet of sailing vessels which could be used as transports.

August 14 Halleck telegraphs him as follows:

Burnside and Pope are hard pushed and require aid as rapidly as you can send it.

The first of McClellan's troops to reach Pope did so on the 23d of August, and only twenty thousand out of ninety thousand of the Army of the Potomac ever reached him in time for action. From the 3d of August to the 23d was a lapse of twenty days. Five days at the outside was all that was necessary to be consumed by McClellan to re-enforce Pope. McClellan left Fortress Monroe on the evening of August 23 and arrived at Aquia Creek on the morning of the 24th, and reported to Halleck for further orders.

Pope had been fighting the enemy for two weeks; the engagement of Cedar Mountain was fought August 9. From that time on until September 1 there was a succession of battles, including those of the Rappahannock, Thoroughfare Gap, and Manassas Plains—all memorable events. Pope was slowly retiring to Washington.

Mr. Lincoln and the Secretary of War were fearful that Pope's army would be crushed and the national capital fall into the hands of the enemy.

I may stop to remark that at this time the Army of the Potomac was under the protection of our gunboats at Harrison's Landing. A provisional army had been gathered up and General Pope had been brought from the West, much against his will, and put in command of it. It was called the Army of Virginia. It consisted of about thirty thousand men. Now mark, while Halleck was telegraphing to McClellan to push forward to help Pope and to come to the preservation of Washington, here was what he was saying to Pope. On the 17th of August Halleck says:

Maintain a bold front and all will soon be well.

Again on the same day he telegraphs Pope that the "Army of the Potomac is marching to your rescue." On August 18 he says in another dispatch:

Stand firm on the line of the Rappahannock until I can help you. Fight hard and aid will soon come.

On the 21st he says:

A large force will be in to-morrow.

On the same day in another dispatch he says:

Hold every inch of ground, and fight like the devil until we can re-enforce you. Forty-eight hours more and we can make you strong enough. Do not yield an inch if you can help it.

Now examine the dispatches sent by Halleck to McClellan.

Reynolds's division of twenty-five hundred men joined Pope August 23, Heintzelman's corps on the 26th, and Porter reported for duty to Pope on the 27th. All these were under way to report to Pope before McClellan arrived at Aquia Creek. The next re-enforcements from the army, under Franklin and Sumner, joined Pope at Centreville September 1, after the struggle was over.

On the morning of the 27th of August Halleck telegraphs McClellan:

Pope reports a general battle imminent. Franklin's corps should move out by forced marches.

At this time General McClellan had landed at Aquia Creek, on the Rappahannock, and this was the first order that McClellan got from Halleck informing him of the battle.

McClellan replied on the same day that he had ordered Franklin to "prepare to march." On the same day Halleck repeats the order, "Franklin should march as soon as possible." These were sent before 10 o'clock in the morning. On August 28, at 4 o'clock p. m., McClellan answers as follows:

Franklin is with me, but will not be in condition to move before to-morrow morning.

On the 27th Stonewall Jackson had struck Manassas and had burned immense stores.

On the 28th, after this occurrence, Halleck telegraphs to Franklin directly and orders him to "move to Manassas."

McClellan answers this telegram, saying:

The moment Franklin can be spared with a reasonable amount of artillery he shall go.

At 3.30 the same day Halleck telegraphs:

Not a moment must be lost in pushing as large force as possible towards Manassas, so as to connect with Pope before the enemy is re-enforced.

McClellan answers within a few minutes, saying:

Neither Franklin's nor Sumner's corps is in condition to move and fight a battle.

Halleck now became angry, and telegraphed at 8.40 p. m. of August 28:

There must be no further delay in moving Franklin's corps to Manassas. They must go to-morrow morning, ready or not ready. If we delay too long to get ready there will be no necessity to go at all, for Pope will either be defeated or victorious without our aid.

I can imagine I see the grim old soldier, after he has been for two days ordering the troops out to succor Pope, when he indites that telegram.

Two whole days had now been lost. On the 29th, at 10.30 a. m., McClellan informed Halleck that—

Franklin's corps is now in motion.

But he adds:

I should not have moved him but for your pressing orders of last night.

On the 27th McClellan had telegraphed Halleck:

I learn that heavy firing has been heard this morning at Centreville.

Napoleon's maxim for a soldier was "March to the sound of cannon."

This dispatch of the 26th, at 10.30 a. m., says:

Franklin's corps is now in motion.

Already forty-eight hours had elapsed since the roar of the cannon had been heard and the battle had been reported to McClellan.

Two days of cannonading had not stirred McClellan from his moorings.

Returning to the 28th of August, McClellan asked Halleck:

Do you wish this movement of Franklin's corps continued?

Now, mark you, they had marched six miles in two days in the direction of the fight. After two days McClellan telegraphed:

Shall this movement continue in the direction of the fight?

Says another dispatch sent by McClellan a few moments after that I have just read:

Franklin has near between eleven and twelve thousand men ready for duty. How far do you wish this body to advance?

Halleck replied:

I want Franklin's corps to go far enough to find out something about the enemy. * * * Our people must move more actively and find where the enemy is. I am tired of guesses.

These various dispatches brought the following celebrated dispatch from McClellan. At 3.30 o'clock on the 29th he telegraphed to Halleck:

I am clear that one of two courses must be adopted: First, to concentrate all our available forces and open communication with Pope; and second, to leave Pope to get out of his scrape, &c., at once using all our means to make the capital safe.

At 6 p. m. on the 29th of August Franklin's corps left Alexandria, marched six miles, and bivouacked. Halleck heard of it and telegraphed:

This is contrary to my orders. Investigate and report the fact of this disobedience. That corps must push forward as directed.

McClellan immediately answers and assumes the responsibility of Franklin's non-action. At the end of three days Franklin, under McClellan's orders, had been able to get six miles in the direction of the enemy. On the 30th Halleck's patience was worn out and he telegraphed to McClellan:

I am by no means satisfied with Franklin's march of yesterday. Considering the circumstances of the case he was wrong in stopping at Annandale.

To this McClellan responds and asks where he shall send the troops.

I can imagine the feelings of General Halleck when he received this dispatch. He then telegraphed back to McClellan immediately that Franklin's march had not been satisfactory, and he says to him, "I want you to send Franklin where the fighting is." He did not do it, though. Neither Franklin nor Sumner ever reached Pope until the 1st day of September, and then it was too late to participate in the engagements which had already resulted in a reverse to our arms.

My next position is that the dispatches passing between Porter and Burnside, Porter and McClellan, Porter and Pope, Porter and his division commanders were precisely in line, all breathing the same spirit which was breathed in these dispatches between McClellan and the War Department. They were loyal to McClellan, but disloyal to General Pope's authority, accompanied by sneers and taunts, which show the animus of Porter and his utter forgetfulness of soldierly qualities which all subordinates are bound to show to their superiors.

On the 23d of August Porter was ordered to report to Pope for duty by orders direct from General Halleck.

On the 25th he writes to Burnside, saying:

I do not like to act on uncertain data furnished by Halleck, as I know he is misinformed as to the location of some of the corps mentioned in some of his dispatches.

And closes this remarkable communication by this inquiry:

Does McClellan approve?

On the 27th he writes as follows to Burnside:

I sent you the last order, which indicates the future as well as the present. Wagons are rolling along to the rear rapidly, as if a mighty power was propelling them. I see no cause for alarm, though this order may cause it. We are marching now to get behind Bull Run, and I presume will be there in a few days if strategy don't use us up. The strategy is magnificent, and tactics in inverse proportion.

Again he says:

The enemy have a contempt for this Army of Virginia: I wish myself away from it, with our old Army of the Potomac, and so do all of our companions. I was informed to-day, by the best authority, that in opposition to General Pope's views this army was pushed out to save the Army of the Potomac, an army that could take the best care of itself. * * * Most of this is private; but if you can get me away, please do so.

In another dispatch of the same day he says:

Inform McClellan, that I may know that I am doing right.

On the 28th he says:

All that talk about taking Jackson, &c., was bosh. * * * The story of McDowell having cut off Longstreet was without foundation. I expect the next thing will be a raid on our rear by Longstreet, who was "cut off."

August 28, 9.30 a. m., he says:

I hope for the best, and my lucky star is always up about my birthday, the 31st, and I hope Mac's is up also. You will hear from us now by way of Alexandria.

On the 29th of August, at 6 a. m., Porter says:

Heintzelman and Keno are at Centreville, where they marched yesterday, and Pope went to Centreville with the last two as a body-guard, at the time not knowing where was the army, and when Sigel was fighting within eight miles of the army, within sight. Comment is unnecessary. * * * I hope Mac is working and will soon get us out of this. It would seem from purported statements of the enemy that he was wandering around lost, and I expect they know what they are doing, which is more than any one here or any place else knows.

Thus he speaks in the most contemptuous way of General Pope, and has nothing for him but sneers. About the same time McClellan sends this dispatch to Halleck:

I have no confidence in the dispositions made as I gather them. To speak frankly, and the occasion requires it, there appears to be a total absence of brains.

Both McClellan and Porter breathe the same spirit in their dispatches, and the former spends three whole days within six miles of Alexandria knowing that a battle is imminent, and the other, with the sound of cannon in his ears, lies quietly by for many hours without taking his troops into action.

I come now directly to the order of the 27th day of August, 1862. Fitz-John Porter was tried for a violation of three orders: of one known as the order of the 27th of August; of another known as the joint order of the 29th to McDowell and Porter, and of another known as the 4.30 order of the 29th of August.

I will not spend much time on these orders, because every gentleman who has preceded me has discussed them fully. I may state that the order of the 27th of August was in substance that General Porter, who then lay at Warrenton, should march at 1 o'clock that night, so as to be at Bristoe Station by daylight the next morning, the morning of the 28th.

General Porter admits that he violated this order, and pleads in confession and avoidance. He says, in effect, "I did violate that order; I did not start until 3 o'clock, or two hours after I was ordered to move." And in another place in the record he says he did not start until 4 o'clock or daybreak; but he says:

It was impossible for me to go, first, because the night was dark; second, because the roads were blocked up with wagons; and third, it was not very material whether I went at all, because Jackson did not attack Pope as was expected the next morning, and no harm came of my not obeying the order.

I will not stop long to discuss with any soldier on this floor the excuse given that the night was so dark as to prevent a march; I will not argue whether that should be considered an excuse for preventing a march in the face of positive orders. Nor am I going to linger on the question of the blockading of the roads by wagons.

General Rosecrans once ordered General J. F. Miller to take a brigade of a few thousand men and advance one night when it was as black as darkness could make it and hold Bragg's entire army in check till the Army of the Cumberland could be put in position. It is a matter of history that General Miller obeyed orders. The difference between the two is striking.

In looking over the Congressional Directory I find that there are forty-seven gentlemen on this side of the House who have been willing to write themselves down as having borne some lot or part in the recent war for the preservation of the Union. I notice that on the other side of the House there are seventeen gentlemen who were willing to write themselves down in the Congressional Directory as having borne some lot or part in the effort to preserve this Union. That makes altogether sixty-four who wore the blue during the recent war now in this Chamber.

I notice at the same time that there are rising sixty gentlemen, all on the other side of this Chamber, who are willing to admit and write themselves down as having borne some lot or part on the other side of that controversy. I only mention this fact to show that when we talk to soldiers about an excuse for violating an order, all of them have some personal knowledge concerning such matters.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN] says that he admits a violation of the order took place, but he thinks the court-martial was too severe. In his judgment a reprimand would have been sufficient; he thinks that General Pope or the court-martial should have scolded Porter. That is just about what the court-martial did do. They said to Porter, in the language of Shakspeare, "Never more be officer of mine."

My idea about the duty of a soldier is quite different from that of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I notice from a report that just sixty days prior to this order to General Porter, when the First Brigade of the Fifth Corps was ordered by McClellan to succor Shields—mark you, one of the same divisions of this same corps—it marched thirty-six miles in ten hours and got into a fight promptly. When the order was received from one man this division of this corps could march many miles for the purpose of succoring a Union general and his troops. But on this night, the 27th of August, when General Porter was ordered to march eight or eight and a half miles by General Pope, the road had become so bad, the troops had become so tired, and the wagons so blocked up the roads that it was impossible for General Porter to march to the succor of Pope!

I submit the following proof on the subject of the order of the 27th of August, 1862. The order was delivered to him at 9.30 o'clock by Capt. Drake De Kay. It was but a few moments before Porter announced his decision in the premises; that is, that the night would certainly be dark, and that the wagons would certainly block up the road. He did not wait for the thing to happen, but decided that it would happen.

Had he attempted to have made the march and failed it would have been a tenable ground for excuse, but to say that this thing would come to pass, and act upon it, should afford no excuse, though in fact the occurrences as predicted did come to pass. The secure confidence exhibited in his report, after coming to this conclusion, is a remarkable fact in the history of the case.

The fact is he treated the order with the utmost contempt, and never thought of obeying it. He simply said in his own mind he would start when he thought it was the most convenient, and he acted accordingly. The magnificent strategy which he had before spoken of and the tactics in inverse proportion were ever before his mind.

The urgency of this dispatch was apparent. Hooker had had a severe engagement.

It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here (Bristoe) at daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch who will conduct you to this place.

There could be no greater emergency than this order described, yet Captain De Kay said to Porter when he delivered the orders:

The last thing General Pope said to me on leaving Bristoe was, that I should remain with General Porter and guide the column to Bristoe Station, leaving at 1 o'clock, and that General Pope expected him certainly to be there by daylight.

When De Kay delivered this order to General Porter, Generals Morell, Butterfield, and Sykes were in Porter's tent. Referring to the order in their presence, he said, "There is something for you to sleep on." Not one of these officers read the dispatch, and it is entirely evident that they were not aware of the urgency of the occasion.

Morell says he saw the order in Porter's hand, but did not read it, nor did he hear it read, nor were its precise terms indicated to them, other than the order of starting.

Sykes testifies:

Q. Do you remember whether you were made acquainted with the urgent language of the order, stating that by all means General Porter must be at Bristoe Station by daylight next morning?

A. No, sir; I think not. I am satisfied that if its urgency had been made known to us we would have moved at the hour prescribed?

Butterfield's testimony:

Q. Did you see the order of the 27th from Pope or know anything about the urgency of its terms?

A. I did not.

It was not difficult, therefore, for General Porter to obtain from these general officers advice suited to his purposes. They knew nothing of the urgency of the occasion, and, in general harmony with Porter's desire, readily assented to the proposition not to move until 3. Porter was the inspiring spirit of the occasion, and against him, and him alone, can accusations of neglect and criminal disobedience be lodged.

To an officer having the welfare of his country at heart the darkness of the night or the blocking up of the roads would have presented no barriers. General Longstreet found no barriers in the way when he pushed forward his command at night around Thoroughfare Gap so as to be on hand for battle next morning.

But it seems that what would impede General Porter's progress would form no obstructions to General Longstreet.

The following extracts from the reports made by rebel officers conclusively prove what I here assert. As was said by one of them:

During the whole night that General Porter thought it too dark to move they were wandering around loose over the very country that Porter was to move over. On that night (the 27th) Jackson's whole army, after burning our stores at Manassas, moved off by the light of the flames and marched until day towards Sudley.

General J. E. B. Stuart said that—

On the night of the 27th, after destroying everything at Manassas, the army started for Stone Bridge, via Centreville.

A. P. Hill says that—

On the night of the 27th, about 12 o'clock, the depot building [at Manassas], with an immense amount of commissary stores and about two miles of loaded freight-cars, were burned, and about 1 o'clock I moved my division to Centreville.

It will be remembered this was the identical hour (1 o'clock) that Porter was ordered to and should have moved. The zeal of the two officers for the respective causes which they represented is here made apparent.

Stonewall Jackson, in his report, says that—

On the night of the 27th Taliaferro moved his division across to the Warrenton and Alexandria turnpike, pursuing the road to Sudley Mills and crossing the turnpike in the vicinity of Groveton.

Taliaferro reports it thus:

At night Major-General Ewell, who had been fighting during the evening at Bristoe Station, crossed Muddy Run, by direction of Major-General Jackson. I moved my division, with the entire train, across the Warrenton and Alexandria turnpike, pursuing the old military road to Sudley Mills, and at daylight halted in the battlefield of the 1st of July, 1861.

Col. B. T. Johnson, commanding the second brigade of Taliaferro's division, reports it this way:

I left Manassas with my brigade about dark, reaching Warrenton road after midnight, and proceeded down this road, picketing it and holding it until daylight.

J. K. Boswell, chief engineer of the Second Army Corps, reports that—

During the night of the 27th the entire corps marched in the direction of Sudley Mills, and bivouacked between Catharpin and Sudley Mills.

Colonel Walker, of the artillery, reports that—

On the night of the 27th, at 12 o'clock, we took up our line of march at Centreville.

This disposes of General Porter's claim that the night was too dark for the troops to move.

It will be hard to convince an enlightened people that, if the rebel army could move with such ease and safety as they did, General Porter could not move his men over identically the same ground.

As to General Porter's other defense, that the wagons blocked up his way, it can hardly be treated in a dignified manner. A line of infantry are rarely ever in summer time, when the roads are perfectly good, seriously impeded by wagons containing pork and beans, hard-tack, and such like provisions; but, on the contrary, are ever ready to welcome them, whether at night or by daylight.

As to the further suggestion that the troops were fatigued and could go no farther, it deserves but a passing notice. Sykes's men marched about twelve or fourteen miles that day; Morell's men had marched about sixteen or twenty miles, but were in camp before sundown; Butterfield's men had probably made but a short march, and it nowhere appears that they marched as far as either of the other two divisions.

I come to the orders of the 29th of August; and at this point some description of the geography of the country ought to be made. I will give a brief statement of it, but will not ask my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. LYMAN] to represent the rebel right or the rebel left, either for this day or for a passing moment. [Laughter.]

Gainesville, Centreville, and Manassas are three angles of a triangle. I have the maps before me, and any gentleman can verify the description. Centreville is about north of Manassas; Gainesville is to the west of both, and the lines from Gainesville to Centreville and from Gainesville to Manassas are much longer than the line from Manassas to Centreville. The angle at Gainesville, therefore, is much more acute than either of the other two. From Gainesville to Centreville runs the Warrenton turnpike. From Manassas westwardly runs a road crossing the Warrenton turnpike at or near Gainesville. From Manassas to Gainesville also runs the Manassas Gap Railroad, continuing on through Thoroughfare Gap. It is a little to the north of west of Gainesville. From Manassas to Gainesville is about eight miles.

There has been a controversy all the way through, there is a controversy now, as to the time when Porter received what is known as the daylight order and what is known as the order directing him to proceed to Gainesville (upon which he was not tried), and also the joint order to him and McDowell. But all agree—and I plant my argument upon this proposition, to which every gentleman assents—that General Porter had received the order before the head of his column arrived at Dawkin's Branch, which is three and one-half or four miles from Manassas in the direction of Gainesville, because he and McDowell conferred about the joint order when they had reached Dawkin's Branch on the road toward Gainesville. I now make a general summary of the testimony on this point, as follows:

On the 29th of August Jackson's army was drawn up in line of battle about north and south, his left nearly to the Warrenton pike and his front extended down that road, upon which there was sharp fighting. Sigel and Heintzelman had been fighting in the morning between Gainesville and Centreville, and Jackson came to a stand at Groveton, on the Warrenton pike, about eight miles from Centreville. Our forces had been much cut up and asked for re-enforcements. Pope replied that McDowell and Porter were en route from Manassas and would soon come up on the enemy's right flank.

THE ORDERS.

Pope had sent an order to Porter on the morning of the 29th of August. This is known as the daylight order. That order was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, Va., August 29, 1862.

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I will follow the enemy down the Warrenton pike. Be expeditious or we will lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

To Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER.

This order reached Porter while he was on his way to Manassas from Bristoe, about 9 o'clock in the morning. Sykes's division was in the lead and passed on toward Centreville. The head of Morell's division, on arriving at Manassas, took the Warrenton pike toward Gainesville, and this threw him in front. Sykes countermarched and fell into (line) column after Morell. Morell's leading brigade was Griffin's, and his leading regiment was Colonel Marshall's—the Thirteenth New York—the Sixty-second Pennsylvania following. The column halted before it came to Dawkin's Branch. This was between four and five miles from Manassas, in the direction of Gainesville.

WHAT TIME DID THEY HALT AT THIS SPOT?

The joint order which has been heretofore referred to, and upon which Porter was tried, had been received by him before this time. Morell says they arrived at Dawkin's Branch between 10 and 11 o'clock. Morell says:

We had gone up the road to Gainesville perhaps about three miles when I met a countryman coming toward me. I stopped him and asked him the road to Gainesville, and also the news from the front. He said he had just come from Gainesville; that the enemy's skirmishers were there to the number of about four hundred and their main body not far off. I then moved on up the road, and in a short time our skirmishers reported that they had discovered the enemy's skirmishers coming over. The column was then halted by General Porter, who was with me.

He further states that his division reached this place about 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning, and that they marched directly up from Manassas Junction. General Porter then, at this time, was three miles from Manassas at or about 11 o'clock in the morning, and was but a short distance from our troops, who were confronting the enemy on the Warrenton pike.

General Griffin makes the following statement:

On the morning of the 29th we marched (page 161) from Bristoe Station to Manassas Junction, my brigade leading the division. * * * We halted at Manassas about half an hour. I received orders to countermarch, and proceeded in the direction of Gainesville. * * * I had marched about two miles, having passed King's division on the road, when a countryman said, "Look out! A trooper has been taken here, just in front a short distance." I asked him what forces were in front. He said, "None except a few mounted men." I halted my own brigade and threw four companies of the Sixty-second Pennsylvania to the front, with instructions to move on about half a mile, throwing out flankers to the side and skirmishers to the front. Five miles from Manassas the skirmishers commenced firing upon the enemy's pickets. At this point General Porter rode up and halted the command. We left Manassas at 9 o'clock on this road. A battery was planted at this point, and the enemy's battery soon opened upon it.

This was Stuart's battery. He commanded the cavalry.

Captain Martin locates Porter at this point as early as 11 o'clock in the morning. Colonel Marshall, of the Fifteenth New York, threw his regiment out as skirmishers, and states that he did so about 1 o'clock, after two hours' valuable time had been lost. He avers that they were in sight of General Pope's army and the distance between them was quite short.

Speaking of the re-enforcements that soon came through Thoroughfare Gap, Colonel Marshall says:

It was a distinct army from that which General Pope's army were fighting with.

He says further that at this time he could see General Pope's left and the enemy's right during the greater part of the time—about two miles off; probably more.

General Porter had been at this point for one hour before the enemy was re-enforced by the troops from Thoroughfare Gap, and he must have seen and known where General Pope's army was located. Colonel Marshall saw it, and if he could certainly Porter did.

Here, then, was Porter, with ten thousand or twelve thousand choice troops, within plain sight of a battle in which Colonel Marshall says our troops were being worsted. He was in sight of it as early as 11 o'clock in the morning, and here he stopped. What was the order that had brought him to this point?

Push forward upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton turnpike. Be expeditious or we will lose much.

General Griffin (page 165) says that—

On the 29th, in the evening, there were some very heavy volleys of musketry on the right and front, say two miles, maybe not so much, maybe farther.

Lieutenant Stevenson, of Marshall's regiment, testifies directly to the same thing. Can there be any doubt that Porter might have gone to Pope's assistance under these circumstances? This testimony, albeit, is taken from witnesses introduced by Porter himself in the court-martial trial.

It is true that along in the afternoon, about 4 or 5 o'clock, Morell, Griffin, Marshall, and others insisted that there was a large rebel force in front of them which had just come down through Thoroughfare Gap. None of them claim that this force, supposed to be Longstreet's, was there as early as 11 o'clock. Marshall says on arriving his skirmishers were fired upon by a "body of dragoons," as he styles them. Griffin spoke of a countryman who said that a trooper had been taken in the front, and that there was nothing there except a few mounted men. Further on in his testimony he stated that the enemy commenced forming in Porter's front between 2 and 3 o'clock.

General Reynolds testifies that—

On the 29th I was on the left of General Sigel's command, engaged with the enemy, who was then wholly on the right of the Warrenton pike as we faced it. General Sigel was moving obliquely across the pike (page 170). I was on his extreme left, all our troops facing the enemy. Their right, toward sunset, had been extended across the pike, with fresh troops coming down the Warrenton turnpike, but up to 12 o'clock it was not across the pike, and I marched out immediately and back on their right with my division, but was obliged to change front to meet the enemy coming down the Warrenton pike. I was forming my troops parallel to the pike to admit the enemy's right, which was on the other side of the pike, but was obliged to change from front to rear to face the troops coming down the pike. That was, I suppose, as late as 1 o'clock, and they continued to come in then until they formed and extended across the turnpike.

This testimony shows that no re-enforcements had come to the rebels until after 12 o'clock, and perhaps as late as 1. There could then have been nothing in front of Porter but the cavalry force of Stuart. Moreover, Lieutenant Stevenson, who went across this broken country from our left to Porter's front, is asked whether he encountered any enemy until he reached Colonel Marshall's regiment, and he answered plainly, "No, sir."

Mr. Chairman, there are certain controlling facts in every case. What is the controlling fact in relation to this joint order? It is in the language of the order that Porter is commanded to establish communication between himself and Reynolds. That is the controlling point. Communication was to be established; and then the order further describes where he is to go, and what is to be done.

As a matter of fact, what was done? General Porter moved out to Dawkin's Branch, three and a half or four miles distant, as I have said, and there he halted. It is in evidence, not denied by anybody, admitted by all, that he arrived at this place not later than 11 o'clock in the morning. Longstreet was marching from the other direction, from Thoroughfare Gap, to connect with Jackson's right. The distance that each of these armies had to travel was just about the same. Now mark the significant fact that Porter was to re-enforce his superior, General Pope, on a certain line of road, and General Longstreet with twenty-seven thousand men was to re-enforce Jackson, and the distance that both had to march was just about the same.

The map lies before me. If there is a doubting Thomas within the sound of my voice let him come and verify it.

Porter's positive orders were to establish communication with Pope's left, which was General Reynolds's command. I want to contrast for a moment the acts of these two generals.

You say that Porter was not a traitor to his country. I agree to that, I say so, too; but what I say is that he lost sight of his country in his hatred for Pope. [Applause on the Republican side.] Under the circumstances then surrounding him he was as guilty as if Pope had not intervened between him and his country. Pope's order was the country's order.

I want to contrast the actions of Longstreet and Porter. With the same distance to march Longstreet got up and was in striking distance of Jackson by 11 o'clock. But my friend said, and he said it with emphasis, Longstreet was in Porter's front by half past 11 o'clock. So much the worse for Porter. If Longstreet could march twenty-seven thousand men the same distance Porter had to go with only ten thousand men and got in at half past 11, I ask you, if you apply the same rule to each, where should Porter have been at that time? Mark you, the joint order ordered him to establish this communication with Pope's left. Longstreet marched to the sound of the cannon, and I ask you to read his testimony, or his statement before the Schofield board. He said they left Thoroughfare Gap about daylight. As the thunder of the guns began to sound in the ears of his soldiers they began to lengthen and quicken their pace. Colonel [addressing Mr. CUTCHEON], you and I know what that means. When they heard the thunder of the guns of the enemy their pace began to quicken, and by 9 o'clock the head of his column came up to Gainesville so he could have rendered Jackson aid if he had been sorely pressed. But when the thunder of the guns began to pour into Fitz-John Porter's ears his pace began to slacken; and when he reached Dawkin's Branch and could see, as Colonel Marshall testifies, the swaying of our troops on the right, could hear the booming of the cannon and see the bending of the line, he halted his column, and never marched a foot from 11 o'clock that morning till 3 o'clock next morning when he received the peremptory order of Pope to come at once. Three or four times during the afternoon his troops were marched up and down from Bethlehem church to Dawkin's Branch.

There is the difference in the zeal of the two men. Ah, Mr. Chairman, let me contrast it with another scene I remember well. On the 6th day of April, 1862, the battle of Shiloh began in the morning. There were two armies of nearly forty thousand men each confronting each other. The battle began raging at 6 in the morning. General William Nelson, of Kentucky, was at the head of Buell's army, who were marching to our rescue. He was sixteen miles from the battle-field. Before that day he had received word from General Grant's headquarters that he might pursue his course leisurely, as there was no hurry, but when he marched to Savannah and found Grant's headquarters deserted and heard the booming of the guns, without orders he put his column in motion and before the sun had set in the west ten thousand fresh troops came to our rescue and turned what might have been a defeat into a glorious victory. [Applause.] Yet within sight of the battle, within a mile and three-quarters from the left of General Reynolds, General Porter admits, every man who has spoken for him admits, that he staid there from 11 o'clock until he was ordered away the next morning at 3 o'clock, and never lost a man.

A MEMBER. Yes; one man.

Why, Mr. Chairman, as was said the other day by my colleague, at the battle of Marengo Dessaix was ordered in an opposite direction by Napoleon before the battle opened. The French troops were routed in the early part of the engagement and Desaix was marching by Napoleon's orders away from the battlefield. Napoleon had been sending his aids and couriers to bring him back, but they had missed him. Desaix's ears caught the sound of battle. He heard the thunder of the artillery, and his troops began to slacken their steps; slower and slower they marched until they came to a halt. Then came the command, "About face," and they marched with swiftness to Napoleon's aid. Although the battle had been lost and the French troops were flying in confusion, Desaix said to Napoleon, "This battle is lost, but there is time enough yet to win another to-day," and, acting upon the word, he made that memorable charge, and gained a glorious victory for the French arms.

Mr. Chairman, I have said before, and I repeat it now, that although we may not live to see the day when we can separate the cause for which the confederate soldiers fought from their deeds of heroism and valor on the field of battle, yet there will come a day when separating the cause from their deeds this country will be as proud of their personal heroism as it will be of the deeds of any other men who have made themselves conspicuous for bravery and courage. [Applause.]

General W. H. FORNEY represents a district from Alabama on this floor. He was commanding one of the advance divisions of Longstreet's troops at Gettysburg, and was ordered to charge with his division against the ridge held by our soldiers and bristling with our cannon. The desperate charge was made; four or five times he was shot through and fell to the ground. His gallant men raised him in their arms and offered to bear him to the rear. Said he: "No; do not carry me to the rear; carry me with my troops to the front." Ah! Mr. Chairman, he had zeal for his cause. This is what Fitz-John Porter did not have, and is the gravamen of the charge against him.

It is attempted to be shown that there was no serious engagement on the 29th. Even my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] undertook to argue that there was no serious battle on that day. When I put the question directly to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], then speaking, he said, "Yes, there was a battle that day," and the official records show that six thousand of our men bit the dust! I need not go further into the question, as no one disputes there was some fighting, and however much or little, the sound of the guns was a constant order for Porter to go to the rescue.

It nowhere appears that Porter made any attempt to find what troops were in front of him at any time after he arrived at Dawkin's Branch. His reference to the matter in his final report states that he saw "clouds of dust." General Rosser also states in his report how the dust arose; General Stuart substantially corroborates General Rosser. At page 147 of the record of the court-martial Major Heyland testifies to what he saw down by his regiment. It will be remembered that this was Colonel Marshall's regiment and the one that was farthest advanced on the picket line. At the risk of repetition it may be stated here that Porter was on the Gainesville road, having arrived at Dawkin's Branch as early as 11 in the morning. I have no doubt that parts of his command were withdrawn in the direction of Manassas during the period between the time of his arrival and final withdrawal; in fact, there can be but little doubt that Morell was withdrawn, because he went over to the right, past the railroad, to the open field, until he struck the pine bushes on the right in the direction of Reynolds.

When McDowell arrived at the head of Porter's corps, at Dawkin's Branch, he found that Porter was in possession of this joint order. Griffin states in his evidence that Porter called his officers together, and said he had a communication to read from General Pope. It was read, and Griffin's evidence shows that it was the joint order (see page 162).

This was long before McDowell joined him. Griffin also testifies that Porter's head of column left Manassas at 9 o'clock in the morning. Morell testifies (page 150) to a statement which confirms the testimony of Griffin. It is perfectly evident now, from this testimony, that at 11 o'clock Porter was in striking distance of Pope's left. The battle between Pope and Jackson was then raging. The question now resolves itself into this: Was it Porter's duty to sit down and do nothing while his comrades were engaged in battle, or was it his duty under these orders to establish communication between Pope's left and himself? As has been shown, the head of his column was within two miles of Pope's left. It is not denied that from 11 until 6 he maintained his position on the road without attempting the establishment of communications, unless his futile attempt in the pine bushes, before alluded to, can be considered as an attempt.

McDowell testifies what his understanding of the joint order was. He puts it in this way at page 85, namely: It meant "how Porter and he could, in the most speedy manner, join the left of Pope's army and attack the enemy." It is evident that Porter so understood it when McDowell left him, for he gave Morell orders to begin the movement at once, and immediately countermanded it (see testimony, page 146). Morell did move his command to the right over the railroad. One brigade and a battery went over the railroad, and when he reached the other side of the field he was ordered to return. Griffin states it on page 162 thus:

McDowell and Porter went off to the right of where they were and looked at a map, held a conversation, rode some distance to the right, and almost directly after McDowell left he received an order to recall his pickets and remove his command to the right. He had moved it six hundred yards when he encountered the little pine bushes, reported the fact, and was ordered back.

The remarkable feature about this conversation between McDowell and Porter is the following: McDowell says (see page 85 of McDowell's testimony) that Porter, pointing his finger in the direction of the dust rising above the trees, said: "We can not go in there anywhere without getting into a fight;" and McDowell retorted, "That is what we came here for."

Now, later in the evening he wrote a note to Generals McDowell and King, which is a distinguished piece of military composition. The note is as follows:

Generals McDOWELL and KING: I have found it impossible to communicate by crossing the fords to Groveton. The enemy is in great force in this road, and they appear to have driven our forces back, the force of the enemy having advanced and ours retired. I have determined to withdraw to Manassas. I have attempted to communicate with McDowell and Sigel, but my messengers have run into the enemy. They have gathered artillery, cavalry, and infantry, and the advancing masses of dust show the enemy coming in force. I am now going to the head of the column to see what is passing and how affairs are going. Had you not better send your train back?

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

I will communicate with you.

Now mark! All the orders he had received during the day were to go forward, not back, and the reason he assigns for retiring to Manassas is:

Our forces, it appears, are being driven back, the force of the enemy having advanced and ours retired.

This proof taken from Porter's witnesses establishes the following propositions:

1. Porter's column had advanced in the direction of Gainesville to Dawkin's Branch, being between three and a half and five miles from Manassas.

2. It reached that point between 10 and 11 o'clock, Porter himself being present.

3. It was only about two miles from Pope's left, and within sight of it.

4. He heard the battle raging along Pope's front.

5. He staid there until 6.30 that evening, moving backward and forward on the road, and did not attempt to assist or succor Pope's army.

Mr. Chairman, the 4.30 order is the next. That was the order to General Porter to attack the enemy; but Porter did not attack. His excuse is that there were too many men in front of him. He did not have in his mind that almost divine language, the description of the battle of Balaklava. Suppose there were a million of men in front and his superior officer ordered him to attack. What was his duty? It was to do as General Sherman did when he attacked Vicksburg. It was his duty to do just what the general at Chattanooga did when General Sherman unwound his Army of the Tennessee and threw it around the right flank of the rebel army and drove it back in confusion. I wish I had the descriptive power of my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. On that day he stood on the left of his command. While standing there our army was ordered to push forward and take a position which was designated; and this is the description he gives me: He says the confederates massed their artillery on a certain round top near where he stood. They were protected by parapets and breastworks, and while standing there, to their dismay, out rode a brigade from the woods dressed perfectly in line, and marched forward to within three hundred yards of the rebel line. The moment they halted forty guns belched forth their thunder against them. Instantly the men fell into disorder and rushed back into the woods. Their brigade commander rallied and brought them up again into the very jaws of death. They had a part to play. While Sherman flanked the confederates on the right this brigade was ordered into the jaws of death to attract the attention of the enemy from the movement progressing in their rear. And well did they perform this duty. When he brought his brigade up the second time the markers and guidons were put out, the men aligned themselves as if on parade or review, while a storm of shot and shell swept through their ranks and their comrades fell like blades of grass before the fire. Still they held their ground. After the alignment was made the command was given to lie down, and their commander, throwing his leg across his horse, sat there with perfect coolness under this fire from the rebel line. General Hardee came to that part of the field and saw the situation. Struck with the gallantry of this brave brigade and its commanding officer, he ordered his men to cease firing. These men did their duty. They obeyed orders, and the battle was won.

What a contrast between this action and that of Fitz-John Porter. The one deserves to live in song and praise; the other deserves the universal reprobation of all brave men.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, the inspired description of the charge at Balaklava comes to me:

"Forward, the Light Brigade!"
Was there a man dismayed?
Not though the soldiers knew
Some one had blundered.
Theirs not to make reply,
Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die.
Into the valley of death
Rode the six hundred.

[Applause.]

When did Porter get the 4.30 order of the 29th?

Now, it is a remarkable fact that Griffin states in his testimony that they started back and had gotten a mile and a half when they were ordered to face about and make an attack. This was evidently in consequence of Porter's reception of the 4.30 order, which was peremptory.

Col. Benjamin F. Smith, of the Sixth United States Infantry, Sykes's division, states that—

They had marched on the Gainesville road some few miles and then halted, Morell being in advance, and subsequently received orders to march back in the direction whence they had come; that they then retraced their steps to a point near Manassas Junction and camped in the woods.

The 4.30 o'clock order was as follows:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
August 29, 1862—4.30 p. m.

Your line of march brings you in on the enemy right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds. The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as we engage their flank.

Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back do so to your right and rear, so as to keep in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

To Major-General PORTER.

Porter received this order as early as 6 o'clock or 6.30 in the afternoon. It was August, and the sun was still shining brightly. He did not obey this order. His excuses for disobedience are, first, that he did not receive the order until it was too late in the day to obey it; and secondly, that Longstreet was in his front and he could not obey it. If the first excuse be true, there is no need of the second. But conscious guilt sometimes will pile up excuses until one breaks down the other. It is true that the evidence is conflicting as to when he received this order. Captain Pope (General Pope's brother) says that he delivered it at 5 o'clock in the morning. Duffee, the orderly, who was with Captain Pope, puts it at 5.30. That Porter did not really believe it was too late when he received the order is shown by the form of his order to Morell. It is as follows:

General MORELL: I wish you to push up two regiments, supported by two others, preceded by skirmishers, the regiments to be at intervals of two hundred yards. Attack the party with a section of battery opposed to you. The battery works well on our right, and the enemy are said to be retiring by the turnpike. Give the enemy a good shelling when our troops advance.

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

This order was issued in consequence of the one from Pope. Morell says in addition to this written order he received another verbal order to attack, but both orders were soon countermanded, and before Porter arrived at the head of the column.

When the order was received by Porter he was at Bethlehem church.

Colonel Locke says (page 131) that he carried the order to Morell just after Porter received the 4.30 order from Pope. Why was it, I ask, that the orders to attack were countermanded before Porter had arrived at the head of the column? You look in vain for any testimony that throws any light on this subject. He had received no news from the front, and he had received no order from his superior countermanding his order to attack.

Morell says, continuing his testimony:

Before I got the main body in condition to move the order was countermanded, and I was directed to remain where I was during the night. General Porter himself came up a few minutes afterward and remained with me some time.

There must have been two hours at least of daylight remaining after Porter got this order. The next excuse is, that there was a large force of the enemy in front of him. Now, the only evidence that Porter had on which to base his action was the clouds of dust that Rosser's troops had kicked up and the information of Buford that seventeen regiments and a party of cavalry had passed through Gainesville on their way to re-enforce Jackson. The fact is that neither Porter nor any of his officers really knew what was in front of them, and what was worse, they made no attempt to ascertain. First, as to what his officers knew. In Porter's note to McDowell and King, before quoted, he referred ominously to the clouds of dust, which created great perturbation of mind. Morell also speaks of the clouds of dust, and so does Griffin. A reconnaissance as early as 11 a. m. would have shown Rosser with a few troopers on the turnpike, with brush tied to the tails of their horses, galloping up and down the road for the express purpose of fooling a Yankee general.

Very likely at this time, if he had pushed far enough ahead, he would have found Longstreet's force striding in with that long sweeping step which an eager soldier falls into when he hears the cannon bellowing in his front and knows that his comrades are in the death-struggle of an engagement.

As far as Morell is concerned, it does not appear that he made any attempt to find out, or was ordered to do so, at or soon after 11 a. m., when he halted at Dawkin's Branch. After a while he sent some skirmishers across the branch, and this was all he did.

Griffin, who commanded the leading brigade, threw the Sixty-second Pennsylvania to the right, and "at this point General Porter rode up, and we halted." There they staid.

Griffin says further:

I made no reconnaissance myself. Colonel Marshall was somewhat alarmed, for he says that when he threw his regiment across the road, about 2 p. m., the head of a large column came into sight in his front, which at 3 o'clock deployed skirmishers and threw him back, and that this force was twice as large as Porter's; he could not, however, see this force, for they were in the woods, but he judged of its size from the dust they made. The point to which I call particular attention is that Marshall did not convey this information to Porter, because, he says, "after dark Porter sent for me and questioned me very stringently as to the enemy."

Lieutenant Stevenson says when he crossed the country from Pope's left to Porter's front he saw a large force, from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand, about half a mile from Marshall's skirmishers. And being questioned, says: "He does not remember speaking to any one about it when he arrived at Porter's command."

I have made no reference, thus far, to the single trooper who came down from Gainesville and met Porter's force near Dawkin's Branch, and reported that the enemy's skirmishers had just arrived at Gainesville. Hence I say that Porter did not inform himself, and took no proper steps to learn, what was in his front. In the next place, I say that if Longstreet had been massed in his front when he received the order to attack, "keeping well closed toward the right and in communication with General Reynolds," it was his duty to have made the attempt.

The overshadowing fact, however, is that this soldier, this petitioner, this corps commander, sat all day in the presence and hearing of an awful engagement in which six thousand men on our side alone were killed and wounded, and did absolutely nothing. If they had been in the condition of the Assyrians after the Angel of Death struck them, they could not have performed less service than they did. If he had developed the force in front of him—presuming that there was such a force—would not this menace have kept Longstreet from throwing his whole force, or a great portion of it, against the weary and battle-worn battalions that had been fighting so long?

A reconnaissance or advance on Porter's part would have been reported to Longstreet at once, and every one acquainted with the characteristics of that old soldier knows that he would have found out what was hanging on his right flank before proceeding to weaken his own column in order to succor Jackson. But the testimony of witnesses may be conflicting. Man's recollection is faulty at best, but when you get hold of an act performed at the time no failing recollection can wipe that out. Porter, therefore, by his own act conclusively shows that he had no knowledge of Longstreet's presence in his front, for when he ordered Morell to attack he confined him to four regiments and a battery. It is hardly to be presumed that a sane man would send four regiments and a battery to attack an army corps of twenty-five thousand men. If he had thought they were there, does anybody suppose he would have sent this mere handful of men to attack them? It must be borne in mind that the language of the order is, that Morell is to "attack the party opposed to him." If he knew that the "party" he ordered Morell to attack was Longstreet's twenty-five thousand men, he must certainly have been mad upon that field. He would hardly have ordered up a bare section of artillery, either, to oppose Longstreet's corps if he knew they were there and was sane. Now, is it not perfectly evident that Porter believed that the section of artillery that had been opened on them in the morning by Rosser's cavalry and the dragoons which had fired on Marshall's line were all the enemy that were opposed to him at the time of giving this order?

Up to this time the evidence in this case has been confined to the testimony before the court-martial. The reports of the confederate officers, since published, fully sustain the testimony before the court-martial. Up to 11 o'clock there was certainly nothing in Porter's front except Rosser's cavalry; at 11, or shortly after, Longstreet's corps began to straggle up.

General Lee says in his official report that it took two and one-half hours to deploy this corps. This would bring it as late as 2 o'clock anyway. This, mark you, is the earliest time that it was possible for Longstreet to have been deployed in line. Stuart, on the morning of the 29th, when he left the confederate left, went in the direction of Thoroughfare Gap. He met Longstreet the other side of Gainesville. Stuart turned off in the Manassas road, while Longstreet kept down Warrenton pike, toward the rebel right. This is what forced Reynolds to change front. Meanwhile Stuart kept on down the Manassas road, and saw Porter's head of column. Stuart had nothing but cavalry, and they are the men spoken of by Marshall as "dragoons, troopers," and the like. Stuart took in the situation at once. He saw that if Porter was allowed to march up and attack the flank, or throw himself between Longstreet and Jackson, that utter rout and destruction would follow.

Now, this is what Stuart says of the situation at this time, that is, after he had discovered Porter:

I met with the head of General Longstreet's column between Haymarket and Gainesville, and then communicated to the commanding general General Jackson's position and the enemy's. I then passed the cavalry through the column, so as to place it on Longstreet's right flank, and advanced directly towards Manassas, while the column (Longstreet's) kept down the pike and joined Jackson's right. I selected a fine position for a battery on the right, and, one having been sent to me, I fired a few shots at the enemy's supposed position, which induced him to shift it. General Robertson, who, with his command, was sent to reconnoiter far down the road towards Manassas, reported the enemy in his front. Upon repairing to the front I found that Rosser's regiment was engaged with the enemy to the left of the road, and Robertson's vedettes had found the enemy approaching from the direction of Bristoe Station towards Sudley. The prolongation of his line of march would have passed through my position, which was a very fine one for artillery as well as observation, and struck Longstreet in flank. I awaited his approach long enough to ascertain that there was at least an army corps, at the same time keeping detachments of cavalry dragging brush down the road from the direction of Gainesville, so as to deceive the enemy—and notified the commanding general, then occupying a position opposite me on the turnpike, that Longstreet's flank and rear were seriously threatened and of the importance to us of the position I held. Immediately upon the receipt of that information Jenkins's, Kemper's, and R. D. Jones's brigades and several pieces of artillery were ordered to me, and being placed in position fronting Bristoe, awaited the enemy's advance. After exchanging a few shots this corps withdrew to Manassas, leaving artillery to hold his position until night.

A ruse which Porter shows was successful—

There was then nothing in Porter's front before Stuart's cavalry started out and made this reconnaissance. It developed the fact that Porter's corps was there; kept his (Stuart's) cavalry dragging brush to raise a dust; sent over to the pike, giving the information to Longstreet, and the latter issued orders and actually sent three brigades and a battery (Wilcox's) down to Stuart's aid. Now, this constituted the entire force that was in Porter's front when he received the 4.30 order. This was a much smaller force than Porter had himself. Porter had as much as two hours of daylight left, and if he had been inspired with the same zeal that actuated the rebel General Stuart he would have found time to win a victory before dark over the forces opposed to him.

Stuart does not give the time of day when these brigades joined him, but General Longstreet says in his report:

At a late hour in the day Major-General Stuart reported the approach of the enemy in heavy columns against my extreme right. I withdrew General Wilcox with his three brigades from the left and placed his command in position to support Jones in case of an attack against my extreme right. After some few shots the enemy withdrew his forces, moving them around toward his front, and at 4 o'clock in the evening began to press forward against General Jackson's position. Wilcox's brigades were moved back to their former positions, as were also Hood's two brigades. Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans's, were quickly pressed forward to the attack. At the same time Wilcox's three brigades made a like advance.

By this evidence of General Longstreet's it is clearly shown that there was nothing but Stuart's cavalry in Porter's front "until a late hour in the day." It is true it is indefinitely expressed; but, taken in connection with General Lee's report that it took them two and one-half hours to get into position at least after arrival in the field, it could not have been far from 1 or 2 o'clock. Porter, therefore, had two hours in which to have gone to the relief of our left.

General J. E. Johnston relates the following in his narrative:

When the United States troops paused in their advance within fifteen paces of the Texan front rank, one of their color-bearers planted his colors eight or ten feet in front of his regiment, and was instantly shot dead; a soldier sprang forward to his place and fell also as he grasped the color-staff; a second and third followed successively, and each received death as speedily as his predecessors; a fourth, however, seized and bore back the object of soldierly devotion.

If this had been the spirit that had actuated Fitz-John Porter on the 27th and 29th nobody can tell to-day how many of the boys that bit the dust then would be alive now. Nobody can tell how many widows' weeds, how many empty sleeves, how many weary crutches were made by the want of zeal on the part of that man that day.

What are we asked to do in passing this bill? We are asked to say that Abraham Lincoln, Edwin M. Stanton, and General Halleck conspired together to organize a court-martial to convict Fitz-John Porter, whether guilty or not. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] refers to General William T. Sherman and his difficulty with Mr. Stanton to help him out of this dilemma in getting Fitz-John Porter restored to the Army. Ah, Mr. Chairman, General Sherman was true to his country; and while he and Mr. Stanton had a difficulty, yet I believe General Sherman would say to-day that he did not believe Stanton was untrue to himself, to him, or his country.

Now let me say a word to you and to the country. If these scenes are to be re-enacted here, there may come a time when the bugle blast of the Grand Army of the Republic, coming up from the side of their camp-fires, shall summon General Sherman to come out of his retirement and lead them to victory as he did before. [Applause.] The loyal North will demand this from him, or from some true and tried soldier of the Army, if such betrayal of trust is to be repeated here.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a persistent attempt made by Fitz-John Porter ever since Johnson's administration expired to get relief from the verdict of this court-martial. Everything that wealth and influence and ability could bring to bear has been done, and at last Porter undertook to prove that Mr. Lincoln was favorable to his restoration. But, Mr. Chairman, when they put his son, the present honorable Secretary of War, upon the stand, he testified that his father said, after a careful examination of the case, that instead of being cashiered Fitz-John Porter should have been shot. The following is his testimony, speaking of his father:

He gave me some account of the case as it presented itself to him, and either read to me or quoted to me, I don't recollect which, a note written by General Porter, as I recollect, to General McDowell. I never saw the note until this morning, so I give my recollection of it. My recollection is better than anything else. My recollection of the contents of the note is that it was in substance this, that General Porter wrote to General McDowell that he judged by the sound of the firing that our troops were beaten, and that he should therefore withdraw his corps from the field. That is my recollection of the contents of the note as given to me then. My father was exceedingly urgent or strong in his condemnation.

Q. As to the spirit of that note, what did he say?

A. I recollect one distinct remark that he made, but at what period in the conversation I do not now recollect. He said that the case would have justified, in his opinion, a sentence of death.

The sentence and approval of the court-martial proceedings are as follows:

And the court do therefore sentence him, Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter, of the United States volunteers, to be cashiered, and to be forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States.

D. HUNTER,
Major-General, President.
J. HOLT,
Judge-Advocate.

There being no further business before them, the court adjourned sine die.

HEADQUARTERS OF THE ARMY,

In compliance with the sixty-fifth article of war, these whole proceedings are transmitted to the Secretary of War, to be laid before the President of the United States.

H. W. HALLECK,
General-in-Chief.

The following are the orders of the President: "The foregoing proceedings, findings, and sentence in the foregoing case of Maj. Gen. Fitz-John Porter are approved and confirmed; and it is ordered that the said Fitz-John Porter be, and hereby is, cashiered and dismissed from the service of the United States as a major-general of volunteers and as colonel and brevet brigadier-general in the regular service of the United States, and forever disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States."

The names of the men who constituted the court-martial are given in the following:

By command of Major-General Halleck.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you ask us to reverse this action; ay, more; you ask more than that. You ask us, where James A. Garfield wrote "guilty" twenty-two years ago opposite the name of Fitz-John Porter, to blot it out and write "not guilty." You ask us to march to the tomb, Mr. Chairman (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair), that preserves the sacred dust of your predecessor, Abraham Lincoln, the man who saved the country from destruction; the man whose memory lies close to the hearts of your constituents and mine. You ask us to march to the door of his tomb, and where he wrote "approved" opposite the court-martial's findings, to reverse that by our puny efforts and write "disapproved." I refuse to do it. [Applause.] You can take part in that if you like. You may write that if you so desire. The people of this country will reverse your action and spit upon and spurn it. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Chairman, speaking for the one most interested, I express his deep regret for the unkind allusions to the living and the dead which have been made in the heat of this discussion. In his long search for justice he has carefully avoided any reflection upon those who have impeded him in the pursuit, and he refuses to accept any responsibility for these allusions, whether made by those who are friendly or those who are unfriendly to the bill. And may I not assume that if those who had made them had the floor they, too, would express their regret: the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] who has charge of the bill, that he reflected upon the great war minister, whose great faults history will pardon for his greater achievements; the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE], that, in his surprise at finding that a general on the board of examination viewed the evidence different from him, he intimated that he lookedat the evidence with an eye upon the Presidency; the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], that he checked the course of his strong argument to intimate that there was another general who wished to be reinstated; my colleague from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO], a young Rupert in debate, that he suggested that a conviction of the military incompetency of still another general was a universal condition of sanity; my peaceful friend from Michigan [Mr. HORR], that he confessed that he could think just as General Grant did in everything, except in military matters; and my neighbor here from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR]—but I can not give the time to recall all the illustrious names that have been unnecessarily dragged into this debate.

Could they all be eliminated it were better; and this case could stand or fall on its own merits. It is my duty to speak to-day for Fitz-John Porter because he is my constituent. It is at the same time a pleasure and an honor because he is my friend, and I believe him to be an honest man and a loyal soldier.

"The mills of the gods grind slowly" in his case.

It was twenty years last week (Monday) since the last signature was put to the verdict of a military jury which drove him out of the Army and made him a leper which his Government should never touch with an office of trust or profit. This verdict awarded him such infamy that for a while Iscariot and Arnold were his only competitors. A blundering Department furnished to an anxious President, a baffled Army, and an indignant people this sacrifice; and fifteen millions straining unto death to save their country in an hour of supreme despondency and gloom found a momentary relief in cursing the name of Porter.

Who was this sacrifice? One whose ancestry deserved well of the Republic; one, who as a boy of gentle heart and ways learned in the National Academy to hold a stain upon his honor as a wound, and to conceive all honor as sphered in loyalty to his country; one, who as a youth stood the most chivalrous and accomplished officer in a guild whose military code gives to the testimony of a member under oath no greater force than his formal declaration; one who in manhood won wounds and glory in the field, and who on the 27th day of August, 1862, as said the gentleman from Michigan, "stood the consummate flower of the American Army and its pride." This was the gentle, chivalrous, illustrious soldier who was thus lifted up into a storm of obloquy and reproach as a traitor to his country. What can he do? His fate is worse than Arnold's or Judas's. Arnold, hating his country, fled from it and received the rewards of treason; but Porter loves his country, and has no thought except of loyal service. Judas went out and died, conscience stricken; but Porter's conscience is clear, and remorse refuses to lead him to the field of blood. He does what an honest man ought, and only an honest man can do; he takes up his burden and bears it. He will live, and live down his wrongs. He will wait, and trust to God and his country for redress. He withdrew to the quiet of a New Jersey village and established his home. There he faithfully discharged all his duties, neither seeking nor shunning observation. He was a good husband, a good father, a good neighbor, citizen, and friend. That little village for twenty years has watched, honored, and loved the man. They have seen his eye grow sad and his hair grow white with hope deferred. But he never talked of his grievance nor asked for pity. He was fulfilling a sentence which, for such a man, Edward Everett truly said, was "in some respects worse than a sentence of death." This was his home life. His life abroad was a constant struggle to regain his good name. That was his mission, and he prosecuted it without pause or rest. On every proper occasion, in every proper place he declared his innocence, offered his evidence, and asked for examination. He began when, on the 3d day of September, 1862, immediately after the battle of Manassas, he repaired to Washington and demanded a court of inquiry. Lincoln granted it on the 5th of September, and here is the order, but neither Porter nor the world knew it until sixteen years afterward:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, D. C., September 5, 1862.

Ordered, That there be a court of inquiry to inquire and report as to—

First. Maj-Gen. Fitz-John Porter. Was he and his command in the battle of Friday, August 29, 1862, General Pope commanding United States forces; and, if not, where was he; and why was he not in said battle?

Second. Maj-Gen. William B. Franklin. Was he and his command in the battle of Saturday, August 30, 1862, General Pope commanding United States forces; and, if not, why was he not in said battle; why did he not march from Alexandria toward General Pope sooner than he did; and having marched, why did he not reach General Pope sooner than he did?

Third. Brig-Gen. Charles Griffin. Was he and his command in the battles of Thursday and Friday, August 29 and 30, 1862, General Pope commanding United States forces; and, if not, where was he; and why was he not in said battles, one or both?

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The court met three or four times and then "was adjourned indefinitely by order of General Halleck." Stanton gave no long rope to his courts when the people and the accused knew of them. He gave shorter rope when the people and the accused knew nothing of them. In this case he acted wisely. The War Department might hereafter need a court of a different sort. It did, and he furnished it months afterward. This was the first act of his mission, and we trust that this is the last—where he stands an old man at the bar of Congress, again declares his innocence, presents his proofs, asks for examination, and demands justice.

What was his crime? He did not obey an order of his superior to fight. And what was his defense? That the order came at night, and when it was too late to execute it. And second—for he was no coward, and only one man on this floor has been desperate enough to impute cowardice to him—and second, had the order come in time he would not have obeyed it, for its execution was the fruitless and assured destruction of his corps. I speak of one order. You say you have heard much of several orders. True, much in this House, but nothing in the report of the minority. The charges connected with the other orders brought into this discussion were so trivial and unimportant, and the answers to them were so complete and satisfactory, that the members of the committee to whom the opposition to this bill was intrusted, the prosecutors of this case, ignored them. Not so, however, the free lances on the floor, who found in this ocean of facts about the sky above and the earth beneath and the atmosphere between so fruitful a head of eloquence that the galleries thought they heard the famous chorus of the opera, "Let us talk about the weather." [Laughter.] Neither of these two orders was to fight. They were simply to march. Though not important enough to be mentioned in the minority report, as they have been the source of so much eloquence in the House, let me refer to them to escape confusion.

[Order No. 1.]

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock, and come forward with your whole corps, or such part as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas, and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch who will conduct you to this place. Be sure and send word to Banks, who is on the road to Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks, also, that he had best run back the railroad trains to Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction, leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately. If Banks is not at the junction, instruct Colonel Clary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run and post a regiment and section of artillery with it.

The first order was that General Porter should start at 1 o'clock on the morning of August 28, 1862, and march his force nine or ten miles to Bristoe Station, that it might there join at daybreak with the main army for the purpose of clearing the country between that place and Gainesville. General Porter, upon receiving it, summoned his generals and they looked at the state of affairs. The night was dark and misty; the road, surface and ditch, was blocked with wagons and cannons and their wrecks. It was doubtful if any effort made before the first glimmer of light would accomplish anything. It was certain that no effort could get the troops to Bristoe Station at daybreak, as was desired. These troops were fatigued and would need rest. They should be fresh for the all-day task of wandering in pursuit, which the order foreshadowed. The order showed, too, that the task to which they were summoned was not one of immediate importance. It was not a summons to a defense, or to an attack where great haste and exact punctuality was demanded. The order said that the enemy had already been driven back and was retiring. The task was to "clear the country" behind them. That task could begin as well any hour after daylight. These facts upon which that little council of war passed were not conjecture. Before the order was received Porter had sent out two aids to view the road and report. This he did in anticipation of orders, and when he and his associates decided that it was not wise to make the start at 1 o'clock, he promptly sent a messenger to Pope and informed him of the decision and its reasons. He started at 3 o'clock with the first glimmer of light that made the start practicable, and there is no evidence that loss resulted to anybody from the delay. Pope admitted in his testimony (volume 1, page 19) that it did no harm. The whole charge is so trivial that it was evidently brought as a make-weight, as something to buttress the main charge.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Generals MCDOWELL and PORTER:

You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run at Centreville to-night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall upon the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to rejoin the other divisions of his corps as soon as practicable.

If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be strictly carried out. One thing must be had in view, that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here by to-morrow night or next day. My own headquarters will be, for the present, with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

The second order was addressed to McDowell and Porter. It is the joint order. It directed that their forces should move toward Gainesville. And what is the defense? First, Porter might have disobeyed without censure, for it was a discretionary order. The order says, "If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order it will not be strictly carried out." The second defense is that it was carried out, for the order found Porter with McDowell, just where it ordered him to be. Says McDowell (volume 1, page 349): "I commanded Porter's corps and my own division. We there on the ground received the joint order which directed the very thing we had done." And Pope knew that this joint order had been obeyed, for in his dispatch numbered 26A (volume 1, page 329) he says so. Why, then, did gentlemen discuss this joint order which was executed, as say both McDowell and Pope? There would seem to be no reason except for the temptation to warm our blood with the battle-cries of McDowell, "Fight? That is what we are here for," and "You go in there." These are good cries either for the House or for the field, but they were better had they been uttered by McDowell on the field as they were repeated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] in the House, in a voice that could be distinctly heard; for General Porter never heard them; Lieutenant-Colonel Locke, chief of staff, never heard them; Captain Martin, of a Massachusetts battery; Captain Earle, Lieutenant Davis, and General Patrick never heard them; but, being all six by and present, did hear General McDowell say, "This is no place to fight a battle; you are too far off." And when General McDowell was recalled to explain the dilemma, that the three gallant officers did not hear "That is what we are here for," and to "Go in here," but on the contrary, "This is no place to fight a battle," what was McDowell's explanation? I repeat his very words:

I can not recollect precisely what occurred or what conversation or what words passed between us at that time. I can not say what language I used or how it may have been understood whilst talking on that. (Pages 217 and 218.)

Why did not the gentleman from Ohio declaim what General McDowell was heard to say, and not what he wished he had said? The cry "This is no place to fight a battle" would not be so good for the House but would have been a better order in the field; for it has never seemed to me a very creditable picture, even when painted by the gentleman from Ohio, to see McDowell take eighteen thousand men (ten thousand of Ricketts's, eight thousand of King's) from Porter, leave him with only nine thousand, and march away with his great force from the field, while he pointed to Porter in the opposite direction and said, "You go in there." It always seemed to me and to the world that McDowell, if either, should have gone in there himself. [Applause.]

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
August 29, 1862—4.30 p. m.

Major General PORTER:

Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if possible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds.

The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE.
Major-General Commanding.

And now for the order of 4.30, an order which the minority report did discuss. Upon it stands or falls the guilt of Porter. This order required Porter to fight. It instructed him to attack the enemy on his flank and, if possible, on his rear. He did not attack the enemy on his flank or on his rear. And what is his defense? First, he received the order after 6 o'clock at night, when it was too late. But, again, Porter, notwithstanding the cowardice with which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] taunted him, chooses to accept a braver defense, and admits that had the order come in time he would not have made the attack.

First, as to the time that this order was received. Before the court-martial there was no documentary evidence to fix it. There was much oral testimony, and some of it conflicted. The vast preponderance, however, seemed to establish the fact that Porter received it at sunset. Major-General Sykes says he was present when the order was delivered, and says, "It was as near sunset as I can remember." Colonel Locke, too, saw the delivery, and says it was between sundown and dusk. Captain Monteith, too, was present; he says it was sundown. The testimony of these three officers joined with that of General Porter would seem to be sufficient. But before the advisory board, sixteen years afterward, some new dispatches of Porter were produced. General McDowell produced one which is marked as No. 38 P. The whole context of this dispatch shows that Porter was at the time of writing it without any information from Pope, and eagerly awaiting it. He pleads, "Please let me know your designs." After McDowell had presented it to the board and it had been read, Porter with a listless curiosity took it up, when his eye fell upon the date obscurely written in the corner "August 29, 6 p. m." This settles the matter. The 4.30 order was not received until after 6 p. m., August 29, 1862. It was received later, and, if later, it was received too late to make the attack if directed.

But had it been delivered earlier, as it ought to have been, Porter would not have made the attack. He could not make it. He could not attack upon the flank, much less upon the rear, of Jackson's force, as he was ordered to do. He knew that a great force had come to Porter's front of which the order showed his commanding general knew nothing. This new force of the enemy blocked his way, and he could attack the flank or the rear of Jackson only by annihilating the force of Longstreet. Longstreet had twenty-five thousand men in front of Porter; Jackson had twenty-three thousand in front, but to his right; and Porter had what McDowell had left him, nine thousand. Porter could attack and lay their bodies at the feet of Longstreet's guns. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] thought he ought to have done so, as he thought that the charge at Balaklava was war and not a spectacle. Porter thought otherwise, and his opinion seems to have been approved by General Grant, General Schofield, General Terry, and General Getty. He must bear this difference of opinion between himself and the gentleman from Indiana in such company as this. [Laughter.]

It is charged that Porter did not know at that time that Longstreet's forces were before him. What evidence shows that he had this knowledge on the afternoon of the 29th of August, 1862? First, the whole tenor of his dispatches shows that he had watched the progress of the enemy's forces and had been constantly expecting Longstreet's appearance. On the 27th Porter says in a dispatch, No. 20, "Everything has moved up north," and says that he gets his information from an intercepted letter of Lee's. McDowell knew it, and said that Longstreet was coming through Thoroughfare Gap (volume 1, page 349), and McDowell says he told Porter all he knew. Again, in the dispatch that Porter sent at 6 o'clock, August 29, asking Pope for information, he says:

> From the masses of dust on our right, and from reports of scouts, I think the enemy are moving largely that way.

Earlier in the day Porter had captured prisoners from Longstreet's army. At noon McDowell showed him Buford's dispatch, which said that a large force had passed Gainesville, only three miles off, before 9 o'clock that morning. (Volume 1, page 82.) At about that time the enemy fired musketry at McDowell and Porter while their forces were together, and during all that afternoon Marshall and Morell were flying over the country testing the enemy at every point, and reported in a dozen messages that they found him everywhere present in front and in strong force. (Dispatches 29 to 31, both inclusive, volume 1, pages 333 to 335, 380 to 382.) These were the means by which Porter gained his information and he testified that he had it before the court-martial in 1862:

> To begin, the fundamental averment of the order upon which it all rests is entirely untrue. That averment is that my line of march as pursued under the joint order above referred to brought me in on the enemy's right flank. The fact is that my line of march as so pursued brought me not in on the enemy's right flank, but it brought me directly upon the front of a separate force of the enemy from ten to fifteen thousand strong, of the presence of which thus directly in my front General Pope, when he wrote the order, was wholly ignorant.

Do gentlemen want better evidence than this? Here is Pope's announcement on the 27th that the enemy is coming. Here is McDowell's testimony that he knew on the morning of the 28th that the enemy was coming through the gap. Here are prisoners taken on the morning of the 29th, and here are Marshall and Morell in a dozen messages in the afternoon of August 29 confirming his knowledge. And here, as well as anywhere else, let me say that I do not find that the new testimony, whether obtained from loyal or Union sources introduces anything new. It only serves to confirm what Porter and his witnesses had testified to in the trial.

These were the offenses. What was the court-martial that passed the sentence? It was composed of nine soldiers, gathered hastily in this city out of the gloomy atmosphere of defeat. They sat within the roar of the enemy's artillery and their faces were black with the smoke of battle. They were honest and honorable men, but they were human, and when a stern Secretary of War who made and unmade generals at his will ordered them to vote and go, they voted and went. When they voted, they gave, just as you and I would have done, to their country the benefit of the doubt. They sat forty-five days; they gave the accused thirteen days out of them. They neglected to produce any of his witnesses for whom he asked, but Stanton's order was read in the morning and they closed the testimony that day and went.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] said this was a "most august tribunal." Has he forgotten the Long Parliament and its prompt obedience and adjournment at the command of Cromwell, compared with which this "august tribunal" was a slow coach?

They voted and went. The world will never know but that it was by a vote of five to four that Stanton got his will. I hope it was not so. For one judge left the bench and went to the witness-box to testify for conviction, and four other judges received promotion within two weeks of the time they rendered their judgment. I wish the world on this point might appropriate the exclusive information of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON]. He says "the nine able generals who tried him with all the essential facts before them said there could be but one verdict." This is the information that we want, the unanimity of the nine generals, but unfortunately it is confined to that gentleman, and history may not appropriate it. He has, too, exclusive information, for which Englishmen would pay a million of pounds. They would give that or more to make Admiral Byng a subordinate and the commander of a single ship. It would wipe out a bloody page in British history, and the stinging epigram of Voltaire, who thought that the English had to kill every now and then a brave admiral to encourage the rest. [Applause.] The gentleman from Michigan had, also, exclusive but this time inaccurate knowledge of the course of history. He says "impartial history will declare that there could be but one verdict," yet the report of the minority which he signed calls attention to the opinion of a writer which it calls "a careful military historian, the author of perhaps the best history of our civil war that has been written." The report says that "he was supplied with ample facilities to inform himself and so situated that he can and does write without prejudice or passion. This historian, the Comte de Paris, writes:"

> Impartial history should censure Lee's lieutenant rather than Pope's for his inaction during the 29th; and whether the latter did or did not neglect the orders of his chief, it must be acknowledged that Porter's mere presence in front of Longstreet condemned forces outnumbering his own to remain inactive which otherwise might, with great advantage to the confederate cause, have been employed to attack Porter or to re-enforce Jackson.

How happened my accurate friend from Michigan to make this great mistake? It came naturally from the unwillingness of his side to look at any new evidence. He read the first edition of this history, which censured Porter, and neglected to read the new edition, where the princely author, having read the new evidence, dared, like Grant and Schofield and Terry, to change his opinion in the presence of new and conclusive facts. And inasmuch as the ability, fidelity, and impartiality of the Comte de Paris have been so generously avouched by our opponents, let me read what was his final opinion:

> His attack—

Speaking of that which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] wished him to make on the night of August 29, so that the country might have seen another Balaklava—

> His attack, therefore, could not have produced the results upon which the general-in-chief had counted. In spite of the impossibility of his executing literally Pope's order, and whatever may have been the orders given him by McDowell during the day, Porter might undoubtedly have pressed the enemy more closely. Perhaps he might even have obtained a partial success before Wilcox's arrival. But under no circumstances could this movement have had the slightest effect upon the result of the engagement which was now taking place on the right of the Federal Army, for Longstreet could have resisted Porter with forces superior to the latter without being obliged to detach a single man from that engagement. Therefore impartial history should censure Lee's lieutenant rather than Pope's for his inaction during the 29th, &c.

But it is scarcely fair to leave the gentleman from Michigan alone to bear the errors which the side he so ably but inaccurately defended have everywhere made. I have time now to allude to a misrepresentation, unintentionally made, of the opinions held with reference to the conduct of the trial by Reverdy Johnson. One gentleman assumed that this august tribunal, which closed its evidence upon the day that the Secretary of War ordered, which sent one of its judges to the witness-box and saw four others promoted within two weeks of the verdict, was all right, because Reverdy Johnson had said:

> Whatever may be the result, neither General Porter nor his friends can have any ground of complaint against the court. I consider the trial to have been perfectly fair.

This would have been a great help to the character of this august tribunal had it been true; unfortunately it was a newspaper story; fortunately I have the newspaper in which it was published, and across its lying face are written these words: "False, absolutely false. R. J."

Here is the newspaper, and here is the indorsement, and here is the letter written by Reverdy Johnson, in which he says:

> I have obtained a copy of the Chronicle, and inclose you the article on the reply. The fact it states as to what I said in the presence of high officials of the Government is entirely false.

The generals who sat on the court-martial voted and went back to the fight. They hoped they had done their duty, but feared. Their uneasiness increased when lawyers, soldiers, and States began to examine their report. They examined it sitting apart from the noise of battle and they weighed calmly the evidence. Lawyers like Daniel Lord, Sidney Bartlett, B. R. Curtis, J. G. Abbott, William D. Shipman, and Charles O'Conor declared over their own signatures that the original verdict was against the original evidence. Said Daniel Lord:

At the time of General Porter's trial I read the proceedings with astonishment at the testimony received and acted on, and am convinced that the trial was substantially conducted on an order to convict.

Said Judge Curtis:

I think General Porter was improperly convicted on the evidence before the court which tried him, and he is at liberty to use this opinion when and where he chooses.

Said Bartlett:

You are entitled to my judgment in the matter, which is that the evidence fails to support the charges against you, and that acquittal instead of conviction should have been the result.

Said Abbott:

The finding of the court seems to me so unwarranted by the whole evidence that I should be glad to think it was the judgment of a tribunal utterly illegal and not recognized by the laws of the land.

Said Judge Shipman:

With all deference to the members of the court, I thought then, and still think, their conclusions unwarranted by the evidence.

Said Charles O'Conor:

I am convinced that a new trial ought to be had in the case of Fitz-John Porter. There is no adequate evidence of the misconduct alleged, and the record leaves it very doubtful whether any opinion was ever formed against him which can justly be regarded officially authoritative.

These lawyers, in writing, without pay, over their own signatures, thus declare that on the original evidence Porter's should have been acquitted, and asked that the President of the United States should open the case. The President who put the last signature to the verdict expressed to a governor of New Jersey his ardent wish that it might be opened.

Governor Newell writes to Governor Randolph:

I had several conversations with President Lincoln. The President was much interested, and said cheerfully that he would gladly grant a reopening if any new evidence exculpatory of General Porter could be adduced. He said that he had no prejudice, but had been obliged to form his opinion from Judge Holt's examination, as in his multitude of cares he had not been able to make a personal investigation.

The charge has been made that notwithstanding these sentiments President Lincoln refused an application for a review of the case. No application was ever made. A few months after the judgment of the court-martial Edward Everett, Robert C. Winthrop, Amos A. Lawrence, and others, of their own motion and without the knowledge of General Porter, prepared an eloquent memorial to the President, in which they asked him to reconsider the proceedings of the court-martial. The memorial got into the newspapers, as anything signed by such illustrious names naturally would, but was never presented. General Porter heard of it and sent his earnest request to Mr. Everett that no such action should be taken. He said wisely that it was premature. Another, who became President, and whose presence upon that court-martial gave its decision greater weight, on the 18th of January, 1875, moved in this very House that a board of examination might be appointed who should receive the new evidence which was offered. He introduced this resolution unsolicited, and wrote to General Porter that he believed it would be adopted; and here is the resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to convene a board of officers of high rank in the Army, unconnected with the armies or transactions in question, to examine the evidence alleged to have been discovered by and to be in the possession of Fitz-John Porter, unattainable at the time of this trial, and report what, if any, bearing such evidence, if substantiated, would have in the findings and sentence of court-martial in his case.

And here is the letter, with that signature so familiar and so dear to many of us. I present it now because it has been made public before:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 19, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Your two letters came duly to hand, together with the pamphlet. I owe you an apology for not answering you sooner.

I introduced the bill to which you refer, not because I was conscious of any intentional wrong done you by the court, for I have never concurred in the severe reflections which have from time to time appeared in the public press on the motives and conduct of that court; but I am willing that any new evidence you may have shall be presented to the Government in an official form, and reported to the President by a board of officers who were in no way connected with the trial or with the operations of the army to which the trial related.

I have spoken to several members of the Committee on Military Affairs, and understand them to be willing to report the bill to the House. They have not yet had an opportunity to do so, but I hope they will before the session closes.

I shall consider your pamphlet as confidential, unless you otherwise direct me.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. A. GARFIELD.

General FITZ-JOHN PORTER,
Morristown, N. J.

Gentlemen who have used their wit to belittle the dignity and methods of the advisory board and claim great friendship for General Garfield would employ their wit better in telling how it differs from the board proposed in this resolution by him. Garfield proposed that the President should appoint. Garfield proposed that the appointees should be officers of high rank in the Army. Garfield proposed that this board should examine the evidence alleged to have been discovered by and to be in possession of Fitz-John Porter, unattainable at the time of his trial, and report what, if any, bearing such evidence, if substantiated, would have in the findings and sentence of the court-martial in his case. How does the advisory board here proposed and described differ from the one whose report is before us? There has not been even an attempt to show the difference. One gentleman, when pressed, exclaimed, "Garfield meant to have no such board as this."

Two of the board were so prejudiced against the accused that they at first refused to serve. Did the gentlemen object because one of the judges had no prejudice? This resolution introduced by Garfield shows that he was willing to have the proceedings of the court-martial open and its findings reviewed by an advisory board. And unless our opponents can destroy the records of the Forty-third Congress they should cease their efforts to misrepresent his position. I draw my conclusions from this public act of General Garfield. As his friend, I can not produce his private letters to show how near under provocation he came to breaking the secrecy on which honor shut his lips, and if I did this dishonor to his memory I should want to find something stronger for my case than the Cox letter, where he says:

I have not yet made, in the light of the new testimony, a careful strategic study of the field and map as you have done.

Can there be a stronger comment on the impropriety of this practice than the effort to claim an opinion from General Garfield out of a letter in which he admits that he had made no careful study of the subject? I, too, have letters, and they have allusions to this subject not unfavorable to the side I advocate. Here are two of them, but they are marked "personal;" and I will not read them to hurt the dead that I may help the living.

A third President listened, approved, and acted. He named a board of examination just like that suggested by Garfield. He put on it "officers of high rank in the Army, unconnected with the armies or transactions in question." He put on it Generals Schofield, Terry, and Getty, men whom the gallant Sherman declared to be "officers than whom three better do not exist in the Army." They made, as Garfield suggested, "an examination of the evidence alleged to have been discovered by and to be in the possession of Fitz-John Porter, unattainable at the time of this trial," and they reported that the bearing of such evidence should reverse the findings and sentence of the court-martial in his case. They had new evidence from the confederates against whom General Porter was ordered to march. They had new evidence in the dispatches of General Porter which had been concealed or withheld. They had accurate maps of the ground and the disposition of the forces. On these they report and acquit Porter of all guilt. Gentlemen hesitate because they are unwilling that the proceedings of this court-martial, this august tribunal, should be reviewed. They claim that the review of a court-martial is unconstitutional. I do not agree with this view. They speak as if court-martials were the Supreme Court, and established by the Constitution. They were, however, created by the Legislature, and the power that created can review, correct, or destroy. But the action of the House to-day is not a review of the court-martial or its proceedings. We are hearing no appeal from that court. We are exercising a frequent and undisputed right. We are putting into the Army of the United States an illustrious general whose services there will be valuable to the Commonwealth. If our action seems to reflect upon the view of General Porter's merits which the court-martial expressed, that is an unpleasant discrepancy between that board and this House. Let the verdict stand and go into history. But outside of the courts and irrespective of that court's decision the world now knows and admits that General Porter was a good soldier and suffered a wrong. And Congress, recognizing the inexorable logic of facts, accepts the conclusion and completes a pardon which the Executive began. [Applause.] It were as well to claim that the pardon of the President overruled the court-martial as that our action in restoring General Porter has overruled it.

The advisory board did not sit to review the trial of the court-martial. They sat to review a case in which the parties were the same, but the evidence was very different. Their report contributed to that general conviction and that popular knowledge on which with the report we are acting. On the facts derived from this report and elsewhere we are asked to restore General Porter to his position in the Army. He does not ask money for services he was always ready and willing to perform. He does not ask compensation for suffering and loss almost unparalleled in history. He only asks that the ranks of the Army from which he was driven should be open to receive, and that the sword which was taken from him should be placed at his side. Shall this scanty justice be refused him? While I make the appeal I pause to admit his faults—serious faults, but excusable; faults, but not crimes. He was not a traitor. Punish him if, in his anxiety to furnish the information for which Burnside, McClellan, and Lincoln constantly pressed him, he spoke with a frankness and freedom which was characteristic of his nature but contrary to the military discipline when he spoke of one who was his superior in the field. Remember that dispatches were coming from Lincoln, from McClellan, from Burnside, saying that their only knowledge of the momentous events transpiring in the front must come through him, and that, in grateful obedience to three men whom he especially honored and trusted, he wrote just what he thought; and remember, too, that history has stamped just what he thought and wrote as the truth. For this breach of military discipline, however, let him be punished. He had no faith in his commanding officer, and he improperly communicated his suspicions and dislikes to the President of the United States and to his commander-in-chief. This was an offense, and so was Washington's, when on the hot Sunday at Monmouth he cursed General Lee loudly for his cowardice or folly. But this offense is slight and has been already punished. Don't think of this little fault. Think of his great virtues. Remember how he fought on the 30th! That order came in time and from a superior who at last had learned his surroundings. And with Porter at their head the Fifth Army Corps charged into the gates of hell, and into the jaws of death. This was magnificent, and this was also war—war at its sternest. They went in six thousand—they came out leaving twenty-two hundred on the field. It was a loss to Porter of twenty-two hundred friends, for the Fifth Army Corps was, and is to-day, and while one veteran survives will be, the faithful, unfaltering, loyal friend of its gallant commander. Give him back to them. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the chief of the rebellion walked down the steps of this Capitol threatening to return and destroy it. He attempted its destruction and failed. Yet Jefferson Davis walks in freedom. Men who penned our soldiers in Andersonville and Libby still live.

Officers trained at West Point, whose treason is not investigated, for they practiced it from the Mississippi to the Potomac, sit in this House. Shall Porter, innocent in heart if erring in act, alone be punished? Must he be a sacrifice for a nation?

The hero of Mexico and Malvern and Manassas asks only for justice; if you refuse him justice, I plead, against his wishes, for mercy. Take this innocent man from the side of Judas and Arnold and place him by the side of those who honor him—by the side of Getty and Sykes and Terry and Schofield and Grant. [Long-continued applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I find myself in the somewhat embarrassing position of controlling the last hour of the time on this side of the debate, for a portion of which applications have been made to me by six or eight gentlemen whose names were on the list of speakers and whom I am unwilling to deprive of the opportunity of being heard. I must, therefore, necessarily abandon the purpose of attempting to discuss the merits of this case in anything like detail. In fact, Mr. Chairman, in the few moments which I shall occupy under the stress of this limitation of debate, which is to be regretted in the disposition of so important a case, I may hardly hope to do more than perform a duty which I believe I owe to my native State, to the soldiers of my State, including many gallant members of the Fifth Army Corps, who desire to have their protest entered here against the passage of this bill.

We have heard from major-generals and brigadier-generals and private soldiers, and the assertion has been made here by the gentleman from New York in charge of this measure that of all the soldiers in Fitz-John Porter's command not one can be found to join in his condemnation. It would have been my pleasure, as well as my duty, had time afforded, to have cited a satisfactory refutation of that fact from the mouths of a number of witnesses, as true and worthy soldiers as ever fought beneath the flag. Suffice it to say that among all the soldiers of my State, with whom I have a somewhat familiar and friendly acquaintance, I have received but one communication in favor of the passage of this bill, while on the other hand I have received numerous protests, among them an urgent letter lying upon my desk to-day from a gallant cavalryman of the glorious First Maine, who sat his horse by the side of Fitz-John Porter as his orderly on the 29th of August, 1862, and who writes to me to express the sentiment of indignation and astonishment which he says was almost universally felt among the troops at the inaction of their general and his failure to give the enemy battle on that day. Another and similar protest comes to me from a brave sergeant of the Second Maine Infantry, who, like his comrade, says it was believed by the soldiers that Porter did not mean to support Pope. So much for the alleged unanimity of the testimony on the part of the soldiers in favor of Fitz-John Porter.

Mr. Chairman, if this measure has been based or rested upon one consideration more than another it has been upon a statement of the opinion recently given by the great commander of the Union armies, General Grant, who seems to be regarded with so much and such unwonted enthusiasm on the other side of this Chamber for the purposes of this debate.

The groundwork of the argument here for Porter has been the assertion of the doctrine by the board of review, which is alleged to be indorsed by General Grant, that a corps commander in time of war is justified in using his discretion in regard to obedience to his orders. Now, I undertake to say that the declaration that a subordinate military officer in time of battle, in the face of the enemy, is justified in using his discretion as to obeying an explicit and peremptory order of his lawful commander is one of the most astonishing propositions ever put before the American people. I assert that it found its contradiction in every fact and in every act of the successful prosecution of our war.

But, Mr. Chairman, when the proposition is presented upon so eminent an authority as that of General Ulysses S. Grant it naturally requires something besides mere assertion of dissent to meet and counteract it. I declare that General Grant's statement in behalf of Fitz-John Porter is in contradiction of the very principles upon which he himself conducted the great operations that resulted in the suppression of the rebellion.

I appeal from the special pleading of General Grant in this case, so persistently pressed upon his sympathy, to the testimony of General Grant in another case where the fortunes and reputation and honor of as gallant an officer as ever wore uniform were at stake. General Gouverneur K. Warren, of the Fifth Army Corps, which he commanded subsequently to Fitz-John Porter, was superseded at the battle of Five Forks just as the genius of victory was about placing the wreaths of final triumph upon our national standards, just as fruition was coming to the gigantic military efforts of four long years. General Warren was removed from his command at the supreme moment of national victory; he was placed under the cloud of suspicion and disapproval; and when he had rested for long years under this opprobrium and had unsuccessfully sought for a removal of the censure, at last a board of inquiry was ordered in his case, and among the most important witnesses on that occasion was General Ulysses S. Grant.

Now, I will not go into the merits of this case of General Warren. That gallant soldier is dead. He sleeps enshrouded in the flag to which he was never false. He sleeps embalmed in the affections of the people whom he served with fidelity and ability for four long years. He sleeps beloved by the men whom he so often and so nobly led into battle. He sleeps with but one reflection upon his memory, the complaint—which is also earnestly denied—that he was a little tardy upon that occasion; and for that he was denied a share in the glories of Appomattox and put under rebuke while others were receiving the plaudits of the people.

Mr. Chairman, when the time came to vindicate or relieve that gallant officer, who had become stricken by disease incurred in the service of his country, and who was yearning for the vindication which had been delayed so long, General Grant was called as one of the principal witnesses; and I want to read to you from his testimony to show what General Grant's opinion was in the case of General Warren in regard to the duty of subordinate officers. I read from the testimony of General Grant, proceedings of the court of inquiry, page 1041:

Q. As far as you recollect was the reason of your requesting General Meade to send that additional dispatch the fact that you alluded to before, that you had no one to send yourself?

General Grant answered:

It would be impossible for me to answer now from recollection just what I did. I know through the whole of the day from the time General Sheridan was sent off to my left flank until Five Forks was carried I was watching their every movement and everything that was done, doing all I could to aid. I was sending orders here and there to one army and another.

Please note that he was not giving orders simply to subordinates in his immediate vicinity, but that he was sending off orders to one "army" here and another "army" there—

I was sending orders here and there to one army and another, wherever I judged there was an opportunity of putting it in; and I wanted my orders promptly obeyed and generally had them.

That he generally had his orders obeyed will be freely testified by many of his officers now seated on the floor of this House. But says General Grant in addition:

Where officers undertook to think for themselves and considered that the officer giving them orders had not fully considered what everybody else was to do it generally led to failure or delay.

I do not hesitate to say, Mr. Chairman, that is the doctrine, that is the essence of the military code which carried the banner of Ulysses S. Grant from Donelson to Vicksburg and from the Wilderness to Appomattox. It was the doctrine of obedience to orders, and I appeal from the special pleading of General Grant in behalf of Fitz-John Porter to his sworn declaration of his faith and his practice in the case of Gouverneur K. Warren.

If it were necessary to add emphasis to this terse statement of the necessity for prompt and implicit obedience and for the vesting of absolute authority in one commanding and directing head in time of battle, I might cite the language of that other great military chieftain, William Tecumseh Sherman, who, in reviewing this case as General of the Army, July 15, 1882, said:

It would be an unsafe and dangerous rule to hold the commander of an army in battle to a technical adherence to any rule of conduct for managing his command. He is responsible for results, and holds the lives and reputations of every officer and soldier under his orders as subordinate to the great end—victory. The most important events are usually compressed into an hour, a minute, and he can not stop to analyze his reasons. He must act on the impulse, the conviction of the instant, and should be sustained in his conclusions if not manifestly unjust. The power to command men and give vehement impulse to their joint action is something that can not be defined by words, but it is plain and manifest in battles, and whoever commands an army in chief must choose his subordinates by reason of qualities which can alone be tested in actual conflict.

No one has questioned the patriotism, integrity, and great intelligence of General Warren. These are attested by a long record of most excellent service; but in the clash of arms at and near Five Forks, March 31 and April 1, 1865, his personal activity fell short of the standard fixed by General Sheridan, on whom alone rested the great responsibility for that and succeeding days.

My conclusion is that General Sheridan was perfectly justified in his action in this case, and he must be fully and entirely sustained if the United States expects great victories by her armies in the future.

Apply the rule and the logic of these clear-cut declarations of Grant and Sherman to the case of Fitz-John Porter, and the attempt to argue in favor of restoring him to the position he forfeited will appear worse than ridiculous. Their words warn us that the excusing, not to say glorifying, of such insubordination and failure of duty as that for which Porter was cashiered by a general court-martial will strike a dangerous if not fatal blow at the discipline and morale of our Army. To apply the phraseology of General Sherman, the verdict of that court-martial "must be fully and entirely sustained if the United States expects great victories by her armies in the future."

The other theory of justifying a disobedience of orders in time of war, in presence of the enemy, upon the strength of evidence of the military situation discovered many years after, unknown to the delinquent officer at the time and largely furnished by the enemy who were benefited by the delinquency, seems to me a novel and dangerous one.

I think the American people will hesitate still some time before condemning General Grant for crushing the rebellion because distinguished officers of the confederate army and other eminent Democrats have expressed very emphatic disapproval of his strategy and its results.

We are not quite ready to admit that the march of Sherman from Atlanta to the sea was a blunder because the English language has proved inadequate to the expression of the disgust of our late confederate brethren at the unmilitary and unchivalrous character of such a tramp across the heart of the enemy's country.

I should not even be willing to expunge the record of Farragut's magnificent passage of the forts at Mobile Bay because in the opinion of the confederates the torpedoes laid across the channel ought to have blown his fleet to splinters. How easy it would now be to obtain testimony that under the circumstances Farragut as a prudent commander ought to have stopped his fleet when the Brooklyn, in the lead, discovered that the line of sailing led directly across the dead line of the submarine batteries, and when the iron-clad Tecumseh, striking one of them, lurched and went down, with all on board, within a stone's throw of his own vessel. Yes, it would be easy to prove how strong the defenses were and how desperate the attempt to force them; but the picture we choose to bear in mind is not that of a cautious and inglorious retreat; we love rather to remember the grand old Admiral as he stood in the shrouds above the smoke of battle and gave the order for his own glorious Hartford to take the lead, and, signaling the fleet to follow the flag-ship, stormed the gateway of Mobile with his wooden squadron, as he before had forced the fiery entrance of the Mississippi.

Lives might have been temporarily saved and bloodshed spared if the commander of the devoted six hundred had asserted discretion and refused to ride to death amid the awful guns at Balaklava. But the example of such a failure to obey would have cost England thousands of lives in subsequent operations, and history would have failed of one of the most magnificent examples of devoted valor. Had the commander of the Light Brigade failed to obey, and afterward spent years in appealing for justification, he would never have formed the theme of immortal verse, nor furnished the model for heroism to his countrymen. Better for him, better for humanity, even though "some one had blundered," that while gallantry has a historian he and his men will be remembered as they rode splendidly "into the jaws of Death" for the honor of the flag and the glory of old England.

Mr. Chairman, lack of time prevents me from saying some other things which I would like to have said. Permit me simply to advert to one remarkable phase in this discussion. I must say that I have sat here with feelings akin to indignation when I have listened to the use that has been attempted to be made of the name of the late President Garfield in this debate. We have had the political foes of General Garfield citing him here as in behalf of the dishonoring of his own verdict, and we have had men of his own political household attempting to make us believe that in some way General Garfield would approve of the putting of this stigma upon his own memory.

Mr. Chairman, we all know that General Garfield was a magnanimous man. We all know that his liberality knew no bounds. We all know that his political mistakes, such as they were, came from his overgenerosity. There is no fact fresher or more painful in American history than that the only leaves that have withered upon Garfield's tomb have been the olive branches that he offered to his enemies.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] has undertaken to make it appear that General Garfield is in some way the author of and sponsor for this measure, which stigmatizes one of the most important actions of his life. Such injustice to his memory is in keeping with the only kind of return that General Garfield ever received for the magnanimity that he so constantly displayed. How much has the party of the gentleman from New York testified its appreciation of General Garfield's great-hearted political liberality? It was shown in 1880 when their national committee instructed their hirelings and scavengers to crawl on all fours from the slums and the gutters of every city of the Union from San Francisco to New Orleans and to write upon the curbstones and door lintels insults to the integrity of James A. Garfield.

A MEMBER. That is clear.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman says "that is clear." It is. It is also clear that in New York in the same year the representatives of the same party attempted to pay another installment of their debt of gratitude to the great, liberal, and conciliatory leader of the Republican party by deliberately endeavoring to fix upon him the authorship of an infamous forgery. That is the reward that General Garfield has received.

And here to-day we have men endeavoring to make us believe that the murdered President, if he could speak, would desire that the verdict of his court-martial should be reversed and dishonored. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I know something of General Garfield's feelings in regard to this case. I have talked with General Garfield myself in regard to it. I have talked with the dearest friends he had on this earth. I have talked within twenty-four hours with one close friend who bent over him as the last feeble, fluttering breath forsook his lips; and they all bear testimony that to the last moment of his life General Garfield felt the injustice of the finding of this "board of review" as the greatest and most grievous wrong that had ever been put upon him.

I protest against the false pretense of bringing the name of James A. Garfield in here to-day to assist in the desecration of Garfield's memory. I protest against invoking that great shade in behalf of casting a stigma upon Stanton and upon Lincoln. I protest in the name of the loyalty of this country against the attempt made to roll back the tide of years and to brand the patriots of 1862 while rewarding the traitors. I protest against the verdict about to be rendered here—no, it will not be a "verdict." I protest against the vote to be given here, and declare that in no sense can it be held a vindication of Fitz-John Porter. I assert as my solemn belief, and certainly upon a firm and unyielding conviction, that Fitz-John Porter never could be vindicated by the votes of the representatives of the loyal people whose flag he betrayed in the face of the enemy. [Applause.]

I now yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I think I have discovered, in the short time I have been a member of this House, a disposition on almost every hand to reverse all that the people did in the days of the war and the years immediately following. The first gentleman who addressed the committee upon this question [Mr. SLOCUM] made the assertion, and it has been quoted on both sides of the House from time to time, that Fitz-John Porter was tried in a time of passion; that his case did not have that consideration which would have been given to it had he been tried when the passions of the people had subsided after the war had ended. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] reiterates it; and I think almost every gentleman who has undertaken to defend Fitz-John Porter on this floor has assumed about the same position.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS], who so well closed the debate on the other side, tells this House that he comes here and speaks in defense of Fitz-John Porter because Porter is a constituent of his. I wish this whole question was referred back to his constituents, and that Fitz-John Porter could go where he could be properly vindicated, by the people.

I pity Fitz-John Porter; my heart goes out to him in pity. Therefore I would not have that mockery of commendation, that mockery of vindication, which must, of necessity, come from this House if this bill shall pass. The vindication which Fitz-John Porter should seek is a vindication from the people.

Now, I know of no better State for an appeal to be made with a greater certainty for vindication than the State of New Jersey. It is in that State where lives the man next to him, the man who approached nearest to him in treachery in that hour when Fitz-John Porter fell; the State where George B. McClellan was vindicated. I am in favor of remanding this whole question back to New Jersey, where Fitz-John Porter may be vindicated by the people and their suffrages, and that would be a vindication worth something to him.

Mr. Chairman, between the 26th and 31st days of August, 1862, on the "Plains of Manassas," there was fought a series of battles resulting in great disaster to the Union arms. They were disastrous on account of the great loss in men and materials; they were disastrous because they served to reveal a spirit of jealousy, envy, and chicanery among officers high in command so bitter and so deep-seated as to demoralize the army and dishearten the people. Twenty thousand men had bled and died in vain; twenty thousand stand of arms had gone into the hands of our enemies. The capital of the nation was threatened, and at least one of the great captains upon whom the nation depended to lead her armies had proved himself much more willing to sacrifice his country for his own aggrandizement than to sacrifice himself for his country's glory.

The campaign which ended in this great calamity really opened on the 18th day of August. On that day at 4 o'clock began the retreat induced by the necessity of the situation. General Pope had received such information as satisfied him that Lee—no longer menaced by the Army of the Potomac under McClellan—was about to throw his whole army with crushing force upon him and to cut his communication with Fredericksburg and the capital. He immediately fell back to the north side of the Rappahannock. Here he made a stand, and until the 22d resisted successfully all attempts of the confederates to cross the stream.

There were of his forces on that day less than forty thousand men of all branches of the service. He at once notified the commander-in-chief of his perilous situation and asked for re-enforcements. These were promised within two days. At the same time he was urged to contest the ground on his retreat, so that the entire force then on its way from Harrison's Landing could reach the field before a general engagement. Thus assured, General Pope continued his perilous retreat until the 26th of August, when he reached the plains of Manassas. Although of the entire time there was hardly an hour when some portion of his command was not engaged, he held the advancing host so well in check, that on the latter day he had reached ground, without serious loss, where he should have been met with all the men and materials necessary for a successful termination of the campaign.

This great success was achieved by tireless vigilance on the part of the general and by heroic endurance on the part of his men. I venture the assertion—and I base it not only upon recorded history but upon personal observation—that of the troops of Pope's command who gave their lives to their country in that heroic struggle more than one-half of the number never laid aside the harness of war from the 18th day of August, when they buckled it on, until the hour they fell in death upon the fated fields of Manassas.

Such was the skill, the heroism, and the endurance that brought the Army of Virginia through perils by night and perils by day upon soil where but for base treachery it had been rewarded with victory. But, sir, the promised re-enforcements came not. Though often urged and besought and commanded, McClellan hesitated and Porter delayed. The troops promised for the 25th began to come in small detachments only on the 27th. In the mean time Jackson had flanked Pope's right and played havoc with military stores at Manassas and was making off with his plunder.

On the 27th Hooker met the retreating columns of Jackson, under Ewell, and the first battle of the series was fought. At this time only three divisions of the Army of the Potomac—Hooker's, Heintzelman's, and Sykes's—had reached a point to be of use to Pope. Porter was, however, only nine miles from headquarters, and, with the other detachments of McClellan's command, marching in the direction needed, Pope had every reason to expect that with the exercise of reasonable speed, in the movement of his troops, he could fall upon Jackson, and before assistance could reach him from Longstreet defeat and scatter his forces. It was at this point of time that the order of 6.30, about which so much has been said, was written. Prior to its writing Pope had sent two precautionary orders explaining fully the situation to Porter and stating clearly and distinctly both the perils of the situation and the prospects of triumph, and urging upon him in the plainest possible terms the great necessity for prompt movement when the hour for the final order should come. Let me call the attention of the House to these orders. They are dated, respectively, August 26, 7 o'clock p. m., and August 27, 4 o'clock a. m., and are as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Warrenton Junction, August 26, 1862—7 o'clock p. m.

GENERAL: Please move forward with Sykes's division to-morrow morning through Fayetteville to a point two and a half miles of the town of Warrenton, and take position where you can easily move to the front, with your right resting on the railroad. Call up Morell to join you as speedily as possible, leaving only small cavalry forces to watch the fords. If there are any troops below coming up, they should come up rapidly, leaving only small rear guard at Rappahannock Station. You will find General Banks at Fayetteville. I append below the position of our forces, as also those of the enemy. I do not see how a general engagement can be postponed more than a day or two.

McDowell, with his own corps, Sigel's, and three brigades of Reynolds's men, being about thirty-four thousand, are at and immediately in front of Warrenton; Reno joins him on his right and rear, with eight thousand men, at an early hour to-morrow; Cox, with seven thousand men, will move forward to join him in the afternoon of to-morrow; Banks, with six thousand men, is at Fayetteville; Sturgis, about eight thousand strong, will move forward by day after to-morrow; Franklin, I hope, with his corps will by day after to-morrow night occupy the point where the Manassas Gap Railroad intersects the turnpike from Warrenton to Washington city; Heintzelman's corps will be held in reserve here at Warrenton Junction until it is ascertained that the enemy has begun to cross Hedgman's River. You will understand how necessary it is for our troops to be in position as soon as possible. The enemy's line extends from a point a little east of Warrenton Sulphur Springs around to a point a few miles north of the turnpike from Sperryville to Warrenton, with his front presented to the east, and his trains thrown around well behind him in the direction of Little Washington and Sperryville. Make your men cook three days' rations and keep at least two days' cooked rations constantly on hand. Hurry up Morell as rapidly as possible, as also the troops coming up in his rear. The enemy has a strong column still farther to his left toward Manassas Gap Railroad in the direction of Salem.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Maj. Gen. FITZ-JOHN PORTER,
Commanding Fifth Army Corps.

This order of Pope on the 26th shows that Porter was thus early notified of what was expected.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Warrenton Junction, August 27, 1862—4 o'clock a. m.

GENERAL: Your note of 11 p. m. yesterday is received. Major-General Pope directs me to say that under the circumstances stated by you in relation to your command he desires you to march direct to this place as rapidly as possible. The troops behind you at Barnett's Ford will be directed by you to march at once direct to this place or Weaverville, without going to Rappahannock Station. Forage is hard to get, and you must graze your animals as far as you can do so. The enemy's cavalry has intercepted our railway communication near Manassas, and he seems to be advancing with a heavy force along the Manassas Gap Railroad. We will probably move to attack him to-morrow in the neighborhood of Gainesville, which may bring our line farther back toward Washington. Of this I will endeavor to notify you in time. You should get here as early in the day to-morrow as possible, in order to render assistance should it be needed.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEO. D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER,
Commanding Fifth Army Corps.

What could have been more explicit than to say, as did Pope after explaining to Porter the disposition not only of his own but of Lee's forces, "You will understand how necessary it is for our troops to be in position as soon as possible;" and again, "Make your men cook three days' rations," and "Hurry up Morell as rapidly as possible, as also the troops coming in his rear," adding, "The enemy has a strong column still farther to the left" than before indicated. Was this an intimation to Porter that he could take his own time, that he could come to the front at leisure, as suggested by the West Point board and by General Grant's letter and by gentlemen on this floor?

THE ORDER OF 6.30.

Being thus forewarned of what might be expected at 6.30 on the 27th, Pope issued the following positive order and instructions:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA, BRISTOE STATION,
August 27, 1862—6.30 p. m.

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night, and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow morning. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about three hundred killed and wounded. The enemy has been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas, and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you, send word to him to push forward immediately; also send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary, on all accounts, that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch, who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks, also, that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Maj. Gen. F. J. PORTER, Warrenton Junction.

P. S.—If Banks is not at Warrenton Junction, leave a regiment of infantry and two pieces of artillery as a guard till he comes up, with instructions to follow you immediately. If Banks is not at the Junction, instruct Colonel Cleary to run the trains back to this side of Cedar Run, and post a regiment and section of artillery with it.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

In this order the military board profess to find something indefinite, something indicating the author's intent to leave in part the carrying out of his command to Porter's discretion. If regard is had to the language employed such a construction can not with any propriety be placed upon it. Still more absurd do such conclusions appear when we take into account Porter's familiarity with the preceding orders which made known the perilous situation and the imperative need of relief. Even if there had been no time stated in the order when Porter should report at Bristoe Station, all discretion was denied him when Pope designated the hour for starting. But when a limit is stated within which the journey should begin, and a time distinctly named when it should end and the command be at Bristoe for duty, all chance or possibility for doubt must be considered at an end. To assert, therefore, that the order left to Porter any discretion in the matter is to acknowledge dishonesty in the person making such assertion or to confess that he had not critically examined the order in question. Evidence by such a witness should have little weight with this House. The language is: "You (Porter) start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, so as to be here at daylight," and "it is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight. I send an officer to conduct you to this place."

That language so plain, positive, definite, and unequivocal should be tortured into a "discretion" only proves the straits to which the friends of Fitz-John Porter are pushed to find an explanation for his conduct on that occasion.

But, as if to place itself beyond the range of pity and secure the contempt of all mankind for its opinions, the reviewing board adds another justification for disobedience to this order which, if founded on fact, would make the former excuse still more absurd and ridiculous. It alleges that even if Porter had not been allowed discretion he could not have obeyed the order, because, first, the night was too dark to march; second, the road was impassable on account of previous rains; and third, that it was crossed by streams and blockaded with teams and wagons floundering in mud and stranded in the mire. It is needless to say that if Porter had been given discretion to march either at 1 o'clock or at 4, when he did march, it would be entirely unnecessary for the military board, or for General Grant, or for the gentlemen on the other side to furnish any other justification for the delay whatsoever. Why distort the facts, as sworn to by a multitude of witnesses, in order to find a second justification? The night was not so dark that Porter could not march over that road.

The testimony shows that though the night was at times cloudy there was no rain, and that troops in nearly every corps in the Army, both

Union and confederate, marched that night, and during the very hours when it is claimed Porter could not march on account of the darkness. To this effect was the testimony of General Butterfield, General McKeever, Col. Robert C. Cleary, Solomon Thomas, Captain Duryea, General Pope, General Myers, Major Duval, and a multitude of others. Henry Kidd Douglas, adjutant-general to Jackson, swore that Jackson's whole command marched from Centreville to a point near Groveton on this night. General Early corroborates this, and says he marched without experiencing any difficulty on account of the darkness. The following are a few among many who swore to the same effect:

Lieut. Edward Brooks, called by the Government, and sworn and examined as follows (general court-martial record, page 112):

By the Judge-Advocate:

Q. What is your position in the military service?
A. I am a first lieutenant of volunteers in the Sixth Wisconsin Regiment.
Q. State to the court, if you please, whether or not you were serving with the Army of Virginia on or about the 27th of August last.
A. I was.
Q. In what place occupied by that army were you on the night of the 27th of August?
A. I was at Bristoe Station and at Greenwich.
Q. Do you remember the character of the night; if so, will you state whether it was of usual or unusual darkness?
A. It was not very dark; not so dark but what I could find my way through the woods.
Q. Was or was not the night of such a character as to offer any unusual difficulties to the march of troops?
A. It was not.
Q. What was the general condition of the road from Warrenton Junction in the direction of Manassas Junction?
A. It was very good.
Q. Did you have full opportunities of ascertaining the condition of that road on the night of the 27th of August?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. What opportunities did you have?
A. I traveled from beyond Warrenton to Warrenton Junction, from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station; and after arriving at Bristoe Station I went across the country to Greenwich.
Q. Have you or not frequently passed over that road?
A. Very often.

Board record, page 640:

Col. Thomas F. McCoy, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, was examined, and testified as follows:

* * * * * * *

Q. Whose brigade and whose division?
A. Duryea's brigade, Ricketts's division, McDowell's corps.
Q. What rank did you leave the service with?
A. Colonel.
Q. Were you brevet brigadier-general?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where were you on the afternoon of August 25, 1862?
A. A little southwest of Warrenton.
Q. How late did you march that day and evening?
A. The 25th?
Q. Yes.
A. I don't think we marched on the 25th. We marched on the 23d.
Q. Until how late?
A. About 10 or 11 o'clock.
Q. On the 27th of August were you on the march late in the day?
A. Yes.
Q. Until how late did you then march?
A. All night; until 1 o'clock.
Q. What difficulty, if any, was experienced in marching that night?
A. We didn't have any difficulty in marching that night. There was a good deal of straggling among the soldiers.

Board record, page 861:

John P. Taylor, called by the recorder, having affirmed, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you live?
A. Reedsville, Pennsylvania.
Q. Were you in the military service of the United States in the month of August, 1862; if so, in what capacity?
A. I was captain of the First Pennsylvania Cavalry at that time.

* * * * * * *

Q. Have you ever been over the road from Warrenton Junction to Bristoe Station?
A. Yes; quite frequently.
Q. What was the character of that road from Warrenton Junction to Catlett's in 1862?
A. It is on the left side of the road from Warrenton Junction to Catlett's. There is a stream that passes between Warrenton Junction and Catlett's, I think at a distance not to exceed a mile.
Mr. BULLITT. Had the witness been over this road frequently before that?
A. Yes; I encamped at Catlett's in the spring of 1862 for some three weeks, immediately after the enemy vacated Manassas. We were there three weeks before the advance moved to Fredericksburg.
Q. Go on and describe the character of the road as it then was from Warrenton Junction to Catlett's Station.
A. There is a stream passes down between Warrenton Junction and Catlett's and a railroad bridge crosses there, and some trestle-work, but above the bridge it is almost level country for some miles west. At that time there was a strip of woods that came down near Catlett's—a narrow strip of woods. We had moved all over that ground for a mile west of the railroad.
Q. Then coming from Catlett's to Bristoe, what was the character of the road?
A. That is nearly a vast plain most of the way. There are two streams, I think—small ravines—but the country is a vast plain. General Gregg moved his division of cavalry a mile to the north of the railroad, in the night, from Bealeton to Auburn, about two or three miles north of Catlett's.
Q. Across the country?
A. Yes; across the country about a mile, where there was no road.
Q. At that time could wagons go on each side of the road?
A. There were roads some distance there on each side of the railroad, and wagons and troops moved frequently in column.
Q. More than one road?
A. O, yes; the troops had made roads. Sometimes one road would get bad, and they would go off and make another road. The country was such they could have one almost any place.

I. H. Duval, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Wellsborough, W. Va.
Q. Were you in the military service of the United States in the month of August, 1862? If so, in what capacity?
A. I was major of volunteers, First West Virginia Regiment.
Q. Whose brigade and division?
A. I was in the fourth brigade, Ricketts's division.
Q. Where were you on the evening of August 27, 1862, and what did you do?
A. On the evening of August 27 I was with my brigade. We were about four miles, I think, northwest of Warrenton at that time—north or northwest—and I was directed by my colonel to carry a letter that he handed me from General Ricketts to General Pope.
Q. To what point?
A. It was supposed to be somewhere near Centreville. That was my order.
Q. What did you then do?
A. I started and made the trip and delivered the letter.
Q. You left the camp about what time?
A. Nearly dark. It was after sundown.
Q. What road did you take?
A. I came back to Warrenton, and I followed then the road running from Warrenton in the direction of Catlett's Station. I was directed to go that way and keep out of the way of the enemy.
Q. Did you pass through Warrenton Junction?
A. No, sir; I struck the road at Catlett's.
Q. What direction did you then take?
A. I took the road leading from Catlett's Station to Manassas Junction by the way of Bristoe.
Q. Where did you find General Pope?
A. I found General Pope near Manassas Junction.
Q. What was the character of that night?
A. I don't know that I recollect distinctly in regard to that. I rode all night, though, until about 3 o'clock in the morning, when I took a little rest. I had no particular difficulty in finding the way.
Q. From Catlett's Station to Bristoe did you meet with any obstruction to your movements?
A. There were a great many wagons along the line; there were some troops, but I went along without any particular obstruction. There were no obstacles that kept me from going.
Q. Did you have any escort with you?
A. No, sir.

Board record, page 586:

William E. Murray, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testifies as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. Winchester, Ind.
Q. Were you in the military service of the United States in the month of August, 1862; if so, in what capacity?
A. Yes; I was a member of Company C, Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers.
Q. In whose brigade and division?
A. Gibbon's brigade, King's division.
Q. Where were you on the night of August 27, 1862?
A. On the night of the 27th our regiment was encamped near New Baltimore; a little to the north, I think, of New Baltimore. That is, we stopped there about 10 o'clock, perhaps.
Q. How long had you been marching before you made that halt on that day of the 27th?
A. We had been marching, I think, most of the day; not continuously, but back and forth.
Q. From sunset, how much of that time had you been marching up to 10 o'clock?
A. I am unable to state the distance.
Q. Were you marching during that time?
A. We were moving most of the time.
Q. Did you keep to the road or in the fields, or both.
A. Generally to the road, except where we would meet obstructions in the way of cavalry or artillery; kept mainly in the roads.
Q. How was it after dark?
A. Much the same.
Q. Do you recollect the character of the roads at that time, as to whether they were dry or muddy?
A. I don't remember any mud; I think they were generally dry.
Q. Do you recall what the character of the night of the 27th of August was?
A. There was no moon, according to my recollection, but it was clear; we could see objects plain enough.
Q. At a great distance?
A. A rod or so.
Q. How much of that night were you up after coming to a halt at 10 o'clock?
A. I should think that I did not lie down till near midnight.
Q. Up to that time, do you recollect what the character of the night was, as far as distinguishing objects was concerned?
A. My recollection is that it was the usual starlight night.
Q. Up to that time, during that night, what difficulty, if any, did you experience in marching?
A. No particular difficulty.
Q. How was the regiment, so far as its formation was concerned, on that march after sunset?
A. I think they kept their formation about as well as usual.

Board record, page 591:

William M. Campbell, called by the recorder, was sworn and examined, as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. State your residence.
A. I reside in Randolph County, Indiana.
Q. During the month of August, 1862, were you in the military service? If so, in what capacity?
A. I was in the military service, and in the Nineteenth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, Gibbon's brigade, King's division.
Q. Where were you on the evening of August 27, 1862?
A. We were marching from the direction of Warrenton to Centreville, on a road that led in that direction, as far as I knew.
Q. On what is called the Warrenton, Gainesville, and Centreville pike?
A. I think that was it; that is my recollection of it.
Q. How late did you march?
A. We marched until after night. I could not state how late it was, because I did not have any timepiece. It was after night when we stopped.

* * * * * * *

Q. What was the character of the night?
A. It was an ordinary night, without moonlight; that is my recollection about it: nothing extraordinary in any way, only an ordinary night, such as we had a good many of in Virginia about those times.

Q. How far could you distinguish objects?
A. We marched our regiments in companies, and got along without any difficulty that I recollect of. How far we could see I could not say.

Board record, page 597:

J. H. Stine, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testifies as follows:

Direct examination:

Q. Where do you reside?
A. I reside at Winchester, Randolph County, Indiana.
Q. During the month of August, 1862, were you in the military service of the United States? If so, in what regiment?
A. I was in Company C, Nineteenth Indiana Volunteers.
Q. Where were you on the afternoon, evening, and night of the 27th of August, 1862?
A. We started from Sulphur Springs near noon and marched north through Warrenton, going through there about 3 or 4 o'clock, and on north toward the Bull Run battle-ground.
Q. At what time did your regiment halt?
A. We marched quite a time after 9.
Q. Where was the rest of the brigade?
A. The whole brigade was together.
Q. Where was the rest of the division?
A. I took a great interest in the history of the movement of troops, and that day we were understood to be going into battle; I don't positively recollect whether the whole of the division went into camp or not; I know the next day we were not together all the time.
Q. In marching during that evening what difficulty, if any, did you experience in getting along?
A. None, particularly.
Q. Did you keep to the road?
A. Mainly we did, though sometimes we didn't.
Q. Do you recollect what the character of the night was on the 27th of August, 1862?
A. My recollection is that from, say 8 to 10 o'clock—it was maybe toward from 8 to 11—it was not so light as afterward.

William Birney, called by the recorder, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

Direct examination:

Question. Where do you reside?
Answer. Washington city.
Q. In the month of August, 1862, what rank did you hold in the service of the United States?
A. I was major of the Fourth New Jersey Regiment; I commanded the Fifty-seventh Pennsylvania.
Q. You finally left the service with what rank?
A. Brevet major-general.
Q. Early that month I believe you were taken prisoner?
A. No. sir; I was taken prisoner at Gaines's Mill.
Q. When did you assume command of the Fifty-seventh Pennsylvania?
A. Immediately after my exchange. If my memory serves me, I was exchanged on the 13th of August, and took command about the 15th.
Q. In whose division were you then?
A. Commanding the Fifty-seventh; I was in Kearny's, Heintzelman's corps.
Q. Where were you on the night of August 27, 1862, and the morning of the 28th?
A. I was in camp, a little north of the Alexandria railroad.
Q. Did you march any that night; if so, when, and for what length of time?
A. We marched that night, but the exact hour of starting I can not recollect. We marched some time before daybreak, and in the direction of Bristoe Station.
Q. How many hours is it your recollection, about, that you marched?
A. I can not now say. I recollect marching some distance.
Q. What difficulty, if any, did you experience in marching that night, from the character of the night or the character of the roads?
A. I recollect no particular difficulty about the road.

The testimony I have quoted is taken almost at hap-hazard, and is in substance like the entire mass of evidence upon this point. What, then, becomes of the assertion that the night was so dark Porter could not march? It remains not only unsupported by evidence, but it is affirmatively established that whole brigades and divisions marched on that night without difficulty. The only darkness that prevented General Fitz-John Porter from obeying the command of his superior was in his own heart, where it had thriven under the malign influence of envy, jealousy, and ignoble ambition!

But it is claimed as an excuse for disobedience that the roads were muddy and that they were obstructed by a wagon-train, neither of which assertions is true. At the time when the order was delivered the rear end of the train was already three miles from Porter's headquarters and going in the direction he was ordered to march. The train would have from say 10 until 1 o'clock at least to increase this lead, so that if Porter had started at 1 o'clock, when ordered, he could hardly have overtaken a single wagon if they had not been parked. But that there should be no excuse for delay whatever, Pope gave instructions to his quartermaster, General Myers, to order the trains into park, thus leaving the roadways on both sides of the railroad open for the passage of the troops. General Myers swears that this order was carried out; that the trains went into park and remained until daylight, long enough for Porter to have passed his entire corps between Warrenton Junction and Bristoe. But this is not all; between these two points there is a railroad track along which Porter could have moved his troops if he had desired, even if the whole wagon-train had been on the roads. A desperate effort is further made to prove that the night was rainy. That there was a sprinkle of rain may be possible, but that it fell in sufficient quantities to retard in the least the advance of troops on the night of the 27th is disproved by innumerable witnesses.

The frantic efforts to manufacture a rain-storm for that night only show how thoroughly the friends of Porter are pushed to find a palliation for his offense. The only rains of any consequence during the whole of that memorable campaign were on the nights of the 22d of August and 1st of September. The rain of the 22d was a succession of very severe thunder-storms, so copious as to make a flood in the Rappahannock and prevent Pope from recrossing that stream, as he had previously determined to do. These showers cooled the air, and there was neither severe heat nor rain until the battles of Groveton and Bull Run. The battle of Chantilly occurred on September 1, and was fought not only in the rain but much of it in the dark. These were the only rains that occurred in the whole campaign beginning August 18 and closing September 1. Any man who will deliberately swear that there was such a rain on the night of the 27th as to impede the movement of troops in the least (unless he does so under an entire misapprehension), will swear to anything for the accomplishment of his purpose.

MUDDY ROADS.

Neither were the roads muddy. I marched along this road on the 23d of August, the day following the heavy rains of the 22d, and even at that time there was not sufficient mud to impede the progress of the march. August rains, unless they continue many days, in that part of Virginia never convert the roads into mud, unless heavily traveled while the rain is falling. The soil is sandy and light, and the rains of a night are all lost in the streams before morning. By this I do not mean to be understood as denying the existence of mud-holes where small unbridged streams crossed the roads. I remember distinctly that there were a few such places on that stretch of road, places that would hinder and delay teams. But that there was mud to hinder to any considerable extent the advance of troops, even in the night-time, I most emphatically deny, and in this I am clearly supported by the testimony, part of which I have already quoted.

Neither the darkness of the night, the rains, the mud, the wagons, nor any other thing in the heavens above, on the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth interfered with the execution of Pope's orders, save only the purpose in Porter's heart to destroy his superior officer.

Porter was ordered to move at 1 o'clock. At what time did he move? My friend from Massachusetts says at 3, a trifling delay of only two hours, but even then there was only a half-hearted order given that his troops be ready to move at that time, and in fact they did not move until daylight, and even at sunrise Porter was seen, like Cæsar, "in his tent"—not on "a summer evening" but on a summer morning, all unconcerned, and still at Warrenton Junction! And yet my friend calls this a reasonable compliance with the order, only such a divergence therefrom as may be permitted by the laws of war. Sir, I would like to see such a law. I have not been able to find it. I believe it exists only in the fertile imaginations of the West Point board and of those who accept its conclusions as both fact and law.

My friend says Porter was not needed at Bristoe, for when he finally reached that place at 10 o'clock he was not used! Indeed! How is this to be inferred? Because he was of no use to his country at 10 o'clock, does it follow that he would not have been of the utmost service at 4? The exigency that demanded his presence at 4 had passed at 10. Less than six hours wasted when troops are moving into position for a fight have lost the greatest battles in the annals of war. Sir, Waterloo had its hesitating Grouchy, Bull Run its Patterson, and Groveton its Fitz-John Porter! It remained, however, for the latter to bear into history a name tarnished not only by hesitancy, but ineffaceably stained by disobedience in the crucial hour of his country's destiny.

But now, for the sake of the argument, and that we may have a start from the same premises, suppose we admit as true all that was portrayed by the vivid imagination of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McADOO]—that the night was dark as Erebus, the road a sea of mud whereon floundered and floated in helpless confusion three thousand army wagons and six thousand army mules! Suppose all the "oak-cleaving thunderbolts and the cataracts and hurricanoes" that met old King Lear on the heath were out that night to "drench the steeples and drown the cocks," the face of nature was not thereby destroyed nor were the marks of time obliterated. It is still written history that more than twenty thousand men marched that night to the orders of their commanders toward the plains of Manassas, and in the record of events there remains debited to Porter's account the fact that he neither marched nor tried to march.

Now, sir, I am free to admit that were this all, and were we permitted to forget the motive underlying Porter's disobedience—a motive clearly shown in the several letters written by Porter to Burnside (which I shall have published with these remarks)—I could see my way clear to vote for this bill. I would not by my vote condemn any man who had previously borne an honorable record for a single act of disobedience except under peculiarly aggravating circumstances or where an evil motive is indisputably evident. Unfortunately, the circumstances of this case are not only peculiarly aggravating, but an evil motive unquestionably existed. Fitz-John Porter disobeyed not one order but many. His motive manifested its hideous presence not in one letter but in many.

SECOND BRANCH OF THE CASE.

Having fallen so far out of time as to be of no use to his country on the 28th of August, Porter, after reaching Bristoe, at his own request, was permitted to rest himself and his men during the whole of that day. Mr. Chairman, I desire here, and before presenting the next branch of the case, to remark that the great ado made over the wearied condition of Porter's men on the night of the 27th is in my opinion little less than an insult to the American soldier.

If the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCADOO] has so poor an opinion of a soldier's endurance and of his willingness to sacrifice for his country, he has much yet to learn concerning both. That gentleman actually argued to this House that it was a piece of unpardonable cruelty to ask Porter's men to march on the night of the 27th, because they had already marched eighteen miles that day! Why, sir, there were thousands and tens of thousands of soldiers in that glorious Union Army who marched sixty miles without sleep or rest! The soldiers under Porter on that night needed but the order of their commander and they had moved to Bristoe without a murmur.

There is some difference of opinion among the lawyers as to whether the motive shall be proved before or after the main facts. In this case I am not driven to a decision upon this point. The offenses of Porter are many; I can place the "motive testimony" in the middle, and flank this on either side by the other testimony that points to his offenses. I ask permission here to read the several letters of General Porter written on the 27th, 28th, and 29th of August:

WARRENTON, 27—p. m.

To General BURNSIDE:

Morell left his medicine, ammunition, and baggage at Kelly's Ford. Can you have it hauled to Fredericksburg and stored? His wagons were all sent to you for grain and ammunition. I have sent back to you every man of the First and Sixth New York Cavalry except what has been sent to Gainesville. I will get them to you after a while. Everything here is at sixes and sevens, and I find I am to take care of myself in every respect. Our line of communication has taken care of itself, in compliance with orders. The army has not three days' provision. The enemy captured all Pope's and other clothing; and from McDowell the same, including liquors. No guards accompanying the trains, and small ones guard bridges. The wagons are rolling on, and I shall be here to-morrow. Good night!

F. J. PORTER, Major-General.

WARRENTON JUNCTION, August 27, 1862—4 p. m.

General BURNSIDE, Falmouth:

I send you the last order from General Pope—

That is, the order he had received before—not this 6.30 order that he had received the night before, but another order—directing him to move up the troops—which indicates the future as well as the present. Wagons are rolling along rapidly to the rear as if a mighty power was propelling them. I see no cause for alarm, though I think this order may cause it. McDowell moves on Gainesville, where Sigel now is. The latter got to Buckland Bridge in time to put out the fire and kick the enemy, who is pursuing his route unmolested to the Shenandoah or Loudoun County. The forces are Longstreet's, A. P. Hill's, Jackson's, Whiting's, Ewell's, and Anderson's (late Huger's) divisions. Longstreet is said by a deserter to be very strong. They have much artillery and long wagon trains.

The raid on the railroad was near Cedar Run, and made by a regiment of infantry, two squadrons of cavalry, and a section of artillery. The place was guarded by nearly three regiments of infantry and some cavalry. They routed the guard, captured a train and many men, destroyed the bridge, and retired leisurely down the road toward Manassas. It can be easily repaired. No troops are coming up, except new troops, that I can hear of. Sturgis is here with two regiments. Four were cut off by the raid. The positions of the troops are given in the order. No enemy in our original front. A letter of General Lee, seized when Stuart's assistant adjutant-general was taken, directs Stuart to leave a squadron only to watch in front of Hanover Junction, &c. Everything has moved up north. I find a vast difference between these troops and ours. But I suppose they were new, as they to-day burnt their clothes, &c., when there was not the least cause.

I hear that they are much disorganized, and needed some good troops to give them heart, and, I think, head. We are working now to get behind Bull Run, and, I presume, will be there in a few days, if strategy don't use us up. The strategy is magnificent, and tactics in the inverse proportion. I would like some of my ambulances. I would like, also, to be ordered to return to Fredericksburg and to push toward Hanover, or, with a large force to strike at Orange Court-House. I wish Sumner was at Washington, and up near the Monocacy with good batteries. I do not doubt the enemy have large amounts of supplies provided for them, and I believe they have a contempt for this Army of Virginia. I wish myself away from it, with all our old Army of the Potomac, and so do our companions.

I was informed to-day by the best authority that, in opposition to General Pope's views, this army was pushed out to save the Army of the Potomac, an army that could take the best care of itself. Pope says he long since wanted to go behind the Occoquan. I am in great need of ambulances, and the officers need medicines, which, for want of transportation, were left behind. I hear many of the sick of my corps are in houses on the road very sick. I think there is no fear of the enemy crossing the Rappahannock. The cavalry are all in the advance of the rebel army. At Kelly's and Barnett's fords much property was left, in consequence of the wagons going down for grain, &c. If you can push up the grain to-night please do so, direct to this place. There is no grain here to-day, or anywhere, and this army is wretchedly supplied in that line. Pope says he never could get enough. Most of this is private.

F. J. PORTER.

But if you can get me away, please do so. Make what use of this you choose, so it does good.

BRISTOE, August 28, 1862—9.30 a. m.

General BURNSIDE, Falmouth:

My command will soon be up, and will at once go into position. Hooker drove Ewell some three miles, and Pope says McDowell intercepted Longstreet, so that without a long détour he can not join Ewell, Jackson, and A. P. Hill, who are, or supposed to be, at Manassas. Ewell's train, he says, took the road to Gainesville, where McDowell is coming from. We shall be to-day as follows: I on the right of railroad, Heintzelman on left, then Reno, then McDowell. He hopes to get Ewell and push to Manassas to-day.

I hope all goes well near Washington. I think there need be no cause of fear for us. I feel as if on my own way now, and thus far have kept my command and trains well up. More supplies than I supposed on hand have been brought, but none to spare, and we must make connection soon. I hope for the best, and my lucky star is always up about my birthday, the 31st, and hope Mc's is up also. You will hear of us soon by way of Alexandria.

Ever yours,

F. J. P.

FOUR MILES FROM MANASSAS, August 28—2 p. m.

General BURNSIDE, Falmouth:

All the talk about bagging Jackson, &c., is bosh. That enormous gap, Manassas, was left open, and the enemy jumped through; and the story of McDowell having cut off Longstreet had no good foundation. The enemy have destroyed all our bridges, burned trains, &c., and made this army rush back to look at its line of communication, and find us bare of subsistence. We are far from Alexandria. Your supply train of forty wagons is here, but I can't find them.

There is a report that Jackson is at Centreville, which you can believe or not. The enemy destroyed an immense amount of property at Manassas—cars and supplies. I expect the next thing will be a raid on our rear by way of Warrenton by Longstreet, who was cut off.

F. J. PORTER,
Major-General.

This is the latest news.

BRISTOE, 29*th*—6 a. m.

General BURNSIDE:

Shall be off in half an hour. The messenger who brought this says the enemy had been at Centreville, and pickets were found there last night. Sigel had a severe fight last night, &c.

Pope went to Centreville with the last two as a body-guard, at the time not knowing where was the enemy and where Sigel was fighting—within eight miles of him and in sight.

The enormous trains are still rolling on. Many arrivals not having been watched for fifty hours, I shall be out of provision to-morrow night. Your train of forty wagons cannot be found. But I expect they know what they are doing, which is more than any one here or anywhere knows.

F. J. P.

Taken as a whole these letters speak volumes as to the condition of Porter's mind toward Pope. Here are five dispatches written within forty-eight hours. Each of them has something sarcastic about Pope, and each shows a purpose to do as little as possible in the conflict then inevitable. He thinks the confederates have a contempt for the Army of Virginia, and he wants to "be back with the Army of the Potomac, an army which is able to take care of itself." His contempt for the Army of Virginia seemed to coincide exactly with that of the confederates as interpreted by him.

On the 28th Porter seems anxious to know only that all "goes well at Washington," and that his own and McClellan's stars are in the ascendency. For the Stars and Stripes and for Pope's army and the Union he seemed entirely oblivious, though he closes by prophesying that "you will hear of us soon by way of Alexandria." Always sighing for Alexandria, McClellan, and Washington. As a part of this branch of the case, and to show how thoroughly indifferent was Porter to the great duties and responsibilities of the hour, I desire to read the testimony of Lieutenant-Colonel Smith.

Lieut. Col. Thomas C. H. Smith's testimony is as follows:

By the JUDGE-ADVOCATE:

Q. Will you state in what capacity you were serving in the Army of Virginia in its late campaign under General Pope in August last?

A. I was aid-de-camp on the staff of General Pope.

Q. Did you or not, on the 28th or 29th of August, carry any orders from Major-General Pope to Major-General Porter which concerned his movements on those days?

A. I did not.

Q. Did you or not see General Porter during either of the days of the 27th, 28th, and 29th of August?

A. I saw General Porter on the afternoon of the 28th.

Q. At what place and under what circumstances did you see him?

A. I had been sent back to the ammunition on the train at Bristoe and charged with its distribution. General Porter wished over four hundred thousand rounds; General Hooker something over ninety thousand rounds. About 2 or 3 o'clock I had sent forward to General Porter some three hundred and twenty thousand rounds, and had seized wagons to forward the balance, and left Captain Piatt in charge. The business being then sufficiently forward, I went on to find General Pope. On getting to the point where I had left General Pope in the morning, I found he had moved on, and, to inquire the road he had taken, I went to General Porter's headquarters, near the Manassas water-station. I found General Porter in his tent, and asked him which road General Pope had taken, and he informed me. I had some ten minutes' conversation with him. One of his staff was present; I forget his name.

Q. Will you state that conversation?

A. After asking him about the road, I told General Porter the amount of ammunition that I had sent forward to him, and also that the balance would come immediately forward. I asked him if he had received it, or made some remark; I can not remember the exact expression. General Porter said that he had not; that was the substance of his reply—either that he had received hardly any of it, or none of it, if I remember aright. I expressed some surprise, and said that it had been sent forward to the front as ordered; and, either in reply to some question of mine or to some remark, or of himself, he said that he had no officers to take charge of it and distribute it or to look it up, or something of that kind. I remarked that he could hardly expect us at headquarters to be able to send officers to distribute it in his corps; that it had been sent forward on the road in the direction where his corps was. He replied that it was going where it belonged; that it was on the road to Alexandria, where we were all going. I do not know as it is evidence to give the spirit in which this was said—the way it impressed me. Those remarks were made in a sneering manner, and appeared to me to express a great indifference. There was then a pause for a moment. General Porter then spoke in regard to the removal of the sick and wounded from the field of Kettle Run. He said it would hurt Pope, leaving the wounded behind. I told him that they were not to be left behind; that I knew that a positive order—an imperative order—had been given to General Banks to bring all the wounded with him, and for that purpose to throw property out of the wagons if necessary. To this General Porter made no reply in words; but his manner to me expressed the same feeling that I had noticed before.

This conversation, from General Porter's manner and look, made a strong impression on my mind. I left him, as I have said, after an interview of about ten minutes, and rode on, arriving at our headquarters on Bull Run just as we entered them, and pitched our tents for the night. After my tent was pitched, and I had had something to eat, I went over to General Pope, and reported to him briefly what I had done in regard to the ammunition. I then said to him, "General, I saw General Porter on my way here." Said he, "Well, sir." I said, "General, he will fail you." "Fail me," said he; "what do you mean? What did he say?" Said I, "It is not so much what he said, though he said enough; he is going to fail you." These expressions I repeat. I think I remember them with exactness, for I was excited at the time from the impression that had been made upon me. Said General Pope, "How can he fail me? He will fight where I put him; he will fight where I put him;" or "He must fight where I put him; he must fight where I put him"—one of those expressions. This General Pope said with a great deal of feeling and impetuously, and perhaps overbearingly and in an excited manner. I replied in the same way, saying that I was certain that Fitz-John Porter was a traitor; that I would shoot him that night, so far as any crime before God was concerned, if the law would allow me to do it. I speak of this to show the conviction that I received from General Porter's manner and expressions in that interview. I have only to add that my prepossessions of him were favorable, as it was at headquarters, up to that time. I never had entertained any impressions against him until that conversation. I knew nothing with regard to his orders to move up to Kettle Run. I knew nothing of any failure on his part to comply with any orders.

Q. State more distinctly the point where you saw General Porter on the 28th of August?

A. He was encamped at the Manassas water-station, between Bristoe and the junction. The water-station was a short distance from his headquarters.[1] (The witness indicated upon the map before the court where he thought the place to be.) I do not think the water-station is more than one-third the distance from Bristoe to Manassas Junction. That is my impression; I can not speak positively about it.

Q. In the conversation to which you refer, did or did not General Porter manifest any anxiety to get possession of, and have distributed in his corps, the ammunition of which you speak?

A. No, sir; I thought he showed an utter indifference upon the subject; showed it very plainly.

Q. At what hour of the day did this conversation between you and General Porter take place?

A. I think it must have been about 4 o'clock in the afternoon; half past 3 or 4 o'clock.

Now, sir, I would not attach much importance to the testimony of Colonel Smith but for the fact that there is cropping out through the action of Porter, as described by the witnesses, precisely the same spirit and the desires that appear in his own letters. He still longs for Alexandria, and all his hopes and ambitions are turned that way. Still he struggles to impress some one with the contempt he feels for Pope.

We come now to the orders under which Porter acted or should have acted on August 29. They are as follows; I print them in the order they were issued:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—3 a. m.

GENERAL: McDowell has intercepted the retreat of Jackson. Sigel is immediately on the right of McDowell. Kearny and Hooker march to attack the enemy's rear at early dawn. Major-General Pope directs you to move upon Centreville at the first dawn of day with your whole command, leaving your trains to follow. It is very important that you should be here at a very early hour in the morning. A severe engagement is likely to take place, and your presence is necessary.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Colonel and Chief of Staff.

Major-General PORTER.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, Aug. 29, 1862.

Push forward with your corps and King's division, which you will take with you, upon Gainesville. I am following the enemy down the Warrenton turnpike. Be expeditious, or we will lose much.

JOHN POPE,
Maj. Genl. Commanding.

The joint order to Generals McDowell and Porter:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
Centreville, August 29, 1862.

Generals McDOWELL and PORTER: You will please move forward with your joint commands toward Gainesville. I sent General Porter written orders to that effect an hour and a half ago. Heintzelman, Sigel, and Reno are moving on the Warrenton turnpike, and must now be not far from Gainesville. I desire that as soon as communication is established between this force and your own the whole command shall halt. It may be necessary to fall back behind Bull Run, at Centreville, to night. I presume it will be so on account of our supplies. I have sent no orders of any description to Ricketts, and none to interfere in any way with the movements of McDowell's troops, except what I sent by his aid-de-camp last night, which were to hold his position on the Warrenton pike until the troops from here should fall on the enemy's flank and rear. I do not even know Ricketts's position, as I have not been able to find out where General McDowell was until a late hour this morning. General McDowell will take immediate steps to communicate with General Ricketts, and instruct him to join the other division of his corps as soon as practicable. If any considerable advantages are to be gained by departing from this order, it will not be carried out. One thing must be held in view—that the troops must occupy a position from which they can reach Bull Run to-night or by morning. The indications are that the whole force of the enemy is moving in this direction at a pace that will bring them here to-morrow night or the next day. My own headquarters will, for the present, be with Heintzelman's corps or at this place.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

The 4.30 order directing him to attack the enemy at once in flank and rear:

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD,
August 29, 1862—4.30 p. m.

Major-General PORTER:

Your line of march brings you in on the enemy's right flank. I desire you to push forward into action at once on the enemy's flank, and, if pssible, on his rear, keeping your right in communication with General Reynolds.

The enemy is massed in the woods in front of us, but can be shelled out as soon as you engage their flank. Keep heavy reserves and use your batteries, keeping well closed to your right all the time. In case you are obliged to fall back, do so to your right and rear, so as to keep you in close communication with the right wing.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General Commanding.

The order to report in person:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
In the field near Bull Run, August 29, 1862—8.50 p. m.

GENERAL: Immediately upon receipt of this order, the precise hour of receiving which you will acknowledge, you will march your command to the field of battle of to-day, and report to me in person for orders. You are to understand that you are expected to comply strictly with this order, and to be present on the field within three hours after its reception, or after daybreak to-morrow morning.

JOHN POPE,
Major-General, Commanding.

Major-General F. J. PORTER.

It is very difficult, sir, for me to understand what there is in any of these orders to induce the conclusion that Pope misled Porter, or that the latter was at a loss to know what to do at the time of receiving either or any of them. It is certain that it was found necessary to change the one written at 3 a. m. from an order to come to the battlefield by way of the Gainesville route rather than by Centreville. But in this there is no evidence of lack of capacity or brains, as the gentleman from New Jersey would have us believe. By one route Porter would come upon the field on the right of Groveton, and by the other upon the left. The difference in distance from Manassas, where Porter was supposed to be at 3 a. m., was trifling. The order is explicit in requiring Porter to move promptly in the morning. "It is very important you should be here at a very early hour in the morning." The admonition is repeated, as if remembering the slow obedience of the 6.30 order of August 27. Pope not only ordered Porter to start "at the first dawn of day, with his whole command," but adds, "It is very important you should be here at a very early hour in the morning," and then tells him also of a "severe engagement likely to take place" as the reason for making such a demand.

Now, sir, is it not somewhat strange that Porter's conduct on this occasion should stultify the conclusions of the West Point military board, which attempts to justify Porter's behavior on the 27th? But so it is. That board labors hard to torture a construction of the order of the 27th into an implication that Porter was not wanted to fight but to follow a retreating foe. The language of that order warrants no such conclusion, but the board forced it nevertheless, and in so doing they take their client (for such they seem to make him) out of the frying-pan only to drop him into a still warmer place.

In searching for justification they lose their logic. They excuse a disobedience on the 27th which the situation of the 29th utterly confounds and contradicts. At Warrenton, they say, Porter was not in duty bound to move promptly because he was not wanted to fight; and at Dawkin's Branch he did not move because he was wanted to fight!

I think it is not denied by any one that all three orders given on the 29th were indicative of a fight and that Porter was wanted to take part therein.

But it is answered, first, that he was on the enemy's front instead of his flank, where Pope supposed him to be; second, that the number of the enemy was too great for him to assail; third, that the order came too late to be executed that night; fourth, that there was no fight whatever; and fifth, that by remaining inactive he saved the Union Army from defeat!

Now let us inquire as to these several pleas in avoidance. Suppose we admit that when the 4.30 order was received Porter "was not on the enemy's flank;" that does not prove that he could not and should not have been there, nor does it excuse him for not having been there before the order was issued. Had he followed the spirit, or even the letter, of Pope's previous orders he must have reached the point indicated as early as 2 o'clock p. m.

The board in its report assumes that Longstreet was already in position at noon. I am not disposed to deny the existence of conflicting testimony upon this point. If Longstreet was already in position when Porter reached Dawkin's Branch his right flank could have been reached by advancing along the Gainesville road to a point not exceeding three miles from where he halted at, say, 11.30 o'clock. If Longstreet was not in position, then Porter should have prepared to strike Jackson's right flank, thus securing a position to prevent Longstreet from re-enforcing Jackson. General Grant, as well as the West Point board, has assumed that when the order was given to attack the enemy it meant Jackson. Why Jackson? There were "a thousand Richmonds" on that field! Longstreet was a foeman worthy of Porter's steel. It matters not whether that enemy was in line of battle or still on the march, when Porter came to Dawkin's Branch it was his duty to pause not, but to march right on until he stood shoulder to shoulder with McDowell and face to face with the enemies of his country.

I do not believe, however, that Longstreet was in position when Porter reached the point where he might have chosen his own ground to fight. The fact that the dust seen by Porter was produced by strategy, as sworn to by General Rosser, and so far as I know neither questioned nor denied, and the fact that a trooper had just come through from Gainesville unmolested, are, I think, conclusive on this point. But I will not undertake to hold General Porter to account upon a doubtful premise. I prefer that, in any case where there is a scintilla of doubt upon facts, he be given the benefit of the doubt. Let us then suppose Longstreet had gained the position indicated on the maps before Porter reached Dawkin's Branch, and I ask how is Porter excused from striking the enemy's flank or rear? From whence comes the conclusion that an order directing an attack "upon the enemy's flank or rear" can not be executed unless the enemy's flank or rear is at the moment of receiving the order presented to the attacking general just in a convenient position to be attacked?

Up to the time this new theory of war was announced by the West Point board I had supposed that in a case such as we are discussing it would be the duty of the general receiving the order to go where the flank or rear could be struck. Indeed, if a general is to wait until his enemy presents flank or rear for him to fight he will usually do as did Porter—not fight at all. The logic of this new theory (or whatever it may be called) is that because Longstreet did not present to Porter the flank or rear of his army therefore Porter was excusable. Excusable for what? Not only for not fighting, but for remaining three miles, yea, four miles, from the enemy while that enemy was constantly sending re-enforcements to destroy his comrades!

Second. But gentlemen say Porter was justified in his disobedience because the enemy outnumbered him. Waiving for the time the point that this position is untenable upon the hypothesis asserted, let me remind gentlemen that Porter then had no evidence that Longstreet had more men than himself. He admits that the only evidence he had of Longstreet's numbers was derived from Buford's letter. By that it was claimed Longstreet had seventeen regiments, one battery, and five hundred cavalry. In 1862 that did not mean generally more than ten or twelve thousand. How, then, does the question of numbers he must meet if he obeyed justify disobedience of the order? But it is in evidence that before 4 o'clock seven brigades of Longstreet's corps had been sent to and did re-enforce Jackson, and fought until 9 o'clock.

Third. The West Point board and General Grant agree in saying the order came too late! Of course they do not thereby get rid of the fact that Porter should have been fighting before the 4.30 order was written. Nor do the necessities of this conclusion reflect much credit upon the justice or patriotism of General Porter. It is in evidence that the fight at Groveton continued until 9 o'clock. I never have heard this disputed. The report of every confederate officer, as well as of our own, shows this to be true. Why should not Porter have taken part in the fight?

The evidence differs slightly as to time; but assuming that the order was not received until 6 o'clock, Porter should have been in position at that time to do immense damage to the enemy. The testimony, the official reports of all the generals, and so far as I know all the histories of the war, agree that the heaviest fighting of the day was between 6 and 9 o'clock in the evening. The ingenuity of man has not yet, and I venture to say it never can, furnish a rational excuse for Porter's remaining out of the fight during these hours. The Union Army needed his aid, and his only, to have won a glorious victory. I quote the testimony of General Sturgis and others in this connection.

TESTIMONY OF GENERAL S. D. STURGIS.

General S. D. Sturgis testifies that he moved on the Gainesville road August 29, 1862, with his command. (Board record, page 711.)

Q. You say you went a mile and a half beyond Bethlehem church toward Gainesville?
A. That is my recollection.
Q. What did you then do?
A. I reported to General Porter. I rode in advance of my brigade. I found troops occupying the road, and I got up as near as I could get and then halted my command, and then rode forward to tell General Porter that they were there. He said, "For the present let them lie there."
Q. What did you do then individually?
A. Well, I simply looked about to see what I could see. I was a stranger to the lay of the land, and the troops, and all that; so without getting off my horse I rode about from place to place watching the skirmishers, and among other things I took a glass and looked in the direction of the woods; about a mile beyond which seemed to be the object of attention—beyond the skirmishers; there I saw a glint of light on a gun; and I remarked to General Porter that I thought they were probably putting a battery in position at that place, for I thought I had seen a gun.
Q. State what the conversation was.
A. I reported this fact of what I had seen to the general; he thought I was mistaken about it, but I was not mistaken, because it opened in a moment—at least a few shots were fired from that place—four, as I recollect.
Q. What force of the enemy did you see in that direction at that time?
A. I didn't see any of the enemy at all.
Q. Then what did you do?
A. Then when they had fired, as near as I can recollect, about four shots from this piece, General Porter beckoned to me; I rode up to him, and he directed me to take my command to Manassas Junction, and take up a defensive position, inasmuch as the firing seemed to be receding on our right.
Q. What firing do you mean?
A. I mean the cannonading that had been going on for some time on our right, probably in the direction of Groveton.
Q. How long had you heard that cannonading?
A. I don't recollect exactly where I heard it first. My impression has been that I heard it all along the march from Manassas to General Porter's position. I do not recollect distinctly that I did hear it, but I know I heard it all the time after I arrived there until I left.
Q. What time of day was this that you received the order to move back with your command to Manassas Junction?
A. I have no way of fixing the time of day. I have carried in my mind the impression that it was more about the middle of the day—about 1 o'clock.
Q. What did you do when you received that order?
A. I sent word to General Piatt to move back to Manassas Junction, and that I would join him there.
Q. Do you know whether your order was obeyed?
A. Yes; it was obeyed.

TESTIMONY OF GENERAL GEORGE SYKES.

On the original trial Brig. Gen. George Sykes swore, after saying that he was with the petitioner when an officer brought him the order from General Pope, as follows (G. C. M. record, pages 177, 178):

Question by Judge-Advocate. Did General Porter make known to you the character of that order?
Answer. He did not.
Q. Did he read it in your presence?
A. Not that I know of.

* * * * * * *

Q. How long did you remain with General Porter on that occasion, after the receipt of this order?
A. I continued with him from that time all night.

* * * * * * *

Q. You had then, as I understand you to say, no knowledge that a positive order had been given by General Pope on that afternoon for General Porter to attack the enemy on their right flank?
A. I had no such knowledge.
The evidence of General Sykes leads directly to the conclusion that the petitioner had no intention or desire to attack or he would have told his division commander then and there.
Look at it in any light, there was no effort then, or at any time afterward on that day, to put Sykes's division into position to support or participate in an assault.

EVIDENCE OF REV. JOHN LANDSTREET.

Q. What did you see that impressed itself upon your attention?
A. There was considerable dust, indicating a body of troops. I heard that General Stuart had ordered some of the Fifth Cavalry to go out and cut and drag it up and down the road.
Q. Did you hear the order?
A. Yes; to drag the brush along the Gainesville road, so as to serve as a feint and convey the impression that there was a force coming down the Gainesville. It was given, I distinctly recollect, to a member of the Fifth Virginia Cavalry.
Q. Who was the colonel of that regiment?
A. T. L. Rosser.

Fourth. We come now to the assertion made by the military board that there was no battle on the 29th, "but only a succession of skirmishes at wide intervals." This assertion of the West Point board has less of testimony, if possible, to support it than any of the material matter with which it deals. It would seem that while the report was being made up it occurred to the writer that the assertion might be construed as a misrepresentation unless veiled some way in mystery, and so the report goes on to say:

The reports of the 29th and 30th have somehow been strangely confounded.

By whom, pray? By none but the defenders of Porter, who seek a vindication of their man in a denial of history. They have made a heroic effort to strike the 29th of August from the scroll of time. It will not vanish, however, nor will it merge into the 30th, so as to lose its own identity. I quote from a few of the official reports of both Union and rebel generals. So far as I have been able to examine them there is no disagreement whatever upon the question as to whether there was a battle or not on that day. There is no confusion or "misconstruction" discoverable in any of them. I find confusion nowhere save in the findings of the board and those who follow it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania dislikes the current history of that time; he has no faith in reports of military men who participated in the battles. He prefers the hap-hazard hits of a West Point military board, collated after the passions "wait on the judgment" for twenty years.

Let me here give extracts from some of these reports.

Report of Maj. Gen. S. P. Heintzelman.

ARLINGTON, VA., October 21, 1862.

At 10 a. m. I reached the field of battle, a mile from Stone Bridge, on the Warrenton turnpike. General Kearny's division had proceeded to the right and front. I learned that General Sigel was in command of the troops then engaged.
At 11 a. m. the head of Hooker's division arrived; General Reno an hour later. At the request of General Sigel I ordered General Hooker to place one of his brigades at General Sigel's disposal, to re-enforce a portion of his line then hard pressed. General Grover reported, and before long became engaged, and was afterward supported by the whole division. General Pope arrived between 1 and 2 p. m. The enemy were driven back a short distance toward Sudley church, where they made another stand and again pressed a portion of our line back. All this time General Kearny's division held its position on our extreme right. Several orders were sent to him to advance, but he did not move till after the troops on his left had been forced back, which was near 6 p. m. He now advanced and reported that he was driving the enemy. This was not, however, until after the renewed heavy musketry fire on our center had driven General Hooker's troops and those he was sent to support back. They were greatly outnumbered and behaved with exceeding gallantry.
It was on this occasion that General Grover's brigade made the most gallant and determined bayonet charge of the war. He broke two of the enemy's lines, but was finally repulsed by the overwhelming numbers in the rebel third line. It was a hand-to-hand conflict, using the bayonet and the butt of the musket. In this fierce encounter of not over 20 minutes' duration the Second New Hampshire, Colonel Marston, suffered the most. The First, Eleventh, and Sixteenth Massachusetts and Twenty-sixth Pennsylvania were engaged. The loss of this brigade, numbering less than two thousand, was a total of four hundred and eighty-four, nearly all killed and wounded. I refer you to General Grover's accompanying report.
Had General Kearny pushed the enemy earlier it might have enabled us to have held our center and have saved some of this heavy loss. Kearny, on the right, with General Stevens and our artillery, drove the enemy out of the woods they had temporarily occupied. The firing continued some time after dark, and when it ceased we remained in possession of the battlefield.

Report of Maj. Gen. Franz Sigel.

NEAR FORT DE KALB, VIRGINIA, September 16, 1862.

Battle of Groveton, near Bull Run, on Friday, August 29, 1862.

On Thursday night, August 28, when the First Corps was encamped on the heights south of Young's Branch, near Bull Run, I received orders from General Pope to "attack the enemy vigorously" the next morning. I accordingly made the necessary preparations at night and formed in order of battle at daybreak, having ascertained that the enemy was in considerable force beyond Young's Branch, in sight of the hills we occupied. His left wing rested on Catharpin Creek, front toward Centreville; with his center he occupied a long stretch of woods parallel with the Sudley Springs (New Market) road, and his right was posted on the hills on both sides of the Centreville-Gainesville road. I therefore directed General Schurz to deploy his division on the right of the Gainesville road, and, by a change of direction to the left, to come into position parallel with the Sudley Springs road. General Milroy, with his brigade and one battery, was directed to form the center, and to take possession of an elevation in front of the so-called "stone house," at the junction of the Gainesville and Sudley Springs roads. General Schenck, with his division, forming our left, was ordered to advance quickly to an adjoining range of hills, and to plant his batteries on these hills at an excellent range from the enemy's position.

In this order our whole line advanced from point to point, taking advantage of the ground before us, until our whole line was involved in a most vehement artillery and infantry contest. In the course of about four hours, from half past 6 to half past 10 o'clock in the morning, our whole infantry force and nearly all our batteries were engaged with the enemy, Generals Milroy and Schurz advancing one mile and General Schenck two miles from their original positions. At this time (10.30 o'clock) the enemy threw forward large masses of infantry against our right, but was resisted firmly and driven back three times by the troops of Generals Milroy and Schurz. To assist those troops so hard pressed by overpowering numbers, exhausted by fatigue, and weakened by losses I ordered one battery of reserve to take position on their left, and posted two pieces of artillery, under Lieutenant Blum, of Schirmer's battery, supported by the Forty-first New York Volunteer Infantry, beyond their line and opposite the right flank of the enemy, who was advancing in the woods.

At 2 o'clock in the afternoon General Hooker's troops arrived on the field of battle and were immediately ordered forward by their noble commander to participate in the battle. One brigade, under Colonel Carr, received orders, by my request, to relieve the regiments of General Schurz's division, which had maintained their ground against repeated attacks, but were now worn out and nearly without ammunition. Other regiments were sent forward to relieve Brigadier-General Milroy, whose brigade had valiantly disputed the ground against greatly superior numbers for eight hours.

To check the enemy if he should attempt to advance, or for the purpose of preparing and supporting an attack from our side, I placed four batteries, of different commands, on a range of hills on our center and behind the woods, which had been the most hotly contested part of the battlefield during the day. I had previously received a letter from Major-General Pope, saying that Fitz-John Porter's corps and Brigadier-General King's division, numbering twenty thousand men, would come in on our left. I did, therefore, not think it prudent to give the enemy time to make new arrangements, and ordered all the batteries to continue their fire, and to direct it principally against the enemy's position in the woods before our front. Some of our troops placed in front were retiring from the woods, but as the enemy, held in check by the artillery in the center, did not venture to follow, and as at this moment new regiments of General Hooker's command arrived and were ordered forward, we maintained the position we had occupied in the morning.

General Longstreet, in his report, says:

HEADQUARTERS NEAR WINCHESTER, VA., October 10, 1862.

Early on the 29th (August) the columns were united, and the advance to join General Jackson was resumed. The noise of battle was heard before we reached Gainesville. The march was quickened to the extent of our capacity. The excitement of battle seemed to give new life and strength to our jaded men, and the head of my column soon reached a position in rear of the enemy's left flank and within easy cannon-shot.

On approaching the field some of Brigadier-General Hood's batteries were ordered into position, and his division was deployed on the right and left of the turnpike, at right angles with it, and supported by Brigadier-General Evans's brigade. Before these batteries could open the enemy discovered our movements and withdrew his left. Another battery (Captain Stribling's) was placed upon a commanding position to my right, which played upon the rear of the enemy's left and drove him entirely from that part of the field. He changed his front rapidly, so as to meet the advance of Hood and Evans.

Three brigades, under General Wilcox, were thrown forward to the support of the left, and three others, under General Kemper, to the support of the right of these commands. General D. R. Jones's division was placed upon the Manassas Gap Railroad and to the right and in echelon with regard to the three last brigades. Colonel Walton placed his batteries in a commanding position between my line and that of General Jackson, and engaged the enemy for several hours in a severe and successful artillery duel. At a late hour in the day Major-General Stuart reported the approach of the enemy in heavy columns against my extreme right. I withdrew General Wilcox with his three brigades from the left, and placed his command in position to support Jones in case of an attack against my right. After some few shots the enemy withdrew his forces, moving them around toward his front, and about 4 o'clock in the afternoon began to press forward against General Jackson's position. Wilcox's brigades were moved back to their former position, and Hood's two brigades, supported by Evans, were quickly pressed forward to the attack. At the same time Wilcox's three brigades made a like advance, as also Hunton's brigade of Kemper's command.

These movements were executed with commendable zeal and ability. Hood, supported by Evans, made a gallant attack, driving the enemy back till 9 o'clock at night. One piece of artillery, several regimental standards, and a number of prisoners were taken. The enemy's entire force was found to be massed directly in my front, and in so strong a position that it was not deemed advisable to move on against his immediate front; so the troops were quietly withdrawn at 1 o'clock the following morning. The wheels of the captured piece were cut down, and it was left on the ground. The enemy seized that opportunity to claim a victory, and the Federal commander was so impudent as to dispatch his Government by telegraph tidings to that effect. After withdrawing from the attack my troops were placed in the line first occupied and in the original order.

Report of Major B. W. Frobel, chief of artillery of Hood's division, Longstreet's command, of second battle of Manassas.

CAMP NEAR FREDERICK, MD., September 9, 1862.

* * * * * * *

At 11 a. m. on Friday I was ordered by General Hood to proceed to the right of the turnpike road and report to General Stuart. This I did, with Captain Bachman's battery, Reilly being already in position on the left, and Garden having no long-range pieces. General Stuart had selected a position near the Orange and Alexandria Railroad. The battery was brought up and immediately opened with marked effect on a column of the enemy moving to the right, which at once changed direction, moving rapidly to the left. Fifteen rounds were fired, when, the distance being greatly increased, I ordered Captain Bachman to cease firing. At 1 o'clock p. m. Captain Reilly was ordered to the left of the turnpike, and to take position with other batteries on a hill commanding the hills near Groveton House.

Report of Col. E. M. Law, of Hood's division, Longstreet's command, of second battle of Manassas.

HEADQUARTERS THIRD BRIGADE, September 10, 1862.

* * * * * * *

Leaving Thoroughfare Gap at sunrise on the 29th the brigade marched in the direction of Manassas Junction. At Gainesville, on the Warrenton turnpike, the line of march changed abruptly to the left along the turnpike in the direction of Centreville. On arriving about midway between Gainesville and the stone house, which is situated at the junction of the turnpike and the Sudley Ford road, I was ordered by Brigadier-General Hood, commanding the division, to form the brigade in line of battle to the left of the turnpike and almost at right angles with it, the right resting on the road and the left connecting with General Jackson's line.

Report of General P. Kearny (by General Birney), of Heintzelman's corps.

CENTREVILLE, VA., August 31, 1862.

* * * * * * *

On the 29th, on my arrival, I was assigned to the holding of the right wing, my left on Leesburg road. I posted Colonel Poe, with Berry's brigade, in first line; General Robinson, First Brigade, on his right, partly in line and partly in support; and kept Birney's most disciplined regiments reserved and ready for emergencies.

Toward noon I was obliged to occupy a quarter of a mile additional on left of said road, from Schurz's troops being taken elsewhere.

During the first hours of combat General Birney, on tired regiments in the center falling back, of his own accord rapidly pushed across to give them a hand to raise themselves to a renewed fight.

In early afternoon General Pope's order to General Roberts was to send a pretty strong force diagonally to the front to relieve the center in woods from pressure. Accordingly I detached on that purpose General Robinson, with his brigade, the Sixty-third Pennsylvania Volunteers, Colonel Hays; the One hundred and fifth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Captain Craig; the Twentieth Indiana, Colonel Brown; and, additionally, the Third Michigan Marksmen, under Colonel Champlin. General Robinson drove forward for several hundred yards, but the center of the main battle being shortly after driven back and out of the woods, my detachment thus exposed so considerably in front of all others, both flanks in air.

* * * * * * *

That I might drive the enemy, by an unexpected attack, through the woods, I brought up additionally the most of Birney's regiments, the Fourth Maine, Colonel Walker and Lieutenant-Colonel Carver; the Fortieth New York, Colonel Egan; First New York, Major Burt; and One hundred and first New York, Lieutenant-Colonel Gessner, and changed front to the left, to sweep with a rush the first line of the enemy. This was most successful. The enemy rolled up on his own right. It presaged a victory for us all. Still our force was too light. The enemy brought up rapidly heavy reserves, so that our farther progress was impeded. General Stevens came up gallantly in action to support us, but did not have the numbers.

Report of Colonel Edward L. Thomas, commanding second brigade, A. P. Hill's division, Jackson's command.

October 26, 1862.

On Thursday, August 28, near Sudley Ford, this brigade was held in reserve by order of General Hill; was under fire, but took no active part, and after the enemy gave way, moved forward and bivouacked for the night on the field. Early on Friday, August 29, the march was resumed, with directions to be prepared for an attack near the railroad. General Gregg's brigade meeting the enemy there, this brigade advanced to his right, the regiments being thrown in successively until all became engaged. The enemy were in strong position on the railroad.

We at once advanced and drove them from it. This position we were ordered to hold, and, if possible, avoid bringing on a general engagement, and held it against several attacks of the enemy in strong force during the day. In the afternoon an overwhelming force attacked us, now almost without ammunition, in front and on the left flanks, and forced us back a short distance, when General Pender's brigade advanced promptly and in fine order to the assistance of the third, most of which joined General Pender, and together they drove back the enemy some distance beyond our previous position, which was held until night, the brigade bivouacking on the field.

Report of Brigadier-General S. McGowan.

A. P. HILL'S LIGHT DIVISION, SECOND ARMY CORPS,
Camp Gregg, Va., February 9, 1863.

* * * * * * *

Friday, the 29th, was the glorious but bloody day for the brigade. It may be allowed for us to claim that by holding the left steady on Friday we contributed to the success of the great battle on Saturday. The distinguished brigadier-general who commanded, and was present everywhere during the day and exerting himself to the utmost, was himself spared, only to fall upon another victorious field (Fredericksburg), but many of our noblest and best officers and men fell there. The aggregate of the killed and wounded of the brigade in this battle was six hundred and thirteen (613).

Report of Brigadier-General N. G. Evans, Longstreet's command.

HEADQUARTERS EVANS'S BRIGADE,
Near Winchester, Va., October 13, 1862.

* * * * * * *

On the evening of the 29th of August the brigade engaged the skirmishers of the enemy in considerable force on the south side of the road near Groveton, and rendered efficient co-operation to the commands of General Wilcox on the left and General Hood on the right in driving the enemy from his position. The enemy falling back, and the darkness of the night concealing his movements, I formed my brigade in the camp of the enemy, until ordered to fall back by the major-general commanding. Leaving a strong picket in my front, I withdrew about a mile to the rear.

Report of Lieutenant-Colonel R. L. Walker.

* * * * * * *

On Friday the 29th of August the batteries were placed in position on the ridge in the rear and to the left of General A. P. Hill's division. Captain Braxton's battery was engaged early in the forenoon on the extreme left, with the loss of some of his horses. Upon the cessation of the enemy's fire ours ceased also. In the afternoon a section of Captain Pegram's battery hotly engaged the enemy on the right. His position was in rear of General Field's and Gregg's brigades. The loss of this section was very heavy, and, the fire continuing with unremitted severity, it was withdrawn. Captain Braxton was then ordered to the position, and, with five guns, held it, with loss, under a terrible fire, until night closed in upon the field. Captain Crenshaw's battery was also engaged during the day from a point in rear of General Pender's brigade.

I quote from only a few. I see nothing "strangely confounded."

They all refer to a battle on the 29th, and it is described by adjectives such as are employed in the description of a battle. Several bayonet charges were made, and General Heintzelman says that General Grover's brigade made "the most gallant and determined bayonet charge of the war." Bayonet charges seldom occur in a skirmish!

We are not left to rely entirely upon the official records of the actors, for all the current historians agree in the statement that a very severe battle was fought on that day. There is great unanimity in fixing the losses at about seven thousand on each side. Think of it, Mr. Chairman, fourteen thousand men killed and wounded, and a West Point reviewing board in order to clear their client say there was no battle! I read here from Lossing's History of the Civil War, volume I, pages 457, 458, and 459.

Lossing says:

The battle of the 29th was desperate and gallant on both sides. Grover's brigade of Hooker's division penetrated two of Jackson's lines by a bayonet charge, and after a severe hand-to-hand struggle got possession of the railway embankment on the confederate left, but at the cost of 30 per cent. of his forces. Kearny meanwhile had struck Jackson's left at the point occupied by A. P. Hill, doubled his flank upon his center, and assisted Hooker in holding the railway intrenchment for a time. * * * Heavy re-enforcements, composed of fresh divisions of Longstreet's corps, had come to the aid of Jackson. Among them was Hood's famous Texan brigade. * * * So ended the battle of Groveton, with a loss of not less than seven thousand men on each side.

Also, Sypher's History of Pennsylvania Reserves, pages 339, &c.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] says that Reynolds swore he could not hear the enemy's guns on the 29th of August. I do not know where he secured this evidence. I do not care. I know General Reynolds could never have uttered it. The facts of history make it impossible that he should ever have uttered these words. I read as follows:

General Reynolds, with the reserve corps, had, during the evening of the 28th, marched by the left flank from the road leading from Gainesville to Manassas, and moving in the direction of Centreville, had closed up with Sigel's corps; at daylight on the morning of the 29th he was therefore on the field in front of the enemy.

And yet the gentleman says he could not hear the enemy's guns. Listen again:

With the spirit of a true patriot and a generous soldier, he did not delay action from doubt of authority to move. General Reynolds was subject to McDowell's orders, and might have declined to bring his troops into action without orders from that officer, but fortunately neither the officers nor the privates of the Pennsylvania Reserve Corps were governed by any other than patriotic motives. It was enough for them to know that the enemy was in their front, and that Sigel's corps was about to engage him. Reynolds formed his division on the left of Schenck's division, and from daylight to dark, with no higher orders than the consciousness of a worthy deed nobly done, that general and his troops, marching and countermarching, moving against the flank or straight to the front, fought the enemy * * * until darkness put an end to the contest.

And yet the gentleman says he wants to acquit Fitz-John Porter by testimony so false as that he quotes, to the effect that Reynolds "was out of hearing of the enemy's guns!"

Fifth. But the most absurd of all the positions taken by the military board is—"that Porter's faithful, subordinate, and intelligent conduct that afternoon saved the army from defeat, which otherwise would have resulted from the enemy's more speedy action." The absurdities of this conclusion are as numerous as the words used to express it. First, the day was not saved; it was lost. True, by the most desperate fighting our troops managed to hold nearly all the ground taken; but there was in no sense a victory. But let us assume the board means to say that the army was saved from utter defeat and rout. How did Porter contribute to this end? Was he found charging at the head of his command upon the enemy? Did he call upon his men to rise and avenge their slaughtered brethren or share their fate, and did he "break through the thick array of Longstreet's legions and charge home upon them?" This would have been quite a soldierly scheme for "saving the day." It is said that in the soldier's temple of fame, when it shall finally be fully complete, there will be a black charger, and upon his pedestal will be inscribed in letters both bold and bright, "Here is the steed that saved the day by carrying Sheridan into the fight from Winchester, twenty miles away." No one will contend that Porter's charger saved the day by carrying Porter "into the fight."

He snuffed the battle from afar, while his master, all imperturbed, as if "grim-visaged War had smoothed his wrinkled front" and he might "caper nimbly" to the rear, beckons to Sturgis (see testimony) and tells him "to take his command back to Manassas," then betakes himself to the "little church around the corner," four miles from a point where he could by any possibility "save" or help to save the day! And yet a military board says he saved the day!

The board leave us to grope our way without giving us any information as to how he saved the day, except by "subordinate and intelligent conduct." The further we inquire into just what this conduct was the more we are puzzled to see just how he saved the day.

It is now admitted he did not charge upon the enemy, which, as I have said, is one way of "saving the day." Let us see if another mode—not quite so heroic, but yet quite to a general's credit if successful—was resorted to on that great day. Did he by strategy hold the enemy? Did he maneuver his troops and menace the enemy's front, and by "feint" of battle keep Longstreet's troops in position to resist the pretended charge? I find no such matter in the histories, neither in the testimony, nor yet even in the West Point board's report. Why they did not picture their hero in such an attitude passes my comprehension. It could have been done with quite as much regard for truth as is manifest in most of their assertions! No, sir, there was not even the "pomp, pride, and circumstance of glorious war!" Porter did just what he had contemplated all the time from the 26th of August. He did nothing!

But, lastly, did doing nothing "save the day?" That being just what Porter did, and the military board having established (?) that he saved the day, we are left now only to inquire if his "masterly inactivity" did, indeed, save the day. This we can easily ascertain by inquiring into the effect of his inactivity. We are told by the reports of Longstreet, Hood, Lee, and in fact by all the confederate generals, that Hood, of Longstreet's corps (instead of remaining to resist Porter's inactivity), was sent to the assistance of Jackson upon his arrival on the field; that Wilcox's division of that corps soon followed, and that one of Kemper's brigades of that corps, under Colonel Hunton, also went to the assistance of Jackson.

True, that when Porter's inactivity was stirred up by a few cannon-shots from one of Stuart's batteries Longstreet thought he was to be attacked, and recalled Wilcox to assist in resisting the expected assault of Porter's corps. But Longstreet, soon finding that there was nothing to fear from Porter, ordered Wilcox back to the assistance of Jackson. It will thus be seen how "masterly inactivity" did its perfect work. The West Point military board say Porter saved the day—and they are all honorable men—but we still fail to find the secret of that day's salvation! Seven brigades of the twelve under Longstreet have now been sent to help Jackson in his "skirmishes," leaving only five brigades in front of Porter, while the latter, in hot pursuit of his purpose to "save the day," retreats to Bethlahem church covered with laurels and the thanks of the West Point military board! God grant that we may never have another day so saved while the world stands.

Now, sir, I have said much about the military board, not because I would impugn their motives or assail their honor. I believe them generally to be just. I think it may be proper, however, that I should confess in this presence that I was not particularly captivated with the conduct of Schofield when he masqueraded before the country as a persecutor of the hapless Whitaker. But this does not, I hope, prejudice me against him more than is just. For the other members of the board I have the profoundest regard. I can never cease to love the man who first planted the flag on the ramparts of Fort Fisher; and General Getty was true, faithful, and heroic wherever he followed or led his countrymen in the battles for the Union. General Grant I believe to be the greatest of living generals. His motives in this matter I do not question at all. His letter is high-toned, forgiving, and chivalric. But I can not shut my eyes to the fact that he has traveled far away from the testimony in reaching his conclusions, and I feel that I am justified in saying that the testimony was never read by him, except in "shreds and patches," and that he followed the findings of the board, presuming them to be correct.

But, sir, I care not how General Grant reached his present position on this question. He is but a man, and the greatest man, as my friend from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] has well said, "can only give his opinions strength by the reasons he can give for reaching them." I am struck with the force of this remark when I remember how many men of massive brain power have in some great emergency proven themselves the weakest children of the state. The Supreme Court by one of its ablest members—a man of commanding ability—rendered a decision which was in essence the very refinement of cruelty; but, as if to conciliate and gratify the votaries of slavery, he clothed these conclusions in language so barbaric and shameless as to place at once the whole court under the ban of contempt by the lovers of liberty everywhere, for a quarter of a century. I refer to the "Dred Scott decision." I am not certain but that the same court, notwithstanding the warnings of the past, has once again forfeited much of the respect that ever should attach to that high tribunal. Certainly the recent civil rights decision is not less than a sorrowful and a lasting disappointment.

Sir, it will not answer to shape our actions entirely by the example of great men, even if they sit in high places.

But it is said the court-martial convicted Porter in a time of great excitement and unrestrained passion. I deny it. The patience of this people in those dread years is without a parallel in history. That Porter was not shot and that McClellan was not cashiered is indisputable proof of the fact I assert. Besides, sir, the hours, the days, the years which, to my astonishment, are denominated "times of passion" by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] were the hours and days and years when more was achieved in the realm of freedom, truth, and righteousness, both by the iron hand of war and by fearless patriotism in the peace that followed, than in all the other years of this Republic's history. Shame, shame on the slander that says justice did not evenly hold her scales in that blessed era!

It was in these days of passion that the peerless Lincoln broke the chains and let the oppressed go free! It was in these days of passion, sir, that we purged our statute-books and supposed we had banished from our jurisprudence the all-polluting crime of slavery. Then it was that upon our beauteous banner for the first time was inscribed in letters of living light and fadeless glory, to stream forever on her ample folds, "Universal liberty and equal rights." God grant we may never forget the days that gave us the priceless heritage.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the fact that nothing I can say in this discussion is likely to change the convictions or the vote of a single member of this House. Neither am I entirely unmindful, Mr. Chairman, of the unwritten law of this Chamber, which is that no new member can have an opinion upon this or any other subject.

But, Mr. Chairman, representing, as I have the honor to represent, in part, upon the floor of this House more than fifty thousand Union soldiers of the late war, almost every one of whom honestly and sincerely believes Fitz-John Porter guilty of the charges of which he was convicted, I can not permit this bill to pass this House without for them, and in their name as well as in my own, entering my solemn protest against it.

For more than twenty years it has stood recorded that in a trying hour of our country's extremity Fitz-John Porter was guilty of insubordination and disobedience of orders; and the great loyal heart of this country has all these years approved this record, and approves it to-day as one which should stand for all the ages that are to come. But we find a bill presented to the legislative body of this nation asking that this record shall be obliterated, and the proceedings of the court creating the same stricken down as unworthy of our respect. And we are asked to do this, not upon investigation and inquiry; not upon an examination of the topography of the country and an inquiry to witnesses for the truth, but because we have the physical ability to do so, and because it would be gratifying to the wrongdoer to have this record expunged.

In fact, we are told by the champion of this measure, the leader in this debate, that we are not competent to consider the merits of this bill, and to determine by investigation and inquiry the guilt or innocence of Fitz-John Porter. For the first time, I think, in the history of legislative bodies we find a bill pressed upon the consideration of this House accompanied by the solemn assurance of its author that the House is not competent to consider it.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not consume the time to enter upon a critical examination of the testimony in this case. The committee to whom was referred this bill did not do this. In fact, I think we are justified in saying they gave to the proof and to the bill itself no consideration whatever as a committee, because before the committee ever had a meeting it was published as matter of common gossip by the press of the country that it would report at its earliest opportunity this bill favorably to this House. But if the committee gave to it no consideration, the more necessity there is for our full and impartial investigation of this claim.

But as others have carefully considered the evidence, I shall assume, for the purpose of my suggestions, that certain propositions can not, and will not, be controverted in this debate.

First, that General Porter received the orders of August 27 and the three orders of August 29; second, that he did not obey them; third, that he was not prevented from doing as ordered by the topography of the country, the condition of the roads, inclement weather, movements of the enemy, or the exhausted condition of his troops; fourth, that he consumed much time in writing unkind and uncharitable criticisms of his superior officer that might have been given to preparation and to the executing of the orders received; and, fifth, that when he did reach the field on August 29 he refrained from taking his position because of a demonstration of some force in his front. And from this I argue that he was guilty of willful disobedience of orders, of misbehavior before the enemy and of insubordination, and that the decree of the nine distinguished military gentlemen who for forty-five days, with open doors, listened to all the evidence and to the eloquent appeals of the defendant and his counsel for sympathy should be upheld by this House as it has been upheld by the country. In fact in my judgment it is difficult to determine how a man, candid and dispassionate, can review the proceedings of that court-martial and study the history of those terrible days, the last of August, 1862, in Virginia, and come to any other conclusion than that Fitz-John Porter was guilty of every charge and of every specification that was presented against him in that fearful arraignment of which he complains to-day. Of course excuses have been and will be offered for him; but I question whether in the world's history we can find such a persistent, laborious hunt for excuses as has been made to relieve Fitz-John Porter from the odium of his crime and the just condemnation of his countrymen. But do these excuses satisfy the public conscience? Do they mitigate or palliate the offense? Do they let in upon his movements and actions a ray of sunshine that dispels the dark cloud of disobedience and insubordination?

It has been said that the night was dark, and that for such reasons he could not move his battalions; and yet we find that all that night confederate troops were hurrying to the front and moving into position to give battle to the Union forces.

It has been said that it rained some; and yet we find men sleeping upon the ground without shelter or the necessity of protection from the storm.

It has been said that the road was blockaded with teams and wagons of transportation; and yet we find his own officer swearing that with a detail of a hundred and fifty men every obstacle to the night's march could have been removed.

It has been said that he could not have moved that night; and yet we find his own officers swearing they would have moved if they had been ordered.

It has been said that his men were weary and exhausted; and yet we find that they had moved but from six to nine miles that day while opposing forces were moving thirty.

It has been said that he was confronted with greatly superior numbers; and yet we find the enemy riding with brush dragging from their saddles to raise a dust to retard his movements and to create an appearance of numbers. And it has been said for him that if he had taken the position ordered for his troops upon the 29th day of August, it would have resulted in an engagement and bloodshed; and yet we find one of his superior officers then upon the field, when this excuse was offered by Porter in person, retorting: "That is what we are here for." And it has been said for him that he was loyal to his country, and yet we find even McClellan asking him to stand by his colors and do his duty as a soldier.

These excuses, Mr. Chairman, and like excuses, have been offered for him until many, from the very persistency of his importunities, are disposed in sympathy to say: "Let us be merciful, and in his age and feebleness grant him this relief."

We all know, Mr. Chairman, how pleasant it is to do a sympathetic act and to relieve an unfortunate being from suffering and humiliation. But, as has been said in this debate, sympathy in this instance to the wrongdoer would be cruelty to the six thousand loyal and patriotic defenders of their country who on that bloody battlefield fell wounded, and many of them dying, from rebel bullets. It would be cruelty to the Government which expected loyalty and obedience to orders from its defenders. And it would be a grievous wrong to the widows and orphans who for more than twenty years have been mourning for those who came not from that field of conflict and of death.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is not asked of us in charity. We are not invited to look with compassion and sympathy upon the importunities of this old man—to bury in the oblivion of forgetfulness the wrongs he did and in commiseration grant him this relief. But it is demanded of us as justice, an absolute right, and that we may fortify ourselves for the work, we are asked to traduce the living and defame the dead.

As for me, Mr. Chairman, I can not accept this invitation; I can not enter upon this work, but prefer rather that the judgment which my conscience approves shall stand recorded until the resurrection and the better life.

But, Mr. Chairman, in the course of this debate we have heard still another excuse offered for General Porter. We have heard it said that if he was actuated by malice and hatred of General Pope he was justified. We have heard it said that "he would not have been a good soldier if he had not burned with contempt for the vacillating and incapable Pope." And why? Had Pope wronged him? Had Pope committed any crime that deserved the execration and contempt of the loyal people of the country? Had he been unmindful of duty and recreant to his country's interest? Had he violated trusts and betrayed the confidence of a loyal and patriotic people? Had he spurned with contempt the orders of his superiors, or been guilty of cowardice and shameful conduct in the presence of the enemy? What had he done, if none of these?

He had been schooled at his country's expense in the discipline and science of war. He had been loyal to her institutions. He had responded promptly to every call of duty. He had obeyed all orders of superiors, and had risen rapidly in rank. He had fought upon the plains of Mexico and had displayed gallantry and courage of the highest type upon many fields of carnage and bloodshed. He was the senior in rank and years of General Porter, and now the country saw him in command of the Army of Virginia, and from every loyal hearthstone and hamlet in the land earnest, eloquent, fervid, pleading prayers were offered to the God of Hosts and to the God of Battle that the same genius that had routed the enemy on so many Western battlefields might unite and revivify the Army of Virginia and lead its legions to a glorious and successful victory over the armies of treason and rebellion. And then it was, Mr. Chairman, and under such circumstances, that we are told in this debate that Fitz-John Porter would not have been a good soldier if he had not burned with contempt for him.

Are we surprised that men entertaining such convictions and giving expression to such utterances should clamor for the vindication of Fitz-John Porter? Could they be consistent and do less?

But, Mr. Chairman, many and strange are the scenes witnessed in this debate. We find them here asking for the passage of this bill because as they say General Grant approves it, and has given to it the benefit of his great name.

Wonderful indeed are the conversions of these men to the convictions of General Grant, for we find that for years when he was Chief Executive of this nation—when he was the commander-in-chief of its armies—yea, in those terrible years of anxiety and bloodshed when it was not certain we had a Government strong enough and a people loyal enough to overthrow treason and rebellion, and Grant was achieving those splendid victories of Donelson, Shiloh, Vicksburg, Mission Ridge, and Petersburg, they had not one word to say in favor of his convictions or one expression of encouragement and hope for his splendid achievements; and when he electrified the country by his assurances from the Wilderness that he "would fight it out on that line if it took all summer," they were silent and dumb.

But now because, forsooth, in his old age he has opened the channels to his heart and listened to Porter's appeals for sympathy, and said a kind word in his behalf, he becomes a demigod, and we are sacrilegious in questioning his judgment.

Mr. Chairman, for General Grant as a soldier and a statesman I have great respect. And for his achievements upon the field of battle this nation owes him a debt of gratitude which it should ever be our pleasure to honor and repay. But to my mind his opinions argue nothing for the friends of this bill. For eight years he was President of this nation and sworn as we are sworn to respect and uphold the Constitution of his country and to respect its laws; and during all this time, with this oath and duty resting upon his conscience, he upheld and approved the verdict of this court-martial. And it can not be said he did this without thought and without his attention being called specially to the complaints and grievances of General Porter, because, as has been so well said by the eloquent gentleman from Michigan, during those eight long years Fitz-John Porter stood knocking in season and out of season at the door of the White House asking General Grant to take his case under consideration and reopen it and furnish him a new hearing; and we must not forget that at that time, in answer to these importunities, Grant said in 1869, and again in 1874, that he had carefully considered the papers submitted by General Porter, and was not prepared upon the papers submitted to grant even a review. But now, when he is out of office, when he is without official cares and responsibilities, when the solemn obligations of an important office are not binding his duties to the people, he says remove this stigma from the name of General Porter.

But, Mr. Chairman, when as a private citizen he permits the kind sympathies of his nature to be appealed to, and asks us to strike down by legislative enactment this judgment of a court now standing for more than twenty years, he forgets that the same oath and the same duty to the Constitution and to the country is resting upon us that rested upon him for eight years, when he turned a deaf ear to sympathy and stood by his country and the right.

Mr. Chairman, as I have heard rain and dark nights pleaded as an excuse for General Porter, I could not but recall scenes long since familiar, but now rapidly passing from the recollections of us all—I could not but recall the days when the distinguished soldier who sits as chairman of the Military Committee, and favors the passage of this bill, was leading the boys of the Cumberland from Nashville to the bloody banks of the Chickamauga. I could not but recall how in those days if "Old Rosy," as the boys loved to call him, gave us an order to march at once, or to move at 1 o'clock in the morning, we knew what it meant, and we all knew that bad roads, swollen streams, inclement weather, and rebel forces were no excuses for not obeying the imperative orders of our chief. And so it is here, and it is in the light and remembrance of those days that we are to judge of and act upon this case.

It does not occur to me that it is necessary for one of us to spend a moment's time in discussing the proposition that a court sitting for the trial of an offender almost twenty years after the offense was committed is as likely to ascertain the truth and promote justice as the court which tries the case when all the participants to the transaction can be had and when all the circumstances are fresh in the recollection of witnesses. And this suggestion, for the purposes of this case, treats the board of review of 1878 as a court, which I deny. As has been argued, it was absolutely without power. It could not administer a lawful oath; it could not compel the attendance of a single witness; it could not execute an order or enter a judgment or sentence of any kind as the culmination of its investigations.

But the opinions of this board, composed of three officers, listening to the testimony almost twenty years after the wrong was committed, is set up for the purpose of overturning the judgment of the court of nine officers, listening to all the evidence when the facts and circumstances were fresh in the recollections of all, sanctioned as it is by the President and the conscience of the country. Mr. Chairman, for centuries criminals and criminal lawyers have known the importance of delay. They have known that in procrastination and delay was their only safety; that time was the essence of their defense; that if continuances and delays could be had from time to time until witnesses could die or be scattered beyond the jurisdiction and process of the court, and until the facts and the details and the minutiæ of the crime should pass from the recollections of those who remained, they would be measurably safe. And such is human imperfection and the frailties of our nature that this cannot be otherwise; and whatever may have been the object or motive of Fitz-John Porter in getting this review of his case in 1878, in my judgment as against the decree of that court-martial of 1862 it is absolutely worthless.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we can understand the anxiety and the pertinacity of this petitioner and we can sympathize with him in his misfortunes.

Milton put into the mouth of Satan this language: "Which way I fly is hell;" and so it is with this old man with this judgment resting upon him. But for this we are not responsible. Our duties are plain, and he alone is responsible for that conduct in August, 1862, which culminated in this court-martial and sentence.

Mr. Chairman, on some of the Southern battlefields monuments are erected to commemorate the achievements of the confederate dead. Of this I do not complain. They tell us in silent but eloquent lips the story of that conflict. They show us where the heresies of State rights and of secession went down shot to death by Union guns and pierced by loyal bayonets. They are milestones marking the pathway of that ill-fated confederacy. They tell us of its death, and not of the birth of the dogmas that gave it potency and power. I would not have it otherwise. For all the generations that are to come I would have them stand there to tell of the futile efforts made by man and of a great section of the country to overturn and destroy this Republic of America and to rear upon its ruins a confederacy dedicated to African slavery and human degradation and I would have them stand there to teach this impressive lesson to the generations yet unborn. And to the men who participated in that contest an appeal is now made to vindicate Fitz-John Porter.

For years many of them thought it no crime to fight against this Government, and therefore, where the wrong of Porter in refusing at such time to obey one of its military officers? We find Fitz-John Porter convicted by that distinguished court-martial upon the evidence of McClellan, Burnside, Pope, McDowell, Heintzelman, Morell, Griffin, Reynolds, Sykes, Butterfield, Buford, Parke, and a long list of Union soldiers, and we see him vindicated years afterward by this board of review upon the testimony and records of Lee, Longstreet, Jackson, Early, Hope, Gordon, Mosby, Rosser, Wilcox, and a score of other confederates, who think Porter was justified in not obeying in those days of peril the orders of his superior officer, Major-General Pope.

Are we surprised at this? Not that I impute perjury to them. Would they not have thought him justified if he had never unsheathed his sword in behalf of his country, but had permitted it to rust in its scabbard until his country had been wrecked and its institutions overthrown by disloyalty and treason? And it is upon this testimony that we are invited to vindicate a disobedient and unfaithful officer of the Union Army. And we are asked to do this, Mr. Chairman, not as partisans, but as patriots. We are asked to set aside our political prejudices and vindicate this man; and why? Because of the report of this board of review, and because the gentleman from New York assures us he is innocent. If he knows him to be innocent now he must have known it in 1862, and why did he not give to that court-martial the benefit of his distinguished information?

Why did he stand silent in those days of trouble when the doors of the court were open to him, and permit this wrong to be consummated against his friend?

But, Mr. Chairman, this appeal to us to set aside our political prejudices and to act as patriots is as amusing as it is pathetic. Is there a man upon the floor of this House who for one moment is so innocent and unsophisticated as to believe that this bill would for a single moment be urged upon our attention by the gentlemen upon the other side of this House if its beneficiary were not a distinguished member of the Democratic party?

But this cry of partisanship and sectionalism is not a new one. In the great North, where the Republican party has its power, liberty of conscience is encouraged, and every man is permitted to speak and vote his convictions, while in the opposite section of our country violence, intimidation, assassination, and murder stalk abroad with impunity, stifling conscience, violating liberty of speech, and striking down political opposition, and because under such circumstances we have no home there we are charged with being a sectional party.

And so it is, Mr. Chairman, in this debate. Upon this side of the Chamber we see men dividing upon this question and expressing their convictions for and against Porter as to them seems right, while upon the other side of this Chamber no voice is raised, no word is permitted to be uttered against this supplicant for a nation's charity, and yet they charge us with partisanship.

Was presumption ever more supreme!

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor of representing on the floor of this House a constituency that loves justice but abhors treason; a constituency that guarantees to every man absolute and impartial justice before the law; a constituency that protects every man, no matter what his color, what his nationality, or what his previous condition, in every constitutional right and privilege; a constituency, sir, without sectional bias, and where the late confederate is welcomed with open hands and invited to come and make a home, and cultivate the beautiful prairies, and assist us in rearing the grandest civilization of the ages; a constituency, sir, that has a larger number of ex-Union soldiers in proportion to its population than any State in this Union; a constituency that sent more soldiers into the field, and lost more men, and made more sacrifices for liberty and union, in proportion to its numbers, than any section of our country, and the judgment of that constituency is, Mr. Chairman, that Fitz-John Porter has no cause for complaint, but that he should ever feel grateful for the charity of the court-martial trying him and for the magnanimity of the Government that he wronged.

Dante says in that sublime poem of his that he found above the portals of the infernal regions this legend: "Leave all hope behind who enter here." And so we would have it for all the countless centuries that are to come, that he who organizes treason against his Government and marshals forces for its overthrow, as well as those who wear the uniform of the United States soldier and profess loyalty to the institutions of our land, but who upon the field of battle are guilty of insubordination and willful disobedience of orders and jeopardize the lives and limbs of thousands who are defending the country against its enemies, should remember this inscription, and understand before entering upon so great a wrong that there shall be no hope for them so long as loyalty is honored and good deeds are respected, and so long as this Republic stands as a hope, an aspiration, an encouragement for the poor and oppressed everywhere; and to that end, Mr. Chairman, should remain forever this record of condemnation for the deeds and action of Fitz-John Porter. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BREWER].

Mr. BREWER, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to detain the committee with any lengthy remarks. I do not intend to weary your patience with vain repetitions. The great questions of fact and of evidence have been so fully and so exhaustively presented to the House that I need refer to them only in passing. It was my purpose when the discussion of this subject was commenced to simply vote in the negative, and then, if it were possible, to forget that such a man as Fitz-John Porter ever existed. But, sir, the discussion of this subject by the friends of the bill, and the friends of the gentleman in whose behalf it was framed, has taken so wide a range and been of such a character that I should be doing violence to my own feelings, doing great injustice to the district which I have the honor to represent, as well as to the memory of the many Union soldiers who fell during the last days of August, 1862, on the banks of the Potomac, in the vicinity of Manassas, Gainesville, and Bristoe Station, were I to utter no protest to the passage of this measure. I cannot forget, sir, that the disobedience of this one man brought great sorrow into the hearts and homes of my constituents. Therefore I ask the indulgence of the House while, in a few words and as concisely as possible, I give some of the reasons why it is utterly out of the question for me to in any manner aid in the passage of this bill.

If the American citizen and the American soldier have one common shrine at which they may kneel and offer their pure and fervent devotion, that shrine is the altar of their country. If there is a principle of honor which the military officer should cherish above all earthly emoluments and above all selfish considerations, it is the honor of his flag and loyalty to his Government. If these qualities are wanting, he is neither the fit custodian of the one nor the proper representative of the other. Entering the school at West Point at an early age, General Porter became the child of the Government. He grew up under her fostering care and was educated at the nation's expense. How he repaid that kindness will be shown as we go on. There is but one law to govern this case and that is martial law. The emergencies of war, the exigencies which arise during the continuance of a long campaign, render it utterly impossible that a breach of trust in the army, disobedience of orders at a critical period during an engagement, or improper conduct in the presence of the enemy, could await the slow and uncertain proceedings in our civil courts; hence military law is at once arbitrary, swift, and decisive. In no other way could effective military operations be carried on and serviceable military discipline maintained; therefore all infractions of army regulations and neglect of duty come before a court-martial for trial, and this was the kind of court before which this officer was tried and by whose unanimous verdict he was convicted and condemned.

The case presented for our consideration this day embraces two specific charges. One was for disobedience of orders from a superior officer, and the other for improper conduct in the presence of the enemy. On both he was found guilty by the grave and irreproachable gentlemen that conducted his trial. If Fitz-John Porter was loyal to his flag and loyal to his country why did he waste those precious hours, nay, precious minutes, at Warrenton, for every minute the next day was big with events, and brought hope or despair to the hearts of the Union troops as the fortunes of the hour were for or against them? Why did he remain at ease in Warrenton? Was he hugging the delusive phantom of hope—hope, sir, that by this delay Pope might be crushed and McClellan again placed in command? It looks very much like it. If ever a soldier had an opportunity to display his zeal and manifest his devotion and loyalty to his country General Porter had it on that occasion when he received the order from his commanding officer, General Pope, dated at Bristoe Station, August 27, 1862:

GENERAL: The major-general commanding directs that you start at 1 o'clock to-night and come forward with your whole corps, or such part of it as is with you, so as to be here by daylight to-morrow. Hooker has had a very severe action with the enemy, with a loss of about 300 killed and wounded. The enemy have been driven back, but is retiring along the railroad. We must drive him from Manassas and clear the country between that place and Gainesville, where McDowell is. If Morell has not joined you send word to him to push forward at once. Also, send word to Banks to hurry forward with all speed to take your place at Warrenton Junction. It is necessary on all accounts that you be here by daylight. I send an officer with this dispatch, who will conduct you to this place. Be sure to send word to Banks, who is on the road from Fayetteville, probably in the direction of Bealeton. Say to Banks also that he had best run back the railroad trains to this side of Cedar Run. If he is not with you, write him to that effect.

By command of Major-General Pope.

GEORGE D. RUGGLES,
Chief of Staff.

If this order meant anything, it meant just what it said; it intended to convey to the mind of General Porter that he should start at 1 o'clock sharp, that he should be at the place designated early in the morning. "It is necessary on all accounts that you should be here by daylight." Did he obey this order, did he start at 1 o'clock? It is not pretended that he did. No; there was a lion in the way—the roads were blockaded with wagons, the night was dark. Did he attempt to do it? No; and in fact, as shown by one of his own command, the Fifth Army Corps, the best equipped and most efficient body of men connected with the Army of the Potomac, lingered around Warrenton until daylight next morning, when it should have been at Bristoe Station, and all for want of a leader loyal to his country and to his flag. Why did not General Porter get everything in readiness for an early departure? Why were not his troops ready at 1 o'clock to start for Bristoe Station? Why was he not there himself to give the order to march, and double-quick if necessary? Was this obedience to orders in a military acceptation of the term? At 5.30 a. m. on the 29th he received another order, which contained these words:

A severe engagement is likely to take place and your presence is needed.

This was received with the same apathetic indifference as the former on the 27th. Here he lingered at Bethlehem church, and here he remained nearly all day. Was he making preparations for attacking the enemy, or even to protect his own army if he should be attacked? Nothing of the kind was done. He still delayed, and it was at this point of time that McDowell said to him, as they sat on their horses taking a view of the surroundings: "General Porter, you go in here and I will move farther down." Porter's reply, it seems to me, is the essence of the whole situation: "We can't go in here anywhere without getting into a fight;" and McDowell says, "I supposed that was what we were here for." Did he go in? No, sir; he did not. Every wind that swept over the hills brought to his ears the roar of the enemy's cannon. Every breeze that came down the valley bore with it the rattle of musketry. He still delayed, and the work of death still went on, and brave troops were being killed and wounded till they lay in heaps on the bloody field. They died where they fought for the Government which they loved, for the flag of their fathers, worn and torn as it had been in the wars of our country, that it might not be trailed and trampled in the mire and dirt of rebellion. Where was the Fifth Corps that was to bring succor to their decimated ranks? Reclining under the droppings of the sanctuary at Bethlehem, ready and willing to fight, but virtually without a leader; eager to go to the front, but there was none to give the command.

Where, where was Roderick then?
One blast upon his bugle horn
Were worth a thousand men.

Fitz-John Porter was tried by a court of nine military men of high standing and irreproachable character. For nearly three months the trial went on, the defense had every facility to bring and examine witnesses, the circumstances were all fresh in their minds, the evidence was conclusive, and such men as Generals Burnside, Hunter, Garfield, Rufus King, and Hitchcock rendered a verdict against General Porter by which he was dismissed from the Army and forever debarred from holding any office of trust under the Government. And I wish to say just one word in regard to the letter written by General Grant. Eight long years passed during which he had the power, and the only power on earth, which could pardon Fitz-John Porter; he was importuned by individuals, he was visited by delegations, he was flooded with letters and petitions; he did it not. But some kind of bee got into his bonnet, and he made a mistake; it was the mistake of kindness, and I have no word to say against it. I have loyally followed where General Grant has led, but in this our roads diverge; he takes his own judgment years and years after the trial; I take the judgment of the court-martial, every member of that court, nine in number, men equally qualified to judge as General Grant himself.

Let no man dare to charge that tribunal which convicted him with deviation from the principles of exact justice, or from their honest convictions of right in rendering this decision. In looking through one of the leading Democratic newspapers in commenting on this case, it says Garfield's reputation stands in the way of a vindication of General Porter; let it be brushed away like the flimsy thing that it is. It regards Lincoln as only the simple tool of the designing men in charge of this important trial. If, sir, the vindication of Fitz-John Porter is to be obtained at the expense of such characters and reputations as Lincoln and Garfield left behind them; if in order to be reinstated the friends of this man must blacken and defile the fair fame of the martyred dead, and set at naught the judgment and integrity of the living—then, I say, let mercy stay her hand and judgment remain.

But I need not refer to the testimony which compelled the verdict on that trial. The facts brought out on the trial of this case were clear and unanswerable, and so unmistakable that the righteousness of the verdict and findings of that court-martial have scarcely been questioned; indeed, there was hardly an effort by the gentleman who introduced the bill to disprove the evidence or to set aside the facts presented to the court. And now the question is, shall he be reinstated, with the rights, rank, and emoluments pertaining to that position? If we were to be governed by sympathy and personal considerations, as the honorable gentleman from New York seems to be, we might, perhaps, permit our feelings to override our judgment and vote for the bill. If we were to allow ourselves to believe that we owe to General Porter a debt of gratitude for previous services sufficient to obliterate the dark blot cast upon the honor of every true and loyal American soldier by his disobedience and insubordination, as some gentlemen seem to think we do, then we might vote for the bill. Sir, we may pass this bill, or any other bill; we can never make black white, it is too late; no appeal from the court that tried him can do it; no improvised commission appointed to reinvestigate the case can do it; no act of Congress can ever relieve this deeper disability which must ever attach to the name of Fitz-John Porter. "No, not all the blood of all the Howards" can do it.

And finally, what is obeying orders in the military acceptation of the term? I will tell you in the thrilling words of Tennyson:

"Forward, the Light Brigade!
Charge for the guns!" he said.
* * *
Cannon to right of them,
Cannon to left of them,
Cannon in front of them—
* * *
Into the jaws of death,
Into the mouth of hell,
Rode the six hundred.

That is what I should call obedience to orders, and let consequences take care of themselves. This example of insubordination of Fitz-John Porter, if overlooked or condoned, will be subversive of all military discipline and materially weaken the confidence which the American people have always placed in the honor, the loyalty, and virtue of the officers of the Army. If the punishment is severe, so was the bitterness and sorrow his disobedience brought to the hearts of the loyal people whose sons and fathers were killed and wounded in that three days' fight. In the pain and mortification which Fitz-John Porter brought upon himself, and which for a score of years has weighed him down with sorrow and remorse, he has the ever-present consciousness that he alone was at fault.

So the struck eagle, stretch'd upon the plain,
No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
View'd his own feather on the fatal dart,
And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his heart;
Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel,
He nursed the pinion which impell'd the steel.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I look upon the proposed action of this House on the bill now pending as being in the nature of a motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, or as an appeal; at least the rules of evidence and of practice are applicable in the jurisdiction of this bill.

To set aside the verdict of a jury the prima facies are changed. The court-martial that tried Fitz-John Porter went upon the theory that he was innocent until he was proven guilty. The prima facies having been changed, it is our duty to treat him as guilty until you have proven him to be innocent. The burden of proof is shifted, and you gentlemen must make out your case beyond a reasonable doubt before you have the right to ask the vindication of this guilty man.

I ask whether there is any material testimony which was not before the court of competent jurisdiction that tried Fitz-John Porter which was not traversed by that court except the question as to the relative position of the rebel army? Not one material fact; and therefore before any court in Christendom the new testimony which has been spoken of would amount to mere nothing. All of it is testimony that was traversed by the court-martial, or could have been had, except that concerning the relative position of the rebel army. And that can have no bearing on the guilt or innocence of Porter.

I care not where Longstreet was; I care not whether Porter could have struck his right flank or his left flank; I care not whether he faced Longstreet or not; his order was direct, positive, and unmistakable.

As has been stated here by the friends of Porter, that McDowell did not order him to fight, i. e., did not say "go in here," but only said, "Porter, you are too far out; that is not the place to fight." Well, sir, if that was not the place to fight, why did not Porter go to the proper place to fight, and not remain idle the whole day in sight and hearing of the fight? The only inference to be drawn from your own statement of McDowell's order is that Porter was to go in some place to fight; yet he absolutely refused to go in at any place, thus disobeying the spirit as well as the letter of the order.

Now, what is the defense? Darkness, rain, mist, wagons. Great God! have men no other defense for refusing to obey an order in time of war than darkness, mist, rain, and wagons? Had it been Napoleon he would have set the flambeau to the wagons and burned them up; he would have broken them to pieces and passed along, allowing no such thing as wagons to have interfered with him.

And will you tell me that the danger of Porter being cut to pieces was any excuse for not obeying the orders which he had received? When Napoleon on a certain occasion was met by his marshal and told that if he crossed the bridge it would cost him the half of his army, Napoleon's reply was, "I had rather lose half my army to-day than the whole of it to-morrow." If Porter's corps would have been cut to pieces, that was no matter of his. Perhaps it would have been better had it been cut to pieces than that the battle of the 30th should have turned out as disastrously as it did.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect in the brief time allotted me to discuss in detail the merits of the bill now under consideration. I do want, however, to enter my protest against the utterances of certain gentlemen in regard to military courts. Again and again during this discussion they have been maligned, traduced, and calumniated as unworthy the respect or confidence of modern civilization. They have been held up before this House as a mockery of justice and as a stigma upon the age in which we live. As very little reply has been made to this sort of argument I wish to say a word in regard to military courts.

For more that two years during the late war I had the honor of serving as judge-advocate of various military courts. And after the war I served for some considerable time as citizen judge-advocate, closing up the business of the military district and department of which I had been for a time judge-advocate. These courts were held in city and camp, sometimes in one State and sometimes in another. Of the prisoners tried by these courts some were executed, some were imprisoned, some were sent to the Dry Tortugas, some were acquitted, and some received that mild sort of sentence adjudged against Fitz-John Porter—were cashiered, that is, they lost their insignia of rank and that other right so dear to every American citizen, the right of holding office. I have also practiced law in the civil courts for more than twenty years, in the State courts, and in the United States courts, and I am frank to say, in the face of all this glorification of our civil jurisprudence to which we have been listening from the other side of the House, that in my judgment the findings and sentences of military courts are entitled to as much respect and confidence as any jury system the world ever saw. Why should it be thought otherwise? Were not the officers of the Army, who are found in such large numbers on this floor, just as competent as the masses from which the average jury is chosen? Military courts sometimes make mistakes; juries do the same.

And while I do not propose to discuss the constitutionality of military courts, I want to say that no civilized nation, in this age or in any other age, has ever been able to dispense with them. Without military courts there would be no discipline in the Army or Navy, and without discipline the Army and Navy would be utterly powerless. Destroy this system of compelling obedience to orders and this Government would not live a single day.

The offense for which Fitz-John Porter was tried was cognizable only in a military court, and could have been tried in no other. If he could ignore the orders of General Pope, every other subordinate could do the same; and then, indeed, the war would have been "a failure."

And if these courts are authorized by the Constitution and the laws of the country, as we hold they are, this political body, this legislative branch of the Government has no more right to interfere with the decision of the military court that sat in the case of Fitz-John Porter than it has to interfere with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. If, however, we are wrong in this, if there was a want of jurisdiction of the person of Fitz-John Porter or of the offense for which he was tried, in the court that tried him, or if the proceedings of that court were in any way illegal, he has a complete remedy at law; he has an adequate remedy in the civil courts of the country, and should appeal to them, and not to this House. The courts of this country are always ready to break the shackles, to open the prison doors to any American citizen, black or white, bond or free, who is entitled to his liberty. No form of trial, no mockery of jurisprudence can stand in the way of our grand judicial system, which scrutinizes with eager eye and jealous care the rights and liberties of all our citizens.

But the friends of Fitz-John Porter are not content with glittering generalities as to the competency of military courts in general, but this particular court is arraigned before the bar of this House for gross misconduct and gross injustice. As to the personnel of this court I have but little to say. Charges had been preferred against a general of the Army who was entitled by military law to be tried by his peers, and such men as General Hunter, General Hitchcock, General Ricketts, General King, General Prentiss, General Garfield, and others were convened for this purpose. Illustrious names in American history! General Holt, of Kentucky, who was then Judge-Advocate-General of the Army, was made judge-advocate of this court. Did not the Government honor Fitz-John Porter in giving his case into the hands of nine distinguished generals, and in appointing a judge-advocate who was alike distinguished for his eminent fitness for this position?

The names of these men, a majority of whom to-day sleep in the arms of death, are themselves a guarantee of a patient, impartial, and fair trial. Fitz-John Porter himself, and his distinguished counsel, Reverdy Johnson, gave their assent to the eminent fitness of this tribunal, and declined to object to a single member. Why should they? They were mainly educated where Fitz-John Porter was educated, had served in the same army in which he had served, and many of them were his warm personal friends. Could he have chosen a court more likely to be favorable to him than this, if he believed in his own innocency? And yet this is the court whose integrity is now on trial.

The distinguished gentlemen on the other side in their denunciation of the proceedings of this court have seen fit, as I before remarked, to be specific in their charges of misconduct, which are as follows: first, that the court-martial before whom Fitz-John Porter was tried permitted General Holt, the judge-advocate, to remain in the room with the members of the court when they had retired for deliberation and for the decision of certain law questions which had been previously argued and submitted; second, that General Rufus King brought disgrace upon the court by coming down from his high position as judge or juror and giving testimony as to some matter of fact of which he had personal knowledge; third, that during the progress of the case an order was read from the Secretary of War authorizing the court to sit without reference to hours and directing the court to proceed as rapidly as the ends of justice would permit.

These are the so-called grave charges which have been preferred against this court, and for which its proceedings are now to be reversed.

Let me say a word as to the fairness of such accusations. As to the first charge, I need only say that General Holt simply did as every judge-advocate does, in every military trial, whether it be a military commission or a court-martial, whether the judge-advocate be a military or citizen judge-advocate. The judge-advocate is the recorder of the court, and is required by law to remain with the court when it is cleared for the decision of questions of law, or when it is cleared for any purpose whatever, and the law requires him to call the roll of the members of the court, beginning always with the junior officer, and record not only the vote of each member but the result of the vote so ascertained. The judge-advocate takes no part in the deliberations of the court after it is cleared, and is as much forbidden by his oath from doing so as he is from disclosing what occurs during these secret deliberations. The court-martial was not as well off as your committees are. It had no clerk; the judge-advocate was its only clerk, its only recorder.

A great deal has been said eulogizing the Schofield board as being without spot or blemish or any such thing, and yet it had a judge-advocate, though he was called a recorder, which means the same, and I see from the report that he was not only permitted to be present during the deliberations, but actually took part in them, and was assigned the duty of collecting and collating testimony.

And gentlemen forget in this connection that a judge-advocate is not a mere prosecutor; that he is himself an officer of the court, whose duty it is to see that the innocent are protected as well as that the guilty are punished. And my knowledge of General Holt is that no man in this broad land of ours had a higher sense of justice or did his duty more faithfully than Judge-Advocate-General Holt.

As to the second charge, permit me to say there was no impropriety whatever in General King giving this testimony. He was authorized to make his statements under oath to that court, just as members of our grand juries are to the grand jury before whom a matter is being heard. And yet who ever heard of an indictment being quashed for this reason? But allow me to say further, if this invalidates the decision of that court, how much more fatal will be the objection to the tribunal before which this case is now being heard? Here are gentlemen before me who have been making statements of fact, men who have been pleading the cause of Fitz-John Porter, who propose to act as judges in the final vote soon to be taken. The personal friends and champions of his cause are here making statements not under oath, and not only making statements, but making prepared arguments in his favor. And these same men propose to vote for the restoration of Fitz-John Porter to his former place in the Army on the ground that the sentence of the court that tried him should be reversed because a single member of that court gave testimony. Oh, consistency, what a jewel thou art!

As to the third charge I can make the same answer. The tribunal which tried and convicted Fitz-John Porter sat for forty-five days, with no business before it but this case; and if hurried a little by the order of the Secretary of War (and we have no assurance that it was, for the testimony of the defense was closed before that order was read to the court), it spent nine times as much time in the consideration of this case as this House proposes to give it under the limitation which has been fixed by the gentlemen in charge of the bill.

The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] makes the objection that possibly—yes, possibly (he does not know, nor pretend to know)—the decision of that court may have been made by five votes in favor of conviction and four votes against it. We do not know this; he does not know it. The law wisely sealed the lips of the court, and the lips of the judge-advocate as well, on this matter. And whether the vote stood five to four, six to three, seven to two, eight to one, or nine in favor, it is the judgment of the court all the same. If this were an objection to the findings and sentence of that court-martial, it would be an objection to the judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States, which are sometimes reached by a majority of one, and yet it is the decision of the court as much as if the judges were unanimous. And when such a decision is made, whether right or wrong, it stands, and all the power of this Government, its Army and Navy, its blood and its treasure, stand pledged to its execution. I have somewhere heard of a decision of eight to seven which decided who should be President of the United States, and I do not think my distinguished friend from New Jersey would want the decision reversed for this reason even at this late date.

Other gentlemen, less extreme in their views, have not denounced military courts to such an extent as those to whom I have before referred, but content themselves by saying that they are in favor of subordinating the military tribunals and military power to the civil. That sounds well; we have heard it before. The question is, however, how much subordination do you favor? If the theory of subordination which prevailed among certain classes during the war should be adopted, or had it then been adopted, our military courts and our Army and Navy would have been subordinated out of existence. No more money, no more men, no arbitrary arrests, no military despotism. That is what such subordination meant then. Does it mean less now?

Reverse the decree of 1862, annul and efface the findings of the highest military court ever convened in this country, stigmatize the heroes of the war, cover with shame and reproach the name and memory of the immortal Lincoln, the lamented Garfield, the indefatigable Stanton, the brave and true Halleck, and you will have done a great deal more than subordinate the military to the civil.

Mr. Chairman, we are asked here in our official capacity as the Congress of the United States to place the seal of condemnation on the decision of a military court that has stood unscathed, unreversed, and above reproach for twenty-two years; a court that was convened in time of war, when the spot where it sat was red with the blood of fallen heroes, when the hills and valleys which stretched out in every direction were trembling beneath the tread of marching armies, and when the whole heavens were dark with the smoke of battle. The life of the nation was in peril, and the men who were charged with rescuing it from the jaws of death were struggling to suppress the rebellion and save to generations to come the priceless boon of constitutional liberty.

An officer of the Government who had been educated and honored by its liberality, knowing the rules of war and the path of duty, under an oath to obey his superior officers, in the hour of battle refused to obey the orders of the commander whom President Lincoln had placed over him. Charges were preferred; a fair and impartial trial was had; the accused was found guilty; the findings and sentence were approved by the President, and all was done according to that law which is alone applicable to the vocation upon which Fitz-John Porter had voluntarily entered. And now it is proposed that the decree of this court shall be reversed by that branch of the Government whose only duty is to make laws, not to construe or enforce them. It matters little now to this Government whether Fitz-John Porter go on the retired-list or not so far as he himself is concerned, but this precedent may come back like a thunderbolt thrown from the hand of the Eternal and shake this Government to its very center. There are gentlemen on this floor who profess to guard with great care the encroachments of one branch of the Government on another, and now they are ready to usurp the powers, and absolutely annul the decree of a constitutional and legal court. This is now the argumentum ad hominem of the hour, and it may prove the argumentum ad ignorantiam.

A labored effort has been made in this discussion to eliminate from it all political allusions. In my judgment it is a political question, and I propose to consider it as such so far as it may be necessary in order to present my views. This opposition to courts-martial is not a new feature with a certain political party that now dominates this House. If it were I should make no objection to the arguments on the other side. I have seen too much and know too well the character of this antagonism to military courts. During the time I was judge-advocate I learned this peculiar fact: that if we tried a prisoner for going to sleep on his post, for murder, or theft, we had no trouble in executing the sentence—none whatever; but if we tried a prisoner for any crime that smacked of treason or disloyalty, there were always men, influential and prominent men, who interfered and used every influence in their power to rescue the prisoner from the sentence of the court. And more than this, in many localities in the North it was utterly impossible to convict a prisoner in a civil court of any offense which assumed a political phase, and during the war a great many cases somehow or other took on this aspect.

In the town in which I reside, a Government officer, a provost-marshal, was shot dead in his own door-yard in the presence of his wife and children. The murderers were arrested a few days later, in the same county, concealed in a barn, at noon-day. The evidence of their guilt was overwhelming, and yet we did not dare in that county to try that case before the civil court because of this political element. A certain class of newspapers and a certain class of men espoused their cause and at once became their champions. The man whom they murdered had been a remarkably vigilant officer; had arrested deserters, had ferreted out frauds upon the Government, and done his duty faithfully and well.

The murderers were total strangers, not a single person in the town knew either of them, and yet they had hundreds of friends who openly declared their innocence and extended to them their sympathy. We applied to General Hooker, first for a guard to protect the jail, and subsequently for a military court to come there and try them, and he granted both requests. And I shall never forget the howl that went up about that military court; how it was denounced by certain newspapers, and how in the opinion of many it ought to be driven from the county at the point of the bayonet. So great was this excitement that it continued to the end of the trial, which lasted fully three months, and when the testimony was carried to Cincinnati by the order of General Ord, whose remains were spoken of in this House only a few days since, he deemed it his duty, owing to the political excitement, to approve the record himself, and conceal from the public the order he made for the execution of the prisoners, allowing no one to know the result except the prisoners and the officers in the camp in charge of them until the culprits were ready for interment and when interference with the sentence was impossible. He took the responsibility of approving the sentence and of seeing it executed, after which he forwarded the three thousand pages of testimony to the President. When asked why he concealed the fact that they were to be executed from the press and the public, he said he was determined to avoid the interference of certain politicians who always interfered in such cases; who misled and improperly influenced the President. He knew by experience what that was, and in this case he proposed to avoid it.

I know, Mr. Chairman, another case which occurred in another State where a Government officer was shot down under like circumstances. This case was tried before a civil court. Forty jurors were called, from whom the panel was to be chosen. Twenty of these were Republicans and twenty were Democrats. Every Republican when interrogated said he had formed and expressed an opinion, and hence they were all excluded from the jury. The Democrats, or at least twelve of them, said they had not formed or expressed any opinion, and the case was tried to them. The result was that the bloody-handed murderer was acquitted. This is only an illustration of the beauties of our civil system, which lie so near the heart of some of the gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber.

Not only this, but it often occurred that men who were tried and condemned by military courts became not only martyrs, but heroes. I once knew an officer who was cashiered for cowardice on the eve of a battle and sent home in disgrace. He had scarcely reached home until he was chosen sergeant-at-arms of a Democratic State senate, and became at once "a bigger man than old Grant." How many such instances can you name?

There was another man, little known in the country except as his name was connected with a bill which he had introduced in Congress for the dissolution of the Union. He, too, was tried and convicted before a military court for disloyal acts. This court was convened in Ohio by General Burnside under that celebrated Order No. 38. The sentence was expatriation, and Vallandigham went to Canada—left his country for his country's good.

The old slave escaping to Canada used to sing:

> I'm on my way to Canada,
> That cold and dreary land;
> The dire effects of slavery
> I can no longer stand.

That was not Vallandigham's song. He went away not to escape the dire effects of slavery, but to serve out the sentence of a military court, and to this day his friends have an awful fear of such tribunals.

Strange to say, he had scarcely reached the fond embraces of his British cousins when he was nominated for governor in the great State of Ohio by the great Democratic party. This is what a military court did for Vallandigham. And, in this connection, I must call the attention of the House to a little bit of history which will show what kind of atmosphere Fitz-John Porter was breathing, which may explain why he was so ready to criticise the Government and so obstinate in his disobedience to the orders of General Pope.

The convention which nominated Vallandigham for governor sent seventeen distinguished Democratic statesmen, representing the then seventeen Congressional districts of that State, to Washington for the purpose of procuring the revocation of the sentence of banishment, which still separated this patriot martyr from his friends in Ohio. This committee, as I now remember, went first to New York, organized, elected a chairman and secretary, prepared a state paper, which they brought to Washington and handed to President Lincoln. The seventeen Ohio Democrats were all present and looked grave and solemn. Lincoln read it, and in a little while he handed them two papers, one the duplicate of the other, and said to them that if a majority of them, each acting for himself and representing nobody, would indorse and return one of these paper agreeing to three things, he would revoke the sentence and permit Vallandigham to return. The three things which he asked these Democratic statesmen to consent to were in substance these:

First. That there is now in existence a rebellion, and that the Army and Navy can be properly employed to suppress it. To this, Mr. Chairman, they refused their assent. Hear the next. In the second place he asked them, or a majority of them, to promise that they would not discourage enlistments or encourage desertions from the Army. This, too, they refused. In the third place he asked them to agree to use their influence, so far as they had any, in favor of clothing, feeding, and paying the Union soldiers. This they likewise refused. Yes, Mr. Chairman, these seventeen Democratic statesmen, representing all the Congressional districts of the State, preferred to let their great leader Clement L. Vallandigham languish and pine across the border in Canada rather than assent to these three propositions.

I refer to this for the purpose of letting in on the military court that tried Fitz-John Porter a little of the light that then shed its rays all through the North. Is it strange that Fitz-John Porter should be found guilty of disobedience of orders and of misbehavior in the presence of the enemy, when so many of his friends were crying, "Good Lord, good devil; for we don't know into whose hands we will fall?"

Deny it as you will now, there was a time when disloyalty ran riot in the North, when the air was full of sympathy for the rebellion, when State and county conventions were bold in their expressions of disloyalty, when men openly rejoiced at rebel victories and groaned over our success, when thousands of men were ready to hail with gladness the news of the success of the Southern army. Secret organizations, such as the Sons of Liberty and Knights of the Golden Circle, were in full bloom in several of the largest States. And I have in my possession now some of the relics of Greek fire and maps of rebel prisons found on the persons of men who were drilling Copperheads by moonlight in Southern Indiana. The scheme was, as claimed by the prisoners themselves, to release twenty thousand rebel prisoners, march them to the arsenals and arm them, and then with fire and sword sweep the entire North as with a besom of destruction. This was the scheme that had its allies in the North, and this was the absolute necessity for military courts. In such times as these civil courts are wholly inadequate.

These men, be they who they may, who sympathized with the rebellion and refused to give a cordial support to the Government in its effort to suppress it, became somehow or other the friends of the Democratic party as it was then constituted. Why was McClellan nominated in 1864? Was it because of his "masterly inactivity" or was it because he was a successful general? It could not be the latter, for the same convention that nominated him declared the war a failure.

I do not mean, Mr. Chairman, to charge the Democratic party with disloyalty during the war. By no means. Democrats and Republicans fought side by side in every battle and sleep side by side in every cemetery. But all these men who were supposed to have a taint of disloyalty were Democrats. If that is any honor, the Democratic party is entitled to it; if it is any disgrace, they can not complain of the truth of history.

It is worse than idle to claim that there is no politics in this bill. Who will deny that the hope of the success of Fitz-John Porter's bill in this House lies in the fact that there is here such a large Democratic majority? If there were as large a Republican majority no one would expect the passage of the bill, and the fact that a few Republicans will vote for the bill and a few Democrats against it does not in anywise rebut this proposition.

I have deemed it proper, Mr. Chairman, in view of my personal knowledge of military courts, to present my views in regard to them, and to say what I consider deserves to be said in their behalf, in view of the severe manner in which they have been maligned. I have attempted to show how inadequate the civil courts were during the recent war either to punish the guilty or to protect the innocent. I have also attempted to show that this hatred of military courts is no new thing, that it had its origin in the late war, and that the sympathy here extended to Fitz-John Porter comes mainly from the same party who extended like sympathy to men charged with disloyalty during the war. I can not consent that these gentlemen who have so maligned military courts, and who have held up to public execration some of the noblest men the world ever saw, shall be permitted to forget their own record.

I have nothing to say, Mr. Chairman, in this discussion, about the men who vacated their seats in this House and in the Army and Navy, and went boldly into the thickest of the fight under the flag of the rebellion. They showed the courage of their convictions and voted as they shot. They had the virtue of consistency. If Fitz-John Porter's sympathies were not with the North, if he did not love his country enough to follow any leader his country placed over him, he should have followed Lee. If all the men whose sympathies were with the rebellion had gone with the South we then would have known where they were, and the war would not have been prolonged as it was.

Abraham Lincoln said, when interrogated as to the punishment of Vallandigham, that the man who dissuaded a soldier from enlisting in the Union Army or the man who persuaded a soldier to desert was as much a traitor as the rebel who shot down a Union soldier in the front ranks of the Army. This is the theory of the Republican party, and this is the theory that so many Democratic leaders, not all, so persistently condemn. This is the reason why the former has stood by military courts during all the years of the war, and this is the reason why the Democratic party, in the main, has always been, as it is now, opposed to them.

Do the friends of Fitz-John Porter believe their own assertions in regard to his innocence? Do they believe he was as true a patriot and as brave a soldier as ever followed any flag or fought any battle? Do they believe that the court which tried him and sentenced him to be cashiered did him gross injustice? If they do, why do they not propose in this bill to do him justice? If he was innocent, the present bill is an insult. If he was innocent, he is entitled to all his pay for the years of his disability, and then he would not be compensated. This bill only proposes to restore him to the pay of colonel and then to place him on the retired-list. This of itself is a confession that his friends have not full faith in his innocence or in their ability to vindicate him, even in this political tribunal. If I could vote for the passage of this bill I could vote for his complete restoration and for the fullest compensation for all the years since his conviction.

It is from no feeling of malignity toward Fitz-John Porter that I oppose the passage of this bill. On the contrary, my sympathies have been touched by the earnest appeals in his behalf. But it is because I tremble for the safety of this Republic when it is proposed to ignore the precedents of the past and invite endless complications for the future.

I have not attempted to discuss the evidence or facts upon which the court reached its conclusions. There are reasons above and beyond these more important to this Government than the life or the liberty of any one individual—questions which may in the near future involve the life of the Republic itself. If the finding of the court that tried Fitz-John Porter can be set aside by partisan interference, what court in the land is safe in its jurisdiction? The judgments of the Supreme Court of the United States can all be set aside. The findings and sentences of every military court that sat during the war can be reversed, so far as any part of the sentences remain unexecuted.

Mr. Chairman, in behalf of the soldiers of my native State, many of whom sleep to-day in unmarked graves; in behalf of those brave and true patriots who cast aside party affiliations, who left home and wife and children to follow their country's flag and die, if need be, to save it from dishonor; in behalf of my country, so deeply interested in the decision of this hour, I desire to enter my protest against the passage of this bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to be able to occupy more than five minutes in the discussion of this case; and in order to fit myself for the discussion I have given careful study to all the proceedings of the different courts, all the maps that have been filed, and all the data that were within my reach, and I have concluded, at least to my own satisfaction, that I can not vote for this bill. I can not vote for it, Mr. Chairman, because of the questions involved in the merits of the case as I find them. I believe that there can be no question that those who bring to the study of this case a mind undivided by other considerations than the determination to do exact justice between this party and the Government must arrive at the conclusion that the court which originally tried General Fitz-John Porter was right and that its judgment was correct.

But aside from that I could not now vote for this proposition. I am asked by the friends of this bill to place myself in the attitude of one reviewing the judgment of a court of ample power. I am asked, in other words, to set aside a verdict. Why? They tell me because there is newly discovered evidence; they tell me because there was conflict at least in the testimony of the witnesses who appeared in the court below. No one can dispute the proposition that there was conflict in the evidence; that the various propositions were denied by some and affirmed by others.

What is the duty of a court of review when there is conflict in the testimony? It is to allow the verdict to stand, because those who have seen the witnesses, those who have heard them testify, those who have had an opportunity to test and judge of their credibility are more competent to determine where the actual verities of the case are and what particular witnesses should be believed or disbelieved. You, gentlemen, ask me to overturn this well-established, this universal rule, recognized by all the courts of this country. You ask me to reverse this verdict because you say there is newly discovered evidence. Evidence of what character? Was there brought before the court of review or is there now urged here a particle of evidence that does not bear upon one of the disputed propositions in the court-martial? The whole of this newly discovered evidence is at best but cumulative in its character. There is none bearing upon points that were not in controversy before the court-martial.

What is the rule of courts in cases of this kind? Are new trials given upon newly discovered evidence that is merely cumulative in its character? Where do you find the court that will sustain a proposition of that kind? So that whatever the merits of the case, leaving them entirely out of the question, I can rest my judgment on this matter upon well-defined, well-recognized, and undisputed propositions of law that no one of the gentlemen upon the other side will in my judgment deign or dare to gainsay.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How much time, Mr. Chairman, have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Two minutes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I yield those two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to occupy the time of this House in discussing this question, but inasmuch as I have paired with my colleague [Mr. RANDALL], who is necessarily absent, and who if present would have voted ay, I desire to place myself on record, and it is the greater pleasure for me to do so, for the sentiments of my constituents are in accord with my own convictions.

I am opposed to the passage of this bill, not because I believe Porter was disloyal to his country on those three days in August of 1862 in the common acceptation of that term; not because I believe Porter held back from fear, but because I believe Porter on the 28th and 29th days of August, 1862, cherished such an animus toward those who had removed McClellan, and had such an animus toward Pope, that he failed to do his whole duty, and was guilty, during those two days, of such acts of insubordination toward his superior officer that justified the finding of the court-martial.

I believe, sir, that Porter did not wish to see Pope successful in that campaign.

In the language of a distinguished soldier and statesman of this country who had the intelligence and the ability to study and decide this question, General Jacob D. Cox, a soldier speaking to soldiers of the Society of ex-Army and Navy Officers of Cincinnati, on February 28, 1882:

> To remit the remainder of a continuing punishment by restoring him to citizenship, like other acts of amnesty and oblivion, would be magnanimous.

This has been done.

> But to vote him a triumph, to record his conduct as the model of chivalry and excellent soldiership, to enrich him from the public Treasury, to restore him to his rank, to retire him on pay ten times as great as the pension your maimed and crippled comrades of similar grade are receiving, is to do dishonor to every one who really threw his soul into the struggle for his country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time limited by the order of the House for general debate on this bill has expired. The bill will now be read for amendment and discussion under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank, together with all the rights, titles, and privileges, held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial promulgated January 27, 1863, and, in his discretion, to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only; but this act shall not be construed as authorizing pay, compensation, or allowance prior to appointment under it.

Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. Believing as I do that there is no place where the honor of an American soldier ought to be so safe as in the hands of the Representatives of the whole American people, I desire to say before this vote is cast that I shall vote first, last, and all the time for the vindication of the honor of General Fitz-John Porter. [Applause.]

And let me remark to the gentlemen who seek to bring the menace of future punishment to bear upon the discharge of present duty that if I knew this act of mine would end my bodily existence as you say it may end my official one, then still would I do it; and I would thank God that my loyalty to my country as I understand her honor, that my loyalty to my general as I understood my duty, that my loyalty to the truth as I know it to be, was strong enough to lift my conduct above the possibility of ignominious change to come from cowardly considerations affecting my life or future condition.

I do this not because I am guided by the judgment of the Schofield board or the statement of Ulysses S. Grant, for I have not read the one and I have never considered the other. Nor are the convictions that I here hastily express the growth of a day; they are as old as the injustice he has suffered. I do it because I was with Fitz-John Porter from the siege of Yorktown until the attack of the enemy across the Chickahominy, from that attack to the battle of Hanover Court-House, and from that to Mechanicsville, from that to Gaines's Mill, and throughout his career except when I was disabled by wounds [applause]; and I want to say, Mr. Chairman, it is my deliberate judgment, speaking of what I know of Fitz-John Porter, that in all the great battles of the English-speaking race from Bannockburn to Gettysburg there has not been made by any soldier a record which demonstrates greater loyalty to the cause of his country than that made by Fitz-John Porter. Having seen him on all his battlefields, I believe it can be said of him in action as was said of the soldier of old:

> He was swifter than an eagle; he was stronger than a lion; and from the blood of the slain and the fat of the mighty his sword returned not empty.

Mr. STEELE. Does not the gentleman think Porter had his wings clipped at the battle on the 29th August, 1862?

Mr. LAIRD. At least his wings did not take him to the rear on that day, as it did McDowell, who brought the courage of a quartermaster to bear upon the tasks of a hero; and yet you say McDowell ought to be promoted because he went to the rear, and because Porter did not he ought to be shot.

McDowell was ordered to move on the night of the 27th the same as Porter. So were Reno and Kearny. Reno and Kearny did not report until noon; Porter reported at 8 o'clock in the morning; and McDowell did not move at all. The court of inquiry in his case condemned what he did, but excused it on account of his conduct on the 30th.

You who are so ready to condemn Porter for his delay of two hours on the 27th, why is it you never mention that his corps received orders at Harrison's Landing at 5 p. m. of the 14th of August to join Pope and at 7 o'clock was under way for Fortress Monroe? At sunrise on the 18th, though detained forty-eight hours to guard bridges and trains, it encamped after a march of sixty miles at Hampton, having covered sixty miles in thirty-five hours, and by its rapidity reached Fortress Monroe on foot ahead of the division of Reynolds, that came by transport.

I will give the gentleman another illustration of what I mean, and it is with pain that I am obliged to refer to the fact that in all this debate there has not been on your side a single mention of the gallant conduct of Fitz-John Porter and his corps on the 30th of August, 1862. When the Fifth Corps, headed by General Porter, moved to the assault of Jackson's troops in the sunken road, and when the effort to deploy the column had resolved itself into a great rush to get to the front where men could fire—not at the enemy behind earthworks or a railroad embankment, but in a cut where nothing was visible but their heads, and when the column was being cut down in platoons by the confederate artillery, firing over the heads of their own men—there came ringing through the din of the battle the order of their general, "Fix bayonets, and jump into the ditch and bayonet them," and in a moment more, had not Longstreet swept across our rear, the bayonets of the Fifth Corps would have been warmed in the marrow of the troops of Jackson.

Was that the language and the conduct of a traitor and a coward? Since the Dutch king proclaimed that he would tear down the dikes and let in the ocean there has not been a braver speech.

On the question of discretion I wish to say a word. I will cite an instance that will perhaps come home to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR]. He said there is no discretion, and there ought to be none, on the part of a subordinate over the orders of a superior. When the columns of the confederates at Gettysburg were advancing across the flank of the second brigade of the first division of the Fifth Army Corps, Colonel Jeffers, of the Fourth Michigan, holding the right of the line, asked leave of General Switzer to change front, and Switzer asked General Barnes, commanding the division, and that general sent back word, "Tell General Switzer to advance with the second brigade." And when the request was repeated and Barnes had again ordered the advance it did advance, to certain and senseless destruction, for the right of the brigade was surrounded in a minute, and the Fourth Michigan, as brave a regiment as ever leveled a musket, was annihilated without an opportunity to return an effective blow, and Jeffers fell stabbed to death with bayonets while fighting with a naked saber over his colors.

Let the advocates of "no discretion" tell me if their science of war teaches that subordinates in the face of a better knowledge shall obey murderous orders, and slaughter thousands, and stand guiltless in history? We asked no immunity from death; we did ask that our lives should be not thrown away, and that we be not put where we were to be shot in the back. And when the gentleman from Michigan heard this, did he go and stand before the battle-graves of this regiment, and looking into the gaping bayonet-stabs in the body of Jeffers, sing, therein being assisted by the gentleman from Indiana—

> Theirs not to make reply,
> Theirs not to reason why,
> Theirs but to do and die?

[Laughter and applause.]

One word to the gentleman from Indiana. You say that Lincoln approved the sentence of the court-martial with a full knowledge of all the evidence. I deny it. Abraham Lincoln, "so slow to smite, so swift to spare, so great and merciful and just," never approved that sentence with a knowledge of the evidence. I loved the memory of the dead Lincoln and all who died with him for the greatest cause that ever moved mankind, and I love the honor of the flag and the nation for which they died, and because I do I vote for the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HENLEY. I move a pro forma amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LAIRD. I withdraw it.

Mr. STEELE. He has no right to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. STEELE. I do.

Mr. HENLEY. I renew the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be opposed by the gentleman from California.

Mr. STEELE. Has the gentleman risen to oppose it?

Mr. HENLEY. If the gentleman desires to know he has the emphatic response, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has the floor.

Mr. HENLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, after the very exhaustive and absolutely unanswerable arguments of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] and others supporting this bill I shall not attempt to shed any additional light on it; and the only expectation I have in taking the floor on this occasion is merely to speak of the record, which has been somewhat marred by certain action taken by gentlemen opposing this measure. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] made an assault on General Grant this afternoon, to which, I say to him and to the House, members urging this bill have every disposition in the world to make proper and adequate response, but we are tortured by the apprehension that if we should do so the gentleman from Indiana might follow the example of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] on the same side, and the result would be that in the morning we would find ourselves replying to something that did not exist in the RECORD. [Laughter and applause.]

How does this come? Gentlemen on the other side must pardon us for expressing some slight doubt as to the sincerity of their professions. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] delivered a speech on this floor which contained a calumnious intimation in reference to General Grant, and it was applauded to the echo by his friends on the other side.

Lo and behold! it seems that the gentleman from Michigan concluded that he had better resort to a little penitential sorrow and accompanying sackcloth in that particular matter, because he takes a night and goes into prayerful meditation upon the subject, and in the morning when the RECORD comes out, or the succeeding day, we find that he has stricken out of his speech every defamatory allusion to General Grant; and not only that, but excluded the applause with which it was greeted and the expression of astonishment—[applause on the Democratic side]—I repeat the expression of astonishment that that applause elicited from the gentleman from New York [General SLOCUM], who expressed his unbounded surprise that anything defamatory of General Grant should escape the lips of a gentleman upon the other side of this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, for these reasons gentlemen must pardon us for a little incredulity for their good faith in this matter or we must attribute these opinions to their partisan views.

Another thing: We learned from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] a fact which I have no doubt afforded to both sides a keen sense of genuine amazement. We learned from the gentleman that when General Schofield presided over the board of inquiry upon which he was appointed by the President of the United States, and after calling witnesses after witnesses, ransacking all parts of the continent for testimony, proceeding with all the solemnity of a court, administering oaths and probing this matter to the very foundation, we learned that he had an object in view, and that he did it—why? When he rendered his judgment exonerating Fitz-John Porter he did it, we are to infer, not because he believed Fitz-John Porter innocent. Oh, no! That is not the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana. Not because he acted from any honorable motive which should prompt a man to act in any case. No; nothing of the kind. But, according to the gentleman from Indiana, he did it because at that time he was a candidate for the nomination for the Presidency at the hands of the Democratic convention.

Now, Mr. Chairman, did not the gentleman charge that directly? Did the gentleman from Indiana not charge that he knew that all of the evidence pointed to the fact that General Schofield at that time was a candidate for the Presidential nomination at the hands of the Democratic party? The gentleman has never retracted that assertion. Let me ask, did any of you ever before hear that General Schofield was a Democrat?

Mr. STEELE. You never heard that Greeley was a Democrat either, but you took him up. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HENLEY. What?

Mr. STEELE. I say in response to the gentleman that nobody ever heard that Greeley was a Democrat, and yet you took him up and gave him the nomination.

Mr. HENLEY. Does the gentleman from Indiana insist on his statement, or will he reiterate it, that General Schofield was a candidate for the Presidency at the hands of the national Democratic convention; that he did conspire with Senator Randolph in order to get that nomination, and as a motive for rendering a judgment of exoneration of Fitz-John Porter he did that? I ask the gentleman that question.

Mr. STEELE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. HENLEY. I had prepared some observations upon this question none of which I have touched. I therefore ask leave to print some in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly. [See Appendix.]

Mr. STEELE and Mr. CALKINS addressed the Chair.

Mr. SLOCUM. There was an amendment——

Mr. CALKINS. If the gentleman from California has referred to me as the gentleman from Indiana who made remarks defamatory of General Grant in any manner, I wish to say that the statement is entirely gratuitous and without foundation in fact.

Mr. SLOCUM. There was an amendment proposed the other day to amend this bill so as to provide against giving back pay. I accept that amendment. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STEELE. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish also to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 17, strike out all after the words "prior to" and insert "the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection this amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with a favorable recommendation. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. STEELE. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word on the subject before closing this debate.

Mr. REED. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is not in session.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Then I move that the committee rise. I do this because I want to say to the gentleman from New York that we consented to limit the general debate upon this bill to three hours and forty-five minutes with the understanding that there should be a discussion under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is out of order. The gentleman from Maine rises to a point of order and will state it.

Mr. REED. I suggest that the Committee of the Whole House can not report this bill so long as gentlemen are ready to offer amendments.

Mr. STEELE. Substantial amendments.

Mr. REED. And a number of gentlemen have addressed the Chair announcing their purpose to offer amendments. I suppose there can be nothing clearer than that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken so far as pending amendments to the section are concerned. But it is in order for the gentleman from New York to move that the committee rise with the view of obtaining from the House an order to close or limit debate.

Mr. REED. Is it in order for the Chair to instruct the gentleman from New York thus publicly in his movements? The gentleman from New York has himself had experience.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to say that I have amendments to offer.

Mr. CUTCHEON. And I also have amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] moves that the committe rise. That motion is in order.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 154, noes 78.

Mr. REED. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentlemen from New York, Mr. SLOCUM, and the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 161, noes 77.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and had come to no resolution thereon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York (Mr. SLOCUM) is recognized.

Mr. REED. I will say to the gentleman from New York that about fifteen minutes of debate are desired on this side, together with the right to us, I suppose, of offering in committee whatever amendments may be desired.

Mr. SLOCUM. Will that satisfy the other side of the House? If they will be content with that, I have no objection.

Mr. STEELE. I want fifteen minutes myself. I have three amendments I wish to offer.

Mr. SLOCUM. I desire to know if the proposition of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] will satisfy that side of the House.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman will say twenty-five minutes I believe that will satisfy this side.

Mr. SLOCUM. Take all you want. Take your twenty-five minutes and then give us a vote.

Mr. STEELE. Now let us adjourn.

Mr. SLOCUM. I claim the floor.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from New York make the motion that we shall have twenty-five minutes for debate on this side?

Mr. COX, of New York. Will that satisfy gentlemen on that side of the House?

Mr. REED. As I understand it that arrangement will be satisfactory.

Mr. STEELE. The understanding being that the twenty-five minutes will be for the use of those opposed to the bill.

Mr. REED. That debate in committee shall close in twenty-five minutes on this side; but after that it is our right without any agreement that amendments can be offered, but without debate.

Mr. COX, of New York. Does the gentleman from Maine propose to have the vote to-night also?

Mr. REED. You can put the bill in such a shape that you can get a vote to-morrow, or you can have the vote to-night if the House desires it.

Mr. SLOCUM. In the management of this bill I have tried to be exceedingly fair to the other side of the House. They have never made a request that has not been conceded. They have never asked an extension of time that has not been granted. They have occupied twice the time that has been occupied by this side of the House. I now again give way to you. Propose all your amendments. Take the twenty-five minutes by yourselves, but give us a vote after that.

I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House with the understanding that there be a debate of twenty-five minutes on amendments pending.

The SPEAKER. That understanding can only be made by unanimous consent. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House the further time allowed for debate be limited to twenty-five minutes, to be occupied by opponents of the bill, after which, of course, amendments may be offered, but without debate.

Mr. COX, of New York. After which the committee will rise.

The SPEAKER. That will follow.

Mr. KEIFER. It is in accordance with the understanding that some of the gentlemen who want debate may have it on amendments yet to be offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the understanding as stated from the Chair would not interfere with that privilege. Is there objection to this understanding? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered by the House.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to inquire of gentlemen on that side whether if there be a final vote on this bill to-night they intend to have a session to-morrow?

Several MEMBERS. No.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I hope we will have a vote on the bill to-night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] moves that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House and resumes consideration of the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter. By order of the House all debate under the five-minute rule is limited to twenty-five minutes, to be occupied by those opposing the bill on pending amendments or such further amendments as they may offer. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. BAYNE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAYNE. Is the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] pending?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment has been agreed to and is a part of the bill.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "appoint," in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Ward B. Burnett, late brigadier-general of volunteers and a lieutenant in the United States Army." I propose here the name of a man of whom I hold the certificate from Andrew Jackson, jr., that he was the bravest of all the men in the Mexican war [great laughter on the Democratic side] and was so judged by his comrades.

A MEMBER. Andrew Jackson was dead then.

Mr. STEELE. I am very glad to know that there is one of my friends on the Democratic side here who seems to know that Andrew Jackson is dead. I wonder that you do not seem to know he had a son! Let me read the certificate carrying out a bequest of his father of a gold medal to General Burnett:

THE HERMITAGE, TENNESSEE, August 17, 1859.

Bequeathed by Maj. Gen. Andrew Jackson "to that patriot of New York city who (should our happy country not be blessed with peace) shall be adjudged by his countrymen to have been the most distinguished in defense of his country and our country's rights," and awarded under that bequest, by the general voice of his brothers in arms, to Bvt. Brig. Gen. Ward B. Burnett, colonel of the First Regiment New York Volunteers in the late war with Mexico.

ANDREW JACKSON, JR., Trustee.

I want to say further that this man is now blind and helpless. He was a graduate of West Point. Let me appeal to your sympathies on that ground, if no other will influence you. He is not the man who on the 29th day of August, 1862, received positive orders to go into battle, and instead of doing so went two and five-eighths miles to the rear and laid there all day. He is a distinguished soldier who gave the best of his life to his country and lost his sight from a wound received in its service.

I now want to call the attention of gentlemen to this fact, that in all the discussion here they have not controverted the assertion which I made, and now make, that Fitz-John Porter did not even make a reconnaisance to find out whether there was an enemy that he might attack either in his front or right. Every single particle of the evidence will show that he could have attacked a portion of Longstreet's army that was on his right front if he had tried to do so. Colonel Marshall and a colonel of a New York regiment say that they saw the troops of the enemy to our right and front, and there is no evidence that Porter wanted to go into the fight. On the contrary, the insubordinate dispatches he sent to Burnside, the fact that he made no attempt to find if there was an enemy in his front, or if he could comply with his orders to join on the left of our army and press whatever enemy he might find to fight, was utterly disregarded. Longstreet has said that "finding that Porter had withdrawn from my front enabled me to send two of my divisions to the assistance of Jackson." He does not say that he waited for orders, but that he found it possible (owing to the want of spirit in Porter) to spare troops to fight the gallant men of Sigel, Hooker, King, and McDowell.

On the contrary, there is the evidence of General McDowell, who says that after talking the whole matter over with Porter he left him with the distinct understanding that he was going to put his troops in there; which, under the modification of the joint order, he was authorized to do. He directed him to go in there, but he did not do so. McDowell says that if he had done so he believes (and others testify to the same effect) that our victory on that day would have been a glorious one.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to discuss this bill. I do not pretend to be much of a military man myself nor to have much of a military reputation. It is true I served as an officer in the late war, and think I know the difference between a brigade and a division; but I have been inclined to accept the judgment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] who has charge of this bill when he says that there are not ten men in this House who are capable of acting upon it intelligently.

I have regretted one thing in the discussion of this bill, and that is that some of the friends of the bill, who advocate its passage, seem not to be more inclined to build up Fitz-John Porter than they are to pull down some other men who, in my honest judgment, are his equals, if not his superiors.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to say a word for General John Pope, a native of my own state, who has been spoken of here disrespectfully by a number of gentlemen in their advocacy of this bill. I know something of his military character and of his military operations during the late war, and I am sure that no man, no patriot in all this broad land, ever justly complained that General Pope was not at the front with his command when he was needed there.

And I believe as much as I believe anything that General Pope did not have the cordial support and good-will of Fitz-John Porter and some of the subordinate officers under him at the second battle of Bull Run. The conviction is forced upon my mind that even if Pope was a weak man, as some claim, he never derived any strength from Fitz-John Porter; that if he was an unskillful general, he never had the benefit of any counsel from Fitz-John Porter.

But I believe him to have been a brave and gallant officer, who was always ready and willing to do his duty, and that he deserves better of his country than some of his maligners. It is proper that I should say this much of General Pope, as a Representative from the State in which he was born.

I shall not at this late hour attempt to discuss this bill, and could not do it in five minutes if I desired to do so. I want to say that, accepting as largely true what the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] has stated to this House, I think that this case was once tried by men who were better prepared to try it than we are here in this House. It was tried by honorable men, by high-minded men, by military men, by men of character and of judgment, who had the witnesses before them, and who scanned their evidence as they were capable of scanning it. For one, I am disposed to let the matter rest with them, and not disturb the judgment of the court-martial which found Fitz-John Porter guilty.

Mr. Chairman, the passage of this bill is urged as a vindication of Fitz-John Porter; but pass it, and while in the estimation of the people in some parts of the country it would be regarded as a vindication, I tell you in other parts of the country thousands and tens of thousands will still believe that the judgment of the court-martial, approved by Abraham Lincoln, was a just judgment, and that Fitz-John Porter was justly condemned.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose this bill. The question for each member of this House to determine is, shall the decision of the court-martial in the case of General Fitz-John Porter stand? If it was right in January, 1863, it is right now. If it was wrong then, it is wrong now. If it was right in 1863, it should stand as firm as the Government in the interest of which the decision was made. If it was wrong then, the decision of the court-martial should fall, the stars should be replaced upon Fitz-John Porter's shoulders, and the emoluments so wrongfully withheld from him should be willingly, speedily, and publicly given to him. Time never changes a right to a wrong. Circumstances, however potent, can work no miracle of this character. Either the decision of that court-martial was right or it was wrong.

The issue is simplified by the friends of the bill. They insist upon its passage not as an act of mercy, but as an act of justice. Fitz-John Porter, through the medium of the advocates of this bill, asks this not as a favor but as a right. If the claim made by him is just, then this bill is unjust to him, because it does not give him his rights.

If the decision of the court-martial was wrong, then Porter is entitled not only to be restored to his rank, but he is by every law of justice and equity entitled to the pay of that rank during all these years. Not a single man who votes for this bill can consistently refuse to vote for a measure to give him the pay. There is no use mincing words upon this matter. If I believed the act of the court-martial was wrong, I would insist upon an amendment to this bill giving him the pay out of which he has been wronged.

If the advocates of this bill believe in it as an act of justice, then I appeal to them to do this man full justice and act consistent with professions.

Was the decision of that court-martial right in 1863?

The judgment of any organization of men, or of any individual, is fallible. We determine the correctness of human judgment by various human tests, and if it bears the scrutiny of these tests we can safely rely upon its correctness.

Apply every known test to the decision of this court-martial, and see the result.

Who were these men composing this court-martial? Were they mere boys? Were they men without age and experience?

General Hunter was 60 years old at the time he became a member of this court-martial. He graduated at West Point in 1822, and had therefore seen forty years of service in the Army. The fires of youth had waned; the ambitions of manhood had been satisfied; and, crowned with age, a large experience, and a spotless reputation, he assumed the duties of judging the conduct of his brother officer. General Hunter graduated at West Point the same year that Porter was born, and had therefore seen as many years of service in the Army as Porter had seen years in life.

General Hitchcock was 64 years old at the time of this court-martial, and had seen forty-five years of service in the Army. He graduated at West Point in 1817. He was too old for the activities of war, but not too old for counsel, for calm, matured judgment.

General King was 48 years old and a graduate of West Point in the class of 1833. He was adjutant-general of the State of New York from 1839 to 1843, and at the outbreak of the war was the representative of this country at the court of Rome. He was therefore not only of mature age, a soldier by education, but he had also the experience of a statesman to enlarge his judgment.

General Ricketts was 46 years old, with twenty-three years' experience in the Army, having graduated at West Point in 1839.

General Casey was 55 years old and a graduate of West Point in the class of 1826. He had therefore a ripe experience of thirty-six years in the Army.

General Buford, also 55 years of age, graduated at West Point in 1827, and after eight years of service in the Army became a civil engineer, a railroad man, and at the outbreak of the war was engaged in banking.

Thus six of the nine men on this court-martial were men of military education. The youngest of them was six years older than Porter, and all, with the exception of General Buford, had far more military experience. They constitute one more than a majority of the court-martial.

The remaining members were General Prentiss, 43 years of age; General Slough, 33 years of age, and General Garfield, 31 years of age. These three men had no personal acquaintance with Porter, had never served either in the Army of the Potomac or the Army of Virginia.

General Prentiss served in the Mexican war as the adjutant of the First Illinois Volunteers, and from the outbreak of the rebellion to the time of this detail had no connection with an Eastern army.

General Slough was a lawyer by profession, an Ohio man by birth, and began his military experience as colonel of the First Colorado Volunteers.

Of General Garfield, the youngest member of this court-martial, I need not speak. After he had rendered his decision he returned to the West, and the distinguished general, now member from California, selected him as chief of staff.

Thus I have at some length given the personnel of this court-martial to establish the ability of this court to render a righteous judgment.

Twenty years of scrutiny by the counsel and the partisans of Porter have resulted in but one unfavorable criticism upon either of these men in relation to their action as members of that court-martial. We have heard that criticism repeated in the discussions upon this floor. It is true General King was sworn as a witness, but where is the man who dares charge that the testimony of this man was untrue. If it was true testimony, then it was General King's duty to his country, to Porter, and to his associates upon the court-martial to make that testimony known, not in a cowardly and illegal manner in private conversation with them, as he could have done by reason of his relation to them, but in a public manner, under oath, and subjecting himself to the law for swearing falsely, as well as to the cross-examination by General Porter's counsel. Away, then, with such a flimsy charge! These men, then, not only had the ability, the capacity, but they had honesty of purpose, and were free from bias or prejudice against Porter.

It will not do to charge that a sacrifice was demanded to shield men high in authority. If that be true, why select such men as constituted this court-martial? If General Halleck or the Secretary of War was actuated by such unholy motives, it would have been no more dishonorable to have caused the selection of men who would have convened to convict. Men could have been selected who could conscientiously have convicted Porter without spending forty-five days in hearing testimony and in deliberation. A court-martial composed of distinguished generals could have been convened which could have conscientiously convicted and sentenced Porter to be shot upon the testimony of General Pope alone. In the light of forty-five days consumed in the hearing of testimony and in deliberation, let us hear no more of such unjust and unwarranted aspersions.

What were the opportunities possessed by this court-martial for holding a full and fair and complete investigation? The order convening it was issued November 25, 1862. This body continued in session for forty-five days; certainly an ample time in which to investigate the guilt or innocence of one man.

It is true, as has been stated upon this floor, that at some period during the sitting of this court-martial an order was issued by the Secretary of War which seemed to have for its object the concluding of the proceedings of the court-martial, but when it is known that this order was not issued until after the evidence of General Porter had all been presented to the court-martial, and while the Government was presenting its rebuttal testimony, it will be seen at once that if the order had any effect at all, its effect must have been favorable to General Porter and not favorable to the prosecution. Therefore the issuance of this order ceases to be a factor on the side of General Porter. But the order had this significance and as a circumstance tended to prove this fact, namely, the proceedings of this court-martial were of a careful and deliberate character; that the charge of hasty action or hasty conclusions could not be made and was not made even by General Porter himself until fifteen years after its deliberations had been concluded. If the distinguished counsel that represented General Porter on that occasion had been satisfied the action of the court-martial was hasty, even though he might not have alluded to it in his argument before that body, certainly at some subsequent time, after all reasons of a politic nature for withholding criticism upon the actions of this board had disappeared, he would have made this charge, and not have left it to be discovered for the first time fifteen years after the dissolution of this court-martial by the friends of his client.

But what were the opportunities for a careful examination of the question at issue by this court-martial? It must be conceded these opportunities were of the very highest order; the occurrences that had taken place on the 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th days of August were fresh in the memory of the living. Not only fresh in the memory of those who were opposed to General Porter, who had not been connected with him in the Army, and who at that time believed him to have been guilty of disobedience to orders, but they were also fresh in the minds of his friends and the generals who were commanding divisions in his corps, as well as the colonels of his regiments, the captains of his companies, and the privates who marched in the ranks. It has been asserted here—and I am not prepared to contradict it—by the distinguished gentleman from New York that not a single soldier who served in Fitz-John Porter's corps on those disastrous days but what to-day believes him to have been unjustly condemned. Be it so, concede it all, and what does it argue? It argues simply that every one of his corps of eight thousand men were friends of his then, believed in him then, and if there was a single circumstance or a single iota of evidence that would be favorable to the acquittal of their honored and loved chief they would not have withheld it from this court-martial. So that every single fact known in his favor we may reasonably assume was presented to this court-martial, and was faithfully and carefully considered by them.

In addition to this, all this evidence was accessible at the time. This court-martial held its meetings at such a convenient place to the army that there was no difficulty in General Porter obtaining evidence of every man connected with his corps before that court-martial, and every opportunity was afforded him to present to that court-martial every single circumstance that could in the least be favorable to him. And, on the other hand, it was difficult for the Government to obtain testimony, because we all know that it is much easier to obtain testimony favorable to acquittal than to conviction; and there were, doubtless, many persons who knew of facts which would have been favorable to the prosecution of General Porter, but withheld them for the very reason they did not desire to be instruments in securing his conviction. Notwithstanding I had the honor to belong to a regiment that was the extreme left of the Union line on the 30th day of August, which was connected with the First Corps during all that series of battles, yet I do not now recollect and have never heard of a single witness from my regiment, my brigade, or my division that was subpœnaed before that court-martial. And yet I know, and there are others upon this floor who know, that the most damaging testimony to General Porter could have been obtained by subpœnaing some of the general officers who commanded brigades and divisions in the First Corps upon that day. And not only from them, but also from the privates and sergeants and line officers who on the 28th and 29th realized the effect of his disobedience of orders.

But it is urged that this court-martial was held in the time of great excitement, and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] said something about the "powder-begrimed visages of these generals fresh from the field of disaster to our arms." The stern and unrelenting facts of history destroy not only the poetry of the statement, but controvert the statement itself.

There was a time of excitement about the first days of September, when Lee and his victorious troops were hovering like a great threatening cloud about the capital of the nation. Then there was "rushing to and fro" and "mounting in hot haste the steed," and the powder-begrimed veteran, as well as the new recruit, poured into and through Washington to check Lee's advance into Maryland. It is true these were exciting times, but before the October days came the battles of South Mountain and Antietam had been fought and Lee was forced back to Winchester, and long before the order for this court-martial issued he had been forced back beyond the Rappahannock, and the capital was safe.

The country had learned a lesson. The administration had learned it also. Both had been taught, at the expense of tens of thousands of precious lives, that a general might be the idol of his army and yet be a military failure; that a man might be a great engineer but a very small general; that he might be good on parade but worthless in aggressive warfare. The administration removed General McClellan for incompetency, and, though the Army murmured at the time, subsequent events proved the wisdom of the action; and here let me say, in the light of history as recorded in the dispatches that passed between Halleck and McClellan, so admirably collated and so forcibly presented to this committee this day by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS], McClellan should not only have been removed from the command of the Army, but should also have been cashiered for his inexcusable and reprehensible delays in obeying the orders of his superiors. There is only this difference between his action and that of Porter: McClellan obeyed, but with a tardiness that rendered his obedience worthless, but Porter did not even obey.

But I have diverged from the line of my argument. I say at the time of the convening of this court-martial the excitement had subsided, the Northern invasion of Lee had been checkmated, the capital was safe, and the old line of the Rappahannock re-established. But it is urged these men composing this court-martial were unconsciously influenced by the power of the war administration and the desire to court its favor.

"Mark, how plain a tale shall put that statement down." Hunter and Hitchcock and Casey and Buford were "in the sere and yellow leaf" of life; too old to reasonably expect to obtain important commands. King resigned his commission in the Army and resumed his duties as minister to Rome. Not one of this body received promotion afterward, save such as they would have received by reason of regular succession, except General Prentiss, and he won his honors not by his conduct as a member of this court-martial, but by his well-conducted defense of Helena, Ark., July 4, 1863.

What is there, then, that can truthfully be charged against the members of this court-martial that can weaken the weight that should be given to their decision? That they were honest and capable is practically conceded. That they were free from bias and prejudice has been shown. That they acted deliberately, and decided after full, fair, and careful investigation, must also be conceded. That their opportunities to ascertain the truth were ample, and that they improved them is beyond question. Apply every human test, and each and all affirm the judgment. It was right in 1863 and it is right now. It was just then; it is just now.

Opinions of men who knew nothing of the circumstances at the time may change.

It was stated in the opening argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] that every one of the men of Porter's corps believes him innocent. I thought the statement an extravagant one at the time; a conclusion prompted by sympathy and long friendship, and not based upon reliable information.

The statements of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], as coming fresh from some of Porter's men in that State, show how nearly correct was my judgment of that statement. Not only this, Mr. Chairman, but I have also what I think to be reliable information, that one of the men who commanded a division of Porter's corps during these last days of August, 1862, has disclosed within a few days his belief in the justice of the decision of the court-martial.

But concede the correctness of the claim made by the gentleman from New York, and I meet it with the statement that every man who served in Sigel's corps and McDowell's corps and Heintzelman's corps upon the 28th and 29th of August, 1862, has an abiding faith and belief in the justness of the verdict rendered. Ay, more than this; they believe firmly the judgment of that court-martial to have been one of much more mercy than was deserved. I speak thus with no harsh feeling, and with the full belief that I am voicing the sentiments and present feeling of the men who fought under those various leaders upon those eventful days.

In addition to all of this, there was a history connected with the war which may be called an unwritten history; it was the history of the camp-fire. It was a history not found in the historical works of the rebellion, but a history, nevertheless, as deeply and as strongly impressed upon the mind of the subordinate as the history that was made by the generals at the various headquarters, and by correspondents of the press who always obtained their information at those headquarters. This history of the camp-fire, repeated after the day's battle or march had ended, in occurrences coming within the range of the observation of the soldiers in the ranks, was many times even more correct than that obtained by the press correspondents at the headquarters tent. And I assert that this unwritten history, impressed upon the mind of almost every soldier in Sigel's and McDowell's commands immediately after this series of battles which culminated in the second Bull Run disaster but confirms in every particular the correctness of the judgment of this court-martial. On the night of the 28th the unwritten history of the camp-fire declared the corps of Porter to be near at hand. Many troops of the Army of Virginia and the old Army of the Potomac had never met, and the circumstance of the Army of Virginia being re-enforced by one of the finest corps of the old Army of the Potomac was an important one, and was freely and fully commented upon around the camp-fire. It was understood on the night of the 28th that the assistance of this valuable ally might be relied upon and could be confidently expected during the apprehended engagement on the 29th, and the inquiry upon the day of the 29th, during much fighting, was frequently made in the ranks and by the line officers, Where is Fitz-John Porter's corps? Why do we not hear from them? Every single impression created by that unwritten history and revived in the recollections of the soldier of to-day by the incidents connected with his company or his regiment as brought out in this discussion simply confirms the belief in the justice of the finding of this court-martial.

It is idle to argue that Fitz-John Porter did not disobey orders, because it is conceded by his friends that he failed to obey; but it is urged by way of a plea of confession and avoidance, that although he did not obey the order, he was justified in not obeying it; and however eloquent the appeals of his defenders may be, however logical their arguments may be, they all fall to the ground and become truly futile when they seek to contradict a fact which every soldier connected with the Army of Virginia at that time knew to be a fact. It is idle to talk about the darkness of the night as an excuse for not marching, because there are soldiers of the Army of Virginia upon this floor who know they did march that night, and the fact that they did march upon that night is a complete refutation of the paltry excuse presented by Porter and his friends. In addition to that, there was no rain, as all will remember who remember anything about the night of the 27th. The rain came after the battle, on the night of the 30th, after the disaster; and how many there are who know that the night of the 30th was pitch darkness compared with the nights of the 27th and 28th. Not only was it dark, but a constant rain was falling, and yet troops marched that night. They marched to Centreville; they marched in the direction of Washington; they marched, as we supposed then, to the protection of the capital, which was at the mercy of the confederate victorious hosts, as many believed at that time. They not only marched that night, but they fought that night; and certainly if troops could march and fight when the night was dark and rainy, Fitz-John Porter with his corps could have marched when he had but the darkness with which to contend.

We have shown, then, that this court-martial was composed of men of the highest order of intelligence and experience; that they were men whose motives had never been impeached, whose conduct in the management of this case and the decision rendered has not been criticised, and whose opportunities for a full, fair, and impartial investigation were such as could not be excelled by any subsequent board or body of men that could be organized to consider the same case. In addition to this three of this court-martial are still living. They are old men to-day. They are men still of high character, of undoubted integrity, and, by reason of their age, can not expect to engage longer to any great extent in the conflicts of life. In short, by reason of their age these men have passed beyond the scope of human ambition and are contemplating the end of their lives. The discussion in relation to the case of General Porter has been going on for years. The attention of these men has been called to it, and to the allegation by him and friends that the court-martial which tried him had rendered against him an unjust judgment. No pride of opinion could prevent these aged veterans now from acknowledging the error of their judgment, and thus, in their declining years, doing justice to the man whom they had innocently wronged, if they believed in the least he had been wronged by their judgment; but yet there has not been one single word or syllable from any member of this court-martial which would lead us to believe that any single one of that distinguished body ever changed his judgment; on the other hand, by their silence upon this question we must infer they are satisfied with their decision, and feel, even in the evening of life, no injustice has been done to General Porter.

I will not detain the committee by going into a detailed discussion of the evidence in the case. Every phase of it has been ably and fully discussed, but I stand by the decision of that court-martial. I believe its judgment was correct. If this bill was an appeal of a penitent man for mercy, I might look at it differently, but the friends of the measure upon the floor of this House demand its passage, not as an act of mercy, but as an act of justice. To this claim I can not give my assent. It is true that Porter's head is covered with the snow that never melts, but I remember also that there are other heads covered with gray hairs: mothers whose boys died because Porter disobeyed orders; wives whose husbands died because Porter allowed his hatred for Pope and his love for McClellan to eclipse his love for his country. With the vision of these gray hairs impressed upon my mind I may forgive, but I will not forget. "May my right hand forget its cunning and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth" if I ever forget the dead hero or his living relation and join in this action with unseemly haste to replace the stars upon the shoulders of a disobedient general.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] asks leave to print in the RECORD some remarks on this bill. The Chair hears no objection. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CALKINS. I wish to offer an amendment but not to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. One amendment is pending.

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to offer this as a substitute for the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It may be offered now, but it can not be voted on until after the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. CALKINS. I do not wish it to be voted on now, but only to be considered pending as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to have it read now?

Mr. CALKINS. No, sir; I do not wish the reading to occupy the time limited for the five-minute debate.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy but a few moments. I merely wish to enter my protest against the passage of this bill. It was my fortune to bear an humble part in the campaign now in question. I commanded the rear guard from Robinson's River to the battlefield. I marched all night with my men on the nights of the 25th, 26th, and the 28th of August. I say then that it is childish for men here on the floor of this House to say that it was impossible for Fitz-John Porter to march his command on the night of the 28th.

The night was dark, it is true, but a good portion of Sigel's troops marched that night, a large portion of McDowell's troops marched that night, and if Fitz-John Porter had seen proper to have carried out that order he could have marched his command too. It would have been an easy matter. I appeal to my friend from New York [General SLOCUM,] the author of this bill, and ask him the question how such an excuse as that would have been received by him when he commanded the left wing of the army in Georgia? I venture to assert that the officer who sent such an excuse and who refused to obey his commands would have been dismissed from the service at once for disobedience of orders. Now, gentlemen, the truth of the matter is that Fitz-John Porter did not move his troops for eight hours on that day; that he lay all day within the sound of the cannon. At 12 o'clock on the 29th of August, General Sigel sent a letter to General Kearny informing him that it was impossible for Longstreet to arrive upon the field with his command that afternoon, and urging him to swing in on his right and make an attack at once. And he also in that letter requested General Kearny to inform General McDowell of that fact. Now, gentlemen, it is true that General Longstreet did not arrive there until the afternoon of the 29th; and all of that afternoon, all that day, while the enemy's guns were heard in the distance, Fitz-John Porter did not move his command. What was Fitz-John Porter there for, if not to fight? What was he doing there? I ask the question, Why did he hold in reserve twelve thousand troops? Ah! my friends, the answer is palpable to all who know the facts. These differences had grown up at West Point. There was a difference that had grown up in the old Army between those officers which is the nucleus of that question.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I propose a further amendment to the bill by striking out the words, in lines 8 and 9, "together with all the rights, titles, and privileges," &c.

I think the bill will be more perfect without that. That would leave the bill simply to restore him—to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial promulgated January 27, 1863, &c.

These are the words of the bill as it would read if amended. Now, General Porter held in addition to that the rank of major-general of volunteers. I do not understand that it is proposed by anybody here to restore him to the grade and rank of major-general of volunteers. As the bill now reads without the amendment I have suggested it would restore him to that rank and grade.

Now, I have a word to say by way of reply to the remarks of the gentleman from California, I believe. He seems to be exceedingly anxious lest I have not sufficient reverence and respect for my great leader, General Grant. I want to say to that gentleman, and I want to say to every gentleman on that side of the House, that I believe I love and venerate General Grant better than any man on that side ever has or dares to do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I followed General Grant in the Vicksburg campaign when Pemberton surrendered. I followed him on the bloody field of the Wilderness. I shed my blood on the field at Spottsylvania Court-House. I followed him into the smoking hell of the Crater at Petersburg. And I yield to no man upon this floor or anywhere else in my appreciation, my honor, and devotion to the military genius and statesmanship and the unequaled patriotism of General Grant. [Applause on the Republican side.]

When General Grant first ran for the Presidency of the United States I had the honor to be one of the Presidential electors of the State of Michigan. This right hand wrote every ballot that was cast for him in that college; this right hand wrote the report of the electoral college of 1868. Again and again I have followed him upon the battle-field. Again and again I have followed him in the affairs of State, always to honor him, never to traduce him or detract from his honor. And yet General Grant is a man like ourselves, a man with like passions, a man with all the feelings of humanity. He is a man with like motives, a man influenced by the same incentives as ourselves, and I but simply called the attention of this House and the country to the fact that a certain collocation of circumstances had conspired to defame him. I call attention to the fact that for eighteen years, when invoked in his official capacity to undo the injustice alleged to have been done to Fitz-John Porter, he was silent and declined. But in another epoch, surrounded by circumstances unexplained by anything which appeared in this record, he reversed his opinion.

Now, just one word in reply to my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. HENLEY rose.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I do not yield. One word in reply to my young friend from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD]. I honor his devotion to his leader. I honor the enthusiasm with which he advocates his old corps commander. But, Mr. Chairman, my friend from Nebraska speaks as most men have spoken on that side of the question. He speaks from his heart, and not from his head or his judgment. In that campaign he was a boy of thirteen, and with the enthusiasm of a boy of thirteen he followed the flag of his leader; and he gives us here to-day the outcome of the judgment of a boy of thirteen, and not that of his mature years.

Mr. HENLEY. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] leaves the members on this side of the House somewhat in a condition of embarrassment. I want to know, if all this which he said about General Grant is true, why he struck it out of the RECORD. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. If a gentleman who got the floor on this question by pledging himself to the House that he was to speak against the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska and then never uttered a word on that amendment—if that gentleman is entitled to an answer I will answer him. I left that out of the RECORD simply because I had a mind to leave it out. [Ironical cheers on the Democratic side.] And furthermore, in my judgment, the RECORD as amended said all I desired to say.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House all debate on this bill is closed. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] has offered an amendment which will be the first voted upon. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read Mr. STEELE'S proposed amendment, as follows:

In line 5 strike out the words "Fitz-John Porter" and insert the words "Ward B. Burnett."

In the same line strike out the word "major" and insert "brigadier."

In line 6 strike out the words "and a brevet brigadier-general" and the word "colonel" and insert the words "a lieutenant."

And in line 8 strike out the words "of the same grade and rank, together with all the rights, titles, and privileges held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial promulgated January 27, 1863."

So that it will read:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Ward B. Burnett, late a brigadier-general of the United States volunteers and a lieutenant of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, and, in his discretion, to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade, the retired-list being thereby increased in number to that extent, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are suspended for this purpose only; but this act shall not be construed as authorizing pay, compensation, or allowance prior to the passage of this act."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] has sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk which will next be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the President of the United States shall have the power to convene a general court-martial, consisting of seven general officers not below the rank of brigadier-general, at such time as he may see fit, who shall have power to retry the case of Fitz-John Porter.

"The said court-martial shall consider the evidence originally introduced before the court-martial and such other testimony as the said Fitz-John Porter may produce, and likewise such other testimony as the United States may produce.

"The said court-martial hereby authorized shall have all the powers of a general court-martial.

"The Judge-Advocate-General of the Army shall attend at the trial on the part of the Government, assisted by one counsel from civil life to be selected by him.

"Said court-martial shall find and report whether in their judgment the said findings and judgment of said original court-martial ought to stand, and make such other recommendations as to it shall be deemed best.

"Said court-martial shall sit with open doors and their proceedings shall be public."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CONVERSE. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words in line 12 "in his discretion;" the object being to make the retirement compulsory in case Porter is restored.

Mr. KEIFER. That is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not debatable. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12 strike out the words "in his discretion;" so that it will read:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank, together with all the rights, titles, and privileges held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army by sentence of court-martial promulgated January 27, 1863, and to place him on the retired-list of the Army as of that grade," &c.

Mr. SLOCUM. I accept that amendment.

Several members called for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 137, noes 59.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I now ask a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 8 and 9 strike out the words "together with all the rights, titles, and privileges;" so that it will read:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter, late a major-general of the United States volunteers and a brevet brigadier-general and colonel of the Army, to the position of colonel in the Army of the United States, of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal from the Army," &c.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 71, noes 142.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. In absence of objection the preamble will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SLOCUM was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, and had directed him to report back the same with amendments.

Mr. SLOCUM. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment must be first disposed of. The question is first on agreeing to the amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 12, strike out the words "in his discretion."

Mr. SLOCUM. I believe that amendment endangers the bill, and I ask the House not to agree to it.

Mr. CONVERSE. I desire to make a suggestion or two about that amendment.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] demanded the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, but the bill had not then reached that stage.

Mr. CONVERSE. I understand that the friends of General Porter expect that he will be placed on the retired-list if restored to the Army. The object of this amendment, as I understand it, is to make that compulsory; that if he is restored he shall be placed on the retired-list.

Now, there are persons, myself among the number, who believe it would not be right to place General Porter over men who have been serving in the Army now for twenty years while he has been out of it, though we are entirely willing to restore him so far as we can. For one I am unwilling to punish those who have been in the Army and have been rendering service twenty years while he has been out of it.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The friends of General Porter are willing to leave that matter to the discretion of the President of the United States.

Mr. SLOCUM. Then vote down the amendment.

The question was taken upon the amendment, and it was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 80, noes 134.

The next amendment from the Committee of the Whole House was, in line 17 of the printed bill to strike out the words "appointment under it" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the passage of this act;" so that it will read:

But this act shall not be construed as authorizing pay, compensation, or allowance prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. SLOCUM. I call the previous question on that.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. SLOCUM. Do I understand that I now have an hour to close the debate on this bill?

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that there can be no debate after the previous question has been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The previous question was ordered upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill, but has not been ordered on the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from New York now proposes to close the debate on the bill.

Mr. SLOCUM. I take the floor and move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. REED. That is right.

Mr. SLOCUM. I withdraw the demand for the previous question, and yield my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN].

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Some time ago an agreement was made that this side of the House should occupy twenty-five minutes in debate, and the reason given was that the other side would not occupy any more time, and we could take the vote on the bill to-night. I say this is not in good faith.

The SPEAKER. That is not a point of order. The agreement made by the House related alone to debate in Committee of the Whole, and not to debate in the House under the rules.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I give notice now that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] has closed I will move, under the rules of the House, to recommit this bill, and occupy an hour myself. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that I can say nothing that is new on this very important question, which involves the citizenship and the honor of an American soldier. Yet from my knowledge of the man, and my connection with him, it is proper, with the honor afforded me of closing this debate, that I should be heard.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it proper to inquire how long a time is now to be given to debate?

Mr. CURTIN. An hour.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House there is one hour for debate.

Mr. HISCOCK. And it is then the intention of gentlemen on the other side to press a vote to-night?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised what the intention on "the other side" is.

Mr. CURTIN. I do not know the rules of this House, but I understand that the gentleman who has charge of this bill, and who has conferred upon me the honor of closing this debate, has the right to an hour and has given it to me. Now what do you mean? Do you mean to take it from me?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I mean no disrespect to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN], but the gentleman from New York gave away his right to that hour in the agreement which was made about the debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. CURTIN. I know Fitz-John Porter well, have known him all his mature life. He was appointed from Pennsylvania a cadet at West Point, where he was instructed as a soldier. In his birth and his lineage from the Revolution which gave this country its liberal and matchless Constitution, the Porters have defended it upon the water and upon the land. When the late unhappy war commenced and dark clouds covered all this great country, and the people of the North were aroused from their peaceful pursuits to face the fact that war, cruel, savage war, existed, Fitz-John Porter was the first military officer sent to Pennsylvania to assist in the organization of troops for the defense of the Government and to meet the necessities of the war forced upon us. Washington, the capital of the country, was shut out from communication with the North and West; there were no means of communication between the capital and the country at large. Being at that time the executive of Pennsylvania, from necessity I depended much upon the military judgment sent to assist me. Fitz-John Porter was the most enlightened, most sleeplessly vigilant and ardent advocate of immediate military discipline, of the levying of troops, and the enforcement of obedience to the law that came to me through that long struggle.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber, if you will turn to the records you will find one significant fact not so much for the living as in justice to the dead. The first citizens of this country that ever asked a rehearing for this soldier, with a view to redressing any wrong he might have suffered, were Horace Greeley of New York, Henry Wilson of Massachusetts, and myself. [Applause.] Surely the fidelity of the two persons I have named will not be doubted, and the presentation or application thus made to the Government for the redress of the wrongs done to this man was made after full consideration of all the facts and in the presence of all the lights which subsequent history had shed upon the eventful period through which we had just passed.

General Fitz-John Porter never approached or importuned me to be his advocate. Since the pendency of this bill, or since the meeting of Congress, I have not seen him here. As to the merits of this bill, it is a question on which men may have opinions on the one side and on the other, depending very much upon how you approach the facts, but I was surprised to hear a distinguished member of this House [Mr. KEIFER] say over and over again in his speech that General Fitz-John Porter was a coward. Before God I say I never knew a Porter who was a fool or a coward. [Applause.]

That was the opening speech of this debate in opposition to the bill, and, from its character, must be regarded as the presentation of the views of those who are inspired by political bias in their action on the measure. There was much of the dust and smoke and sulphur of battle in it; there was the rattle of rifle and of musketry; the detonation of heavy guns, and amidst all the strife which the gentleman drew from his imagination, above the noise and confusion and roar, the culmination of his rhetoric was the cry that Fitz-John Porter was a coward. He is the first man who has ever put that statement in print; indeed, he is the first who ever had the temerity to say it, and I trust he will never say it again to ornament his rhetoric or logic.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose for a few minutes to turn the attention of this House to a portion of the history of that dreadful war which I would be glad to forget, with all its horrors, and do most sincerely regret that in this instance we must fight it over and revive its painful recollections, when justice is asked, sheer justice to an American citizen, and one who has been wronged, grievously wronged. I was then in an official position where I was forced to watch with painful anxiety the advance of armies, the terrible battles; and the gentlemen on the other side are not the only persons who mourn over the graves of the slain. I had occasionally the satisfaction to rejoice over the success of our armies, but in the beginning of the war that satisfaction did not often occur.

When the war commenced, and the Government called for troops for a hundred days, the great State of Pennsylvania, not believing that the struggle was to end in so short a period, organized an army of 15,800 men; thirteen regiments of infantry, one regiment of artillery, and one of cavalry. The troops were fully armed and equipped, and were encamped in different parts of the State; they were mustered in for "three years or during the war," and their muster provided that they should be transferred to the Government of the United States when that Government should demand their presence in her armies. Not once, Mr. Speaker, but constantly they were offered to the service of the Government of the United States and refused. They would have been at Bull Run, but the Government officially declined to receive them. You understand what occurred there. I suppose every man on this floor realizes all that occurred in that disastrous battle, and who knows but that the presence of such a body of splendid troops would have turned the tide of battle? About 1 o'clock on Monday morning I received a telegram from General Scott saying:

We learn you have troops in Pennsylvania; send them forward immediately. Johnston has joined Beauregard.

Not long after a similar telegram came from the President. These regiments were poured into Washington in forty-eight hours, and was the only army then available for the defense of the capital. What might have been the result of Bull Run if that army had been accepted and added to the army of McDowell in the field? Yet who charges any disloyalty upon the men who refused to take them earlier? After Bull Run and its disasters a general had to be misplaced. General McClellan is spoken of to-day on this floor in not very complimentary terms, yet I think that sufficient knowledge or consideration of the facts connected with that gentleman would have prevented such remarks. He graduated with distinguished honors at West Point; had served through the Mexican war; had observed the Crimean war under a commission from his Government, and had made one of the most admirable reports ever made upon a war in this or any other country; had commanded troops in West Virginia, had there shown enterprise, energy, and activity, and had closed the campaign with success. The Government made him the General of the Army. He promptly obeyed the order of the President; left the Army of West Virginia, where he had won honor and fame, and not a laurel that he there won ever faded when placed on the brow of our colleague General ROSECRANS, who succeeded him in command. [Applause.]

General McClellan gave to the Army a perfect organization; all the appliances necessary to make it efficient or to give as large a share of comfort to the men as is possible to give to troops in the field. He made his plan for the campaign of the coming season. That plan has received the approbation of the military minds of this and foreign countries. He proposed to transport the larger part of his army by water, and to approach by the long line of the triangle to Richmond by way of the Peninsula. McDowell, with an army numbering more than forty-five thousand men, under this plan of the campaign was to approach Richmond from Washington or its defenses by the short line of the triangle.

When General McClellan had transported his army to the Peninsula and had commenced his approach, Stonewall Jackson, perhaps the most enterprising and energetic general of the confederate army, dashed into the Shenandoah Valley, attacked in detail three armies commanded by improvised generals put there by the Government, defeated them, and after those triumphs he returned by rapid marches, placed his forces again in the army commanded by General Lee, and took part in the battle of Gaines's Mill, where General Fitz-John Porter was in supreme command; the very gentleman who is to be the beneficiary of the legislation now proposed. Unfortunately for this country, unfortunately for the Government at Washington, still more unfortunately for those who contended against the Government, McDowell's forces were withdrawn into the defenses at Washington, though that officer declared at the time that he should proceed toward Richmond, as all the army down in the Shenandoah Valley and General Jackson had returned to the army of General Lee.

It is quite unnecessary for me to say that Richmond did not fall, and it is a historical fact that up to the time they received the newspapers of the North announcing that McDowell's force was not to march in the direction of Richmond the confederate government scarcely expected to hold the city and were prepared to leave. When they received the usual notice through the papers of the North of this unfortunate action of the authorities at Washington they felt they were safe. To say the least of it, that was a grave mistake on the part of the Government here, to intrust a general with the command of armies, and then, after full knowledge of the plans by which he intended to conduct his campaign, to withold his right arm when he intended to strike a blow at the enemy which might be fatal; and yet, sir, no one then charged and no one now charges the living or the dead with infidelity or disloyalty.

Mr. Speaker, domestic war in this country was unexpected; it was sudden in its opening; it was new to our people and our Government; and I am not here to charge disloyalty upon those who in their ignorance made gross mistakes. When the Army returned from Virginia it was necessary that public sentiment should be settled in some way, so as, if possible, to relieve the Government of any charge of incompetency to conduct its affairs to success, especially as the chief duty of those intrusted to its administration was to conduct a great war; so McClellan was said to be tardy by some, to be incompetent, and it was even said at the time, and not in whispers, that he was disloyal, and he was removed from his command of the Army. The generous public accepted the action as proper, and the people of this country once more renewed their fidelity to the Government and their disposition to support the citizens intrusted with its administration.

General Pope was then placed in command of the army. He came from the West; his proclamations glittered with generalities and rattled with brilliant rhetoric. [Laughter and applause.] I remember to have read them all at the time, and have no recollection of any other such productions in the history of peace or war. [Laughter.] If not as logical, they were even more brilliant and beautiful than the rhetoric of the gentlemen who stand here on this floor to defend him and to accuse General Porter. [Renewed laughter.] General Pope scorned the comforts of hotels or boarding-houses or cabins or tents, and proclaimed his headquarters to be in the saddle. [Renewed applause.]

At the time all this occurred the American people glowed with the expectation of seeing a brilliant military meteor come from the West who would lead the army to quick and rapid success and thus make a contrast to the man they called "Tardy McClellan." Now, Mr. Speaker, I will not fight the battle of Bull Run over again; that has been done often enough on this floor, and it is enough for me to say that the Army suffered defeat, and that the President of the United States in person asked McClellan to resume the command again. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I will not fight that battle over again which terminated so disastrously and led the President once more to place General McClellan in command, and really I must doubt whether the history of that battle has been much improved by gentlemen on the other side, and I am forced to say, without intending any disrespect to any of my colleagues or gentlemen on this floor, that some of the newspaper correspondents gave at the time quite as good an account of that battle as has been given in this discussion with so much deliberation and which seems to be inspired by distrust and hatred growing out of politics.

Mr. Speaker, human passions are the principal agencies in all political affairs. That is the teaching of history in all the past; you can not separate passion, prejudice, ambition, and the hope of power from the politics of to-day; and if that philosophy be correct, it is demonstrated in the unseemly and unjust opposition to the gentleman who is to be restored to citizenship by this bill. I could not improve on what has been so well said in the history of this battle in marshaling the facts by my colleague [Mr. BAYNE], who was a soldier in the war and surely has a right to be heard in the defense of a soldier's honor.

And who upon this floor who listened impartially to the presentation of this case by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY], who also was a soldier in the late war, or by the enthusiastic gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], whose opinion should not be taken because he was only thirteen years old according to the representations of one gentleman when he enlisted in the service and served as a private soldier, but whose services were welcome even at that tender age. I take their history of this battle and their solution of the orders given to General Porter, and accept the speech of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS], so remarkable in the clearness of its logic and the beauty of its diction, that when the distinguished gentleman closed General Fitz-John Porter would have been vindicated by acclamation by all the people of the country if present. [Applause.]

It is said Fitz-John Porter was slow to obey orders. General Thomas was slow, and the gentleman from Michigan, if he did not know it at the time, must well know now that there was a clamor against General Thomas because of his tardy movements in Tennessee. Stalwart, sturdy, brave Thomas drew his enemy to the place where in the plan of his campaign he intended to offer him battle. The newspapers clamored that Thomas was not fit to command the army. He was superseded and the commission was on its way to the hands of another general to take command in his stead. General Grant himself was about to leave and take command in person when the news was proclaimed to the country that General Thomas had met his enemy and destroyed the army in a single terrible battle, and General Thomas went to his grave and left a sweet memory behind him as one of the bravest and grandest men that ever served in that or any other war. [Applause.]

If General Thomas had been superseded, or if he had taken the direction of the Government and had forced a battle before he was prepared, he too would have been condemned. Why, gentlemen must not forget that in the very beginning of the war it was said, semi-officially if not officially, when another great general demanded two hundred and fifty thousand men for service in the West, that he was crazy, absolutely crazy. The first time I ever heard of General Sherman as distinguished, the announcement was accompanied by the assertion that he was a crazy man, and it was said that he was demanding more troops than it was expected the Government could possibly need to suppress insurrection and compel obedience to the law. They said no sane man could ask so large an army as two hundred and fifty thousand men; but before the war closed the Government had nearly one million one hundred thousand men in the field. And before the war was over many true and good men wished that that craze of Sherman had extended to some other generals who commanded troops.

Gentlemen on the other side now say Sherman was a grand old man. Well, that is true. He served with much distinction at Vicksburg, and in long marches through Mississippi, and in his approach to Atlanta against one of the most experienced and skilled military men of this or any other country [Jos. E. Johnston], and with what courage he then swung off and made his romantic march to the sea and then conquered the coast by the reverse. After all, Mr. Speaker, if the Government was correct in saying that General Sherman was crazy in the beginning of the war, there is a consolation in feeling hopeful that we may be supplied hereafter with more generals afflicted with the same disease. [Laughter and applause.]

When Grant assailed Cold Harbor, a fortified line, and his army lost ten thousand men and the enemy not more than five hundred, and when the army positively declined to make another assault, no one accused him of being a traitor. No one ever mentioned such an insinuation or made such a suggestion. It was more wood to the fire, more men to the front, more vigor and more power at the North to compel obedience to the law. General Porter could not expect to avoid his share of trouble, and victims were required there, just because the failure of McClellan's campaign, broken up by the council at Washington, had to be explained. That was all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if General Porter violated orders, if he did what was alleged or charged against him, if he treated with disrespect or contempt General Pope, who was in supreme command, let me say that General Pope ought to have known and did know, and it is alleged on this floor that he knew, that General Porter had disobeyed orders on the 27th of August, 1862, and then and there General Pope should have arrested him. He had the power and that was his duty. He should have taken from General Porter's shoulder the insignia of his rank and the sword from his side. He should have done just what Washington did with Lee at Monmouth on the field or what Sheridan did with Warren at the Five Forks.

The history of war is full of events of this character, where military men have been degraded on the field by their superiors, and no one on this floor will attempt to deny in his opposition to this bill that Pope knew, as they allege, that Porter disobeyed orders on the 27th, and that he was in his command on the 28th and 29th, and fought in Pope's presence on the 30th under his command. And yet, in the exercise of his power as commander of the army, he could have placed his subordinate officer under immediate arrest, and in irons if necessary. Accepting, therefore, as settled by the admissions on both sides that General Pope knew at the time that Porter had disobeyed his orders and caused a disaster to his army, it is not unjust to say that with all that knowledge if he then believed it and did not put him under arrest he was unfit to command the army, and if Pope believed that Porter was a traitor to him or his country or had disobeyed orders, it is most remarkable that he continued to command him and witness his active struggles a few days afterward to arrest the progress of the enemy toward the capital of his country.

The army that had fallen to pieces under the command of General Pope, and the disorganization of which terminated his military career in the East, was taken by McClellan, at the request of the President of the United States, and reorganized. The army was marched under McClellan's command to South Mountain, fought a battle there, and a little later fought the battle of Antietam, and surely the gentlemen on the other side know the historical fact that the battle of Antietam produced your freedom proclamation. President Lincoln wrote the freedom proclamation at the Soldiers' Home during the summer. He produced it to his Cabinet early in the month of September or late in August, and at the time "said he was responsible for the act, as it gives the policy to the war," and declared that he did not hold any member of the Cabinet responsible. He did not ask their opinions of the policy of the proclamation, but said that he would receive suggestions as to the change of words or sentences, and very few if any were made.

One or two suggestions were made by Secretary Chase, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, but Mr. Seward said: "While we accept the conclusion of the President, I would suggest that he had better wait for a military success;" and that caused the great President to pause and hesitate, and after Antietam, regarding that battle as a military success, the proclamation was issued. The battle occurred on the 17th of September and the proclamation was issued on the 22d. General Porter remained in command with General McClellan, and was in the engagements to which I have just referred. After the battle of Antietam General McClellan was removed from the command of the army, and his removal was disapproved by the masses of the American people. No man during all the war, commanding troops in the service of the Federal Government, had the confidence of the officers and soldiers that General McClellan had inspired. All who lived at the time or have read honestly know that truth. And so great was the disappointment at his removal that there was even danger of insubordination.

The removal of General McClellan disturbed the country seriously, and General Pope having failed to put General Porter under arrest immediately, the public sentiment was well known and demonstrative that something had occurred that was improper, and public sentiment had to be relieved once more by some positive action on the part of the Government, and so General Porter was accused. The career of the man who had failed to put him under arrest, and who was heralded from the West as a gentleman who had large military experience, who had earned success in battles on the Western rivers, and from whose future military service the country expected so much, ended in disappointment. I have heard much said here of the wonderful military genius of General Pope. Gentlemen who say they knew him intimately speak of his early promise, of his services in the war with Mexico, and his successes in his various commands in the armies during the war of the rebellion; and then the rhetoric of his proclamation was quite in harmony with the declaration of his friends in their opposition to this bill.

Forced into the war, Mr. Speaker, and holding an official position where it became my duty to offer all the moral and physical powers of a great State to the defense of the Government, surely I desired it to terminate, and with a view to that it is not improper for me to say here at this time that after the disasters of Bull Run and until a few days after the close of Antietam the great State of Pennsylvania contributed to the service of the Government more than thirty thousand men. There was no disaster to our armies during the war which caused greater distress than that at Manassas and Bull Run. Indeed, for a time strong, faithful, and loyal men hesitated as to the future, and it required the recall of McClellan and his restoration to an army he had so long commanded, organized, and disciplined—an army that gave him their confidence, and as an earnest to the people of the country who had not lost their confidence in him to check their growing discontent.

So far as the State of Pennsylvania was concerned, her people were willing to give all the material force and power of the State to sustain the Government, but the removal of McClellan caused great disappointment at the time, as all know who either lived during that war or ever read its history with attention and with a disposition to judge fairly of men and events. General Burnside was placed in command when McClellan was removed. He is dead; but he was as kind and good-hearted a man as ever lived, and I will say nothing in reproach of either the man or the services he rendered to his country during his life. But he, either acting on his own judgment or, much more likely, under instructions from Washington, sat down with his army at Falmouth and waited until the enemy erected batteries on the other side of the river to receive him, and then threw his army across, not to a battle, but to a slaughter; and it is remarkable and may be regarded as one of the fortunate events of the war that one single man of that army ever returned. Twenty-three thousand remained on the other side or were carried back wounded. General Burnside accepted the situation and declared his unfitness to command so large an army, and I utter no disrespect to his memory (for he was an excellent soldier and a loyal, true man) when I say that the country accepted his declaration as true.

Of course General Burnside retired from the command of that great army, and General Halleck, who was here at the capital, assumed, in connection with the Secretary of War and the counsels surrounding him, to direct the movements of the Army from the capital. What effect can it have upon this case to repeat so often the story of the battle of Marengo, as it is done in very florid language by the gentlemen opposed to this bill? Marengo has been rehashed and served up to this House three times. I propose to turn the attention of this House to the condition of affairs some time before the battle of Marengo, and may find better illustration of the reasons of failure here. Frederick the Great had changed the military system of the world once more. Armies operated in straight lines or angles and lines of fortifications, and in a system of warfare thus to be conducted on scientific principle there was always the presence of the quartermaster and commissary supplies in abundance; operating, as it was termed, from a base.

In Austria the aulic council was established, and that body had charge of the military affairs of the empire and directed and controlled the movements of troops in the field. They directed the number of men, and on their maps in their council they moved armies at a distance from the capital, and an officer in command of an army of Austria at that time who violated the orders of the aulic council was in danger of losing his head, and certainly his command. We imitated that council here in Washington, and it is neither unreasonable nor unjust, but faithful to the truth of history, to say that most of our disasters resulted from the fact that the movements of the armies were directed from this center, and not by the will or plans of the generals in command in the field.

In the beginning of the French revolution the Austrians sent three armies into Italy, commanded by well-trained soldiers, each one being directed where he was to move his armies, where he was to get his means of supply, on what lines and angles he should move—positive directions as to their future action. The French people, at that time in the throes of a fearful revolution, had broken down absolute power, had crushed the remnants of feudalism and vassalage into the earth, and in their attempt to gain freedom and to vindicate the rights of humanity they incurred the hostility of all the centralized governments of Europe. A man suddenly appeared in the field. Educated as a soldier, he had attained some distinction as a subordinate officer at Toulon and had quelled insurrection at Paris. He came from the people, and defying low birth and iron fortune, became a captain of men. He led thirty-five thousand ill-fed, ragged Frenchmen, without a commissary or a quartermaster department at all, and inspired by the love of liberty he dashed inside the scientific lines of the Austrians and destroyed three armies, either of them of superior force to his own, conquered Italy, humiliated the Austrian Government, and took and destroyed the council. And if Napoleon Bonaparte had died then he would have left a better memory behind than after his ambition robbed him of his patriotism. [Laughter.]

I say he not only destroyed their armies and gave freedom to Italy, but he took the council. There was the result of an attempt to control armies from the central government, and it would certainly have been as well for our country if our Central Government had taken counsel from such a result, as history is philosophy teaching by example. When General Grant came to Washington he was put in supreme command of all the armies of the Republic, and the counsels at Washington ceased to control. From the day Grant was put in command no military disasters occurred. The armies were successful, as these gentlemen who surround me, and who served in the army of the confederate states, so fully understand. It is said that Grant's testimony is not to be taken in its full force because, as I understand the allegation, he was charged the other day in this House with some kind of understanding that he was to be promoted in rank and thus retired, and his advocacy of General Porter would be alloyed with the dross of money and the gratification of his ambition.

Why, Mr. Speaker, there never has been one day since I have had the honor of a seat in this House and have been allowed to vote, although opposed to General Grant politically, on which I would not have voted to restore him to the Army and give him pay for the service he has rendered to his country. And so far from there being combination on either side of the Chamber to make any opposition to such a measure, I have never heard it mentioned, except by a few of the Democratic members that have said to me they would vote as I did in casual conversation. I never objected to it, and it was quite unnecessary for the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] to say that any impression prevailed on this side of the House that any bargain of that kind had occurred. I congratulate that gentleman on his good taste in the fact that he did not publish what he said in his speech. [Laughter.] The repentance of the man who two thousand years ago repented in his last hour was not too late, but very close on the margin. It is said by one of the Scotch poets:

Between the saddle and the ground,
Mercy was asked and mercy found.

So between the time that eloquent gentleman delivered his speech and the time the printer put it in type he repented [laughter], because he knows that General Grant's testimony, which is certainly the greatest military authority in this country, is added to this case. Certain remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] the other night were admirably replied to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] to-day. That gentleman took the House by surprise by his reply to the gentleman from Michigan. The gentleman from Michigan amused the House with his grotesque wit, as he always does, and when he appealed to the gentlemen on this side he said: "You were in the rebellion against this Government and have no right to vote on this matter; for this is our business; this is our general and not yours." Well, sir, I do not admire any such principle, nor can I think that any logic of the American citizen can reach it. I don't believe any such thing. If we are of any consequence here or in the family of the nation of the world we have nationality.

Twenty years have returned us to peace and, I pray God, to fraternity. The gentleman from Michigan remembers what we fought these men for. It was to keep union in the Government. We did not desire the union of the States to be broken, because we thought that throughout its borders its blessings and benefits could be enjoyed as a great country instead of being divided into factions and segments and subjected to domestic strife. The people of the North were put in the field and called to arms to maintain the Government, to maintain the great nationality, this dead-level of social equality, this grandeur of individual rights, this invitation to the arts of industry and thrift and virtue. We fought in order that the example we have set to all the world may not be broken, for, Mr. Speaker, six thousand years of rule of humanity stand parallel with one hundred years of rule of this great people. Either the rule of six thousand years was wrong or we are wrong. There have been times in the history of humanity when there were ephemeral efforts of the government of man for himself, but they failed. Thus this Government was framed and set up after the light and knowledge of years had made this great country the only true republican form of government ever given to humanity.

And, Mr. Speaker, when the war was over we invited the States to reform their governments and send their Representatives to these Halls. They are the peers of the gentleman from Michigan. [Applause.] There is not a maimed man who fought in that unhappy war on this floor who is not a peer of the Speaker, the President of the United States, and they are to be taken into full fellowship as a part and parcel of the country, and I regret from my heart to hear such appeals from gentlemen representing a constituency in this Chamber. He says "stand aside" to American citizens. Fitz-John Porter is an American citizen, you are American citizens, every man on this floor is an American citizen and is nothing more, and in the morning and in the evening we should all thank the Almighty that we are American citizens; and all those inside and outside who obey the law and stand by the Government of this country are peers, and no more, no matter whether they are honored by official position or in the walks of private life, and I hold it to be the paramount duty, as it is the right, of every member of this House, no matter where from or what his antecedents, to vote on a question which involves the rights of an American man.

After the war there was a free forgiveness of those who differed from us on principle, but, as we in the North believed, attempted without cause to break down the Government. Why? Mr. Speaker, it was because they believed that they had just cause for resistance that prolonged the war. But for such a measure of sincerity in that belief they could never have put vast armies in the field and continued until their whole country was in desolation. Complaint, running through many years since the war, has constantly been made that the South is largely represented on this floor by soldiers and brigadiers, as they are generally called. I accept their presence here as better men than those who sent them into the field to fight. I take it for granted that in the North as well as in the South the man who believed he was right, although he was in error and fought in that great war, is a better man than the quartermaster, the paymaster, the sutler, or the contractor of the army, and the gallant men who persuaded them to go out to fight. [Great applause.] That is the class, those are the men who, on both sides, in persuasive eloquence asked soldiers to go into the war. From every battlefield came up expressions in sympathy with the people, and to every battlefield hearts and prayers went out from home.

The war left the South in poverty, absolute poverty, and it was not creditable in their poverty to send the carpet-bagger and the official thief down there to steal what little was left. [Great applause.]

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the war left the South in poverty, and it is not unjust to say that to some extent it blistered the morality of the North as all wars demoralize people. Every candid man on this floor will admit that it will take a long time to blot out the effects of the war even with those who were successful. We are now asked to deal with a soldier sent to West Point from Pennsylvania; a man who for twenty-two years has suffered injustice. Yet men on the other side of the House turn to us here and say that citizens of the United States, elected to represent the people of the United States, have no right to vote on this question and should stand aside.

In the speech of the witty gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HORR] there was interpolated by another member of the House something about Agamemnon and Ajax, and the Lord knows what. [Great laughter.] I did not understand it then, and I fail to understand it now. [Renewed laughter.] But one thing we all did understand, and that was that five minutes was put into the speech of the gentleman from Michigan by arrangement; anybody could understand that perfectly. You are asked to deal with an American citizen, and each one of you here represent a part of this great country, once more united, covered by the same Constitution, and with the same interest in the glories of the Revolution and the history of our armies. Yet it was asked, it was impertinently asked, that you should stand aside and leave this quarrel to us.

Well, if you should leave it to the Representatives of the North, from the indications made on that side of the House I am not sure that Fitz-John Porter would lose this bill; indeed it would seem from the opposition made that the Republican members of this House would not vote to continue the stain upon him.

When I first saw Fitz-John Porter, Mr. Speaker, he was young; his eye was brilliant; his hair was dark; he was the model of a young soldier. It was at Harrisburg at the beginning of the war when Washington was shut out from us. There were sixteen thousand militia there that Porter desired to take to Baltimore. They were not clad, barely armed, and no comforts for them could be improvised at the time. I can see him now as he then presented himself when he said, "If you will give me this army I will march it to Washington if I have to march over the ashes of cities; but if you do not give me this army, and Washington should fall, you will be responsible." And I yielded the force to his command, and he approached and covered Baltimore and held all hostile movements in check in that direction, and this man is now accused of being a traitor who thus promptly acted for himself and controlled the first movements of troops toward the capital of the country. [Great applause.]

In the beginning of the war, when everything was disjointed and in confusion, the newspapers of the North kept up a continuous cry of "On to Richmond." That was the newspaper clamor; but those who were engaged in the organization of troops and in levying men for the service learned too much of the difficulty of raising armies and the necessity for discipline to join in that cry. And those with conservative views during that trying period of our history knew quite well and noticed that there was always somebody between our armies and Richmond, and gave us great trouble before we did get there after four long years of hard fighting. As the quota of Pennsylvania before we called out our three-years' men, twenty-three regiments were placed under the command of General Robert Patterson, of Philadelphia. Some one to-day over on the other side spoke of General Patterson in language far from complimentary of that old man, who is now in his grave. I would not mention his name, as he is dead, except for the remark to which I have referred. I think it was my colleague from the Schuylkill district.

Mr. BRUMM. You are mistaken, governor; it was not I.

Mr. CURTIN. I beg my colleague's pardon. I might have been sure he could not do any such injustice as that to General Patterson's memory. General Patterson was a foreigner, who came to this country in his youth and made it the country of his adoption. In 1812, with a captain's commission, he raised a company in Pennsylvania and with it marched to Canada, arriving at the camp of General Scott's army at midnight. The next morning he engaged in battle and served faithfully and gallantly through that war. In the beginning of the war with Mexico he was made a major-general, and as second in command joined General Scott at Vera Cruz, engaging in every battle of that war until the fall of Mexico and the restoration of peace.

When the late civil war commenced he was put in command of a district—Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware. Communications were entirely broken with Washington, and he took command of the forces in the Shenandoah Valley. It was charged upon General Patterson that he withheld his forces when he could have held Johnston, who was in his front and who passed to Bull Run, and secured that success. General Patterson asked for a court of inquiry, but his application was declined. The President said to him: "General Patterson, you can afford to wait." That old man waited until the war was over, and then he published a vindication so perfect that those who had accused him of treachery blushed, and the men who would have mobbed his house in Philadelphia were ashamed of their conduct. That citizen-soldier died, having served his adopted country well. He was followed to the grave by the benedictions of his fellow-citizens, and when the coming sun of spring breaks the ice-bound earth and it smiles in flowers, the first and freshest are gathered to be put upon the grave of that old Irish hero, who, in pride I can say, honored me by his friendship.

Why, Mr. Speaker, General Thomas was accused, Sherman was accused, General Grant was complained of, and now, when we have here a victim of the mistakes in Washington, for all made mistakes, it is asked that this House shall restore him to his rights. He is not now that handsome soldier that I saw in his youth. His hair is gray and his eyes are dim. His children are above all others interested in having the stain removed from their father. Technically it is said we can not reverse the decision of the court. When it is proposed in the American Congress to do justice to an American citizen, high or low, let the member who will cast his vote on such technicality settle his technical doubts in eternity, for there is a higher law, that men shall do justice one to another. Charity and justice go hand in hand. This man now asks simple justice from his country, and that is all.

I do not care whether the court of review had a right to examine witnesses on oath or not. It can not make the slightest difference in the discharge of duty in these Halls, nor can it make any difference whether the court was constitutional or not. Military courts and civil courts are entirely different. The one class is rigid, fierce, executing its sovereign will and decrees at once; the other takes care of the rights of persons and property. The humblest man in all this great country can appeal from the verdict of a jury or the judgment of a court, however trifling the amount in controversy. And when one is accused or found guilty of crime, in every State in this Union there is the right of appealing for a review by the courts of errors. Here is a man who many years since, in the excitement of the war, was under the mandate of the Secretary of War to hurry through the proceedings condemned by a court-martial, and who for twenty-two years has been asking a rehearing. The President gave him a court of inquiry.

As the question now presents itself to us we are not to determine it by rigid rules or by technicalities; it is the truth we are seeking, the plain, open truth. This man has appealed from the judgment of that military court; his appeal is here. It is sustained by the judgment of the court of inquiry, composed of eminent men sitting in a time of profound peace, when no victim was demanded, having before it all the evidence presented to the former court, supplemented by the testimony of officers of the Army of the United States and of the confederate army who were engaged in the battle; and more than all, supported and sustained by the opinion of General Grant, which must be regarded as the highest military authority in this land. He appeals to the Representatives of the people, and from this Chamber, representing the American people, his appeal wings its way and is now pending before the august tribunal of the American public. Fifty millions of people are interested that no man shall be injured by public or private law, by military or civil law. To such a tribunal this man now appeals. He appeals on the facts as presented. He appeals on the highest military authority; he appeals as an American citizen, and the question is far above politics, with all its aspirations, its honors, its emoluments.

Let us do justice, simple justice, in plain words which all men can understand, whether they be military men or civilians. If this man has been wronged, let us give him justice. Technicalities born of the ingenuity of man often stand in the way of truth and right, but simple justice flows from the throne of the Almighty, and let us take counsel from our hearts in dealing with this our fellow-citizen. I know full well that many of the gentlemen on the other side will vote for this bill, and I am glad to hear that some who differ with me in political opinions will vote in that way. I know full well how my colleague from the Allegheny district [Mr. BAYNE] will vote, as he has spoken, but do not know how the gallant soldier who stands in my front will vote. He gave the first fresh years of his matured life to the service of the country and stood in the leaden hail of battle with the general we desire to relieve.

Having served with Fitz-John Porter, he certainly will not tolerate for one moment the imputation that he was a coward. He has reason to know of his courage and his skill as a military commander, and if he has doubts I trust he will lean to the vindication of an honest, faithful man rather than to follow the progressive and rigid politics of his surroundings. To him and my colleagues on both sides of this Hall I appeal to remember the honor and the character of Pennsylvania. They all know of this man, they all know of the blood that runs in his veins, and in making that appeal to my colleagues I know it will go down to the body of the people. It is a soul-born sentiment or truth that in Pennsylvania we love to do homage and pay respect to the martial virtues, and let it be understood that the fair fame of that historic State has never been tainted by the accusation of infidelity or treason to any of her citizens, soldiers, or statesmen.

But forcible as the appeal which this bill makes to my colleagues in this enlightened presence of their pride in Pennsylvania, the case of General Porter appeals to every man upon broader, more far-reaching, and grander grounds. Proud as we are to be Pennsylvanians, there is a title of broader significance and still more dear to us all and to every man within our borders who can stand up and say to all the world, and feel the full significance of the declaration, I am an American citizen, and will do justice to my peer and my brother either in private or official life when I know that injustice has been done him. Here we are standing in the presence of an appeal by the citizen to the Representatives of the people; and as they represent the people and are supposed to present public sentiment in its truth and right, from its Representatives it goes to the entire country, and will carry the appeal to the grand inquest of the American nation.

It should be the pleasure, as it is surely the duty, of the Representatives of the American people to wipe away the stigma from General Porter and to proclaim to all the world that we have restored him to his rights, made him once more a citizen. And I declare, as I understand it, that this bill wipes out every stain from the character of the man, it being the solemn adjudication of the Government as represented in these Halls. [Loud applause.]

Mr. Speaker, a code of morality which would be applicable to a man but should not control the actions of communities or States or nations would be a delusion and a fraud, and a Representative of the people in these Halls who is controlled by prejudice, or whose judgment is warped by excitement, and most of all by the rigid bonds of political fellowship, must be forgetful of the morality which should guide him in his search for truth and justice. And now, when we are once more a united people and restored to fraternal relations, to concord and peace, when we are all interested in the progress and enlargement of the glory and power of this great people, let us do justice to every man within our borders, whether he be of high or low birth, whether he be soldier or civilian, and searching for that justice which God has stamped on the human heart, let us take from this man the ban under which he has rested for many long, weary years, and give to his children that pride which they must feel in a father who served his country faithfully in a name that never was before tainted, and the consolation of knowing that they are not the children of a traitor to his country; but they shall rejoice and give to their country that fidelity that is due to it from every American citizen, and that after long years of suffering their father's name has been restored in all its brightness and from his country he has at last received justice.

And when that work has been accomplished, the citizens honored by the right of representation upon this floor can find consolation and just pride in the truth that they too have performed their duty to their country, their constituents, and their fellow-citizen. [Great applause.] Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is it in order to move to amend the title of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The title is the last thing to be considered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to amend the title of the bill at the proper time.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 184, nays 78, not voting 58; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call, when his name was called,

Mr. HARDEMAN said: Mr. Speaker, I ask to be excused from voting.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to make that request at this time.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I wanted to state the reason for the request. I believe that there is magnanimity enough in the Representatives from the North on this floor to pass this bill without my vote and do justice to Fitz-John Porter. I therefore ask to be excused. If my vote is necessary, I shall vote "ay."

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to say that, considering this a political question, I have not voted. I am paired with my colleague Mr. BLACKBURN. If he were present here, I suppose he would vote "ay." I should vote "no."

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to recall my vote, as I am paired, but had forgotten it at the time of voting, with my colleague Mr. ERMENTROUT. If he were present, he would vote "ay." If I were not paired, I should vote "no."

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am paired with Mr. RAY, of New York, but as he and I were of the same opinion in this case I have voted.

Mr. COX, of New York. My colleague Mr. MULLER left here on an urgent telegram at 4 o'clock and was not able to secure a pair. If he were present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. WEAVER. My colleague Mr. VALENTINE is absent from the House on account of sickness. If he were present, he would vote "no."

The following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

Mr. HOWEY with Mr. HITT, on this bill. If Mr. HOWEY were present, he would vote "ay;" Mr. HITT, "no."

Mr. EATON with Mr. WAIT, for this day. If Mr. EATON were present, he would vote "ay;" Mr. WAIT would vote "no" on this bill.

Mr. BUDD with Mr. GEORGE, on all questions until further notice.

Mr. KELLEY and Mr. DARGAN, on all questions until further notice.

Mr. KASSON and Mr. TALBOTT, on this bill. Mr. TALBOTT would vote "ay;" Mr. KASSON, "no."

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, with Mr. RANDALL, on this bill. Mr. RANDALL would have voted "ay;" Mr. MILLER, "no."

Mr. ELLIS and Mr. CHASE, on all questions for this day. Mr. ELLIS would vote "ay" on this bill.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, on this vote.

Mr. HOLTON with Mr. COVINGTON, until Tuesday, the 5th of February.

Mr. PAIGE, with Mr. WILSON of Iowa, for to-day.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, with Mr. KETCHAM, until February 6.

Mr. MILLARD, with Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania, on all political questions, from January 31 until this pair is withdrawn by notice on both sides.

Mr. POST, of Pennsylvania. I desire to say in connection with this announcement that this bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter was specially excepted from the operation of that pair, and I have therefore voted.

Mr. VALENTINE with Mr. HARDY, from to-day until Monday.

Mr. MONEY with Mr. WADSWORTH, on all questions, from January 17 until further notice.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, with Mr. RICE, on all political questions, to February 8.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. BURNES would vote "ay;" Mr. MCCOMAS, "no."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, the reading of names was dispensed with.

Mr. SLOCUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, addressed the Chair.

Mr. SLOCUM. I demand the previous question on the title of the bill.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move to amend the title.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to make that motion pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I made my motion before.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman made the motion before the bill was passed; it was not then in order.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Then I shall call for a quorum upon this vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know that a quorum is not present.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I call for a division, then.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 2.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I only desire to say, with the permission of the House, as I do not wish to consume time in demanding the presence of a quorum, that it was the duty of a soldier to fight. General Porter got orders to fight and did not go; and for that reason I have felt it my duty to vote against restoring him to the Army. If I had been recognized I would have offered an amendment to this bill amending its title so as to read, "for the benefit of Fitz-John Porter, and for other purposes," believing as I do that it is the purpose of the men who are pushing this bill, friends of General Porter, whether here or elsewhere, to introduce another bill at the next session of Congress to give him an enormous sum of money. I believe, furthermore, that it is a part of the plan of the Democratic party to undo—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The "ayes" have it, and the previous question is ordered.

The title was ordered to stand as in the bill.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 7 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

LAKE TRAVERSE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a communication of the 29th instant from the Secretary of the Interior, submitting, with accompanying papers, a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs upon the subject of the right of way of the Chicago, Milwaukee and Saint Paul Railway Company through the Lake Traverse Indian reservation, in Dakota.

The subject is commended to the consideration of the Congress.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, January 31, 1884.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in further compliance with a resolution of December 4, 1883, a report, received through the Secretary of War, of Dan. C. Kingman, Corps of Engineers, of his operations in the construction and improvement of roads and bridges in the Yellowstone National Park, with his views as to the amount that should now be appropriated therefor; also letters from Mr. Rufus Hatch, of New York, respecting the lease to him and others of sites within the park for hotel purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The former reports on this subject, the Chair thinks, were laid upon the table for the time being. If there be no objection, this letter, together with the accompanying papers, will be printed and laid on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. A bill is under consideration and has not yet been reported from the Committee on Territories on that subject, and I suggest whether it would not be proper that the letter and accompanying papers should be referred to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can only state that one or two previous communications upon the same subject were, on motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], laid on the table.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the attention of the Senator from Missouri. I was suggesting that, as this matter is under consideration by the Committee on Territories, this and the previous reports upon the same subject had better be referred to that committee.

Mr. VEST. I have before me now the bill agreed upon by the Committee on Territories, and am only waiting that order of business in order to report it. We should have moved before this time that the answer of the Secretary of the Interior to a resolution which I had the honor to offer should be referred, except for the fact that I knew the bill would be reported, and then the whole matter could be before the Senate in printed form. I take it that a better course would be to allow this communication, as the Chair suggests, to be printed, and then it can be considered together with the former report when the bill comes before the Senate.

Mr. HARRISON. I make no objection if the bill, as I now understand, is to be reported from that committee to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter, with the accompanying papers, will be printed and laid on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. VEST. That is the better course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, in response to a resolution of the 29th ultimo, calling for the causes of delay in the adjustment of the salaries and pay of postmasters under the act of Congress of March 3, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 20th ultimo, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to lands certified or patented for the benefit of railroad companies since December, 1875, in alleged contravention of a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered during that year; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting a report of the commission appointed December 22, 1882, to re-examine and ascertain the damages accruing to certain Chippewa Indians, in the State of Minnesota, growing out of the construction, in compliance with law, of reservoirs upon their reservations; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to the action of the Cherokee national authorities in the distribution of the $300,000 appropriated March 3, 1883, to be paid into the treasury of the Cherokee Nation out of funds due under appraisement for Cherokee lands west of the Arkansas River, and recommending such additional legislation as will protect the rights of those who are citizens of that nation by adoption; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair presents a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, transmitted to the presiding officer by the governor of that State. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives to so adjust the tariff as to encourage productive industries at home.

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That we favor a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the Government, economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, and afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies; and that the governor of Ohio be requested to forward copies of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives from Ohio at Washington.

A. D. MARSH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
ELMER WHITE,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Adopted January 26, 1884.

Mr. HOAR. Did the governor of the State of Ohio furnish to the Chair any exposition or definition of the resolution in addition to what has been laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary question. The governor of Ohio transmitted the resolution to the Chair in his official capacity, addressed to the Chair as President of the Senate.

Mr. CONGER. I did not hear the reading of the resolution exactly. Does it purport to be the resolution of a political convention or of the Legislature of a State?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, transmitted by its executive magistrate to this body. The resolution will be laid on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present the petition of W. Pike Post, No. 377, Grand Army of the Republic, of Martinsville, Ohio, praying for legislation to give pensions to every surviving enlisted man for the remainder of his life; second, for arrears of pensions to make good the deficiency of his pay in the Army during the late war; third, to prevent a reduction in the revenues of the Government. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Gallipolis, Ohio, praying Congress to provide for sick and disabled seamen in that inspection district; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FRYE. I have a petition which is directed to me, but which evidently was intended for the Congress of the United States. Therefore I ask that it may be assumed to be so, and I will present it. It is the petition of Henry Little and other members of Burnside Post, No. 47, Grand Army of the Republic, of Auburn, Me., praying that pensions be granted to ex-prisoners of the late war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent to present a paper addressed to him but intended for consideration in the Senate. If there be no objection it will be received and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of George B. Proctor, of Fitchburg, Mass., and others, officers of the Army in the late war, praying for the redress of certain grievances by them suffered. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Samuel M. Blair, of Middlesex County, Massachusetts, praying to be paid his (loyal owner's) share of the proceeds of certain turpentine seized at Savannah during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LAPHAM presented a memorial of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors of the United States residing in New York, protesting against the passage of the bill proposing a change in the method of paying pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Peter J. Reuss, late surgeon of the Seventh Regiment, New York Volunteers, praying for an increase of his pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented resolutions of Carpenter Post, No. 321, Department of New York, Grand Army of the Republic, relative to the pensioning of the veterans of the late war by the Government of the United States; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL. I present the petition of M. H. Buckham, president of the University of Vermont, and several professors of that institution, representing that there are "wide differences between the laws of the several States as to the causes of divorce and the jurisdiction of their courts over suits for divorce by or against non-residents," and they ask that such a law may be passed as will provide for a thorough inquiry into the various matters referred to and the collection of statistics of divorce from the reports and authorities of the several States as a basis for future legislation. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE presented a memorial of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, in favor of the passage of the bill (S. 234) to relieve ships and vessels from compulsory pilot fees; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of merchants of Chicago, remonstrating against the repeal of the act of 1879 permitting vinegar-makers to use the vaporizing process; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present a petition of the board of health of San Diego, Cal., praying for the establishment of a quarantine on the boundary line between California and Mexico. I do not know to what committee the petition should be referred. As it relates to a question between the United States and the States in regard to the matter of quarantine, probably it should be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I move its reference to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California, presented a memorial of citizens of Stockton, Cal., protesting against proposed legislation by Congress to allow settlers upon lands within the claimed limits of the rejected Moquelamos grant to enter that land under the homestead and pre-emption laws, and praying that the matter may be judicially determined; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARRISON presented the petition of G. M. Findley and 25 others, ex-Union soldiers and sailors, praying for the passage of a bill pensioning every soldier and sailor of the late war at $8 per month from date of discharge; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Thomas J. Richards and 26 others, ex-soldiers, praying for the passage of an act extending the benefits of arrears of pensions to all pensioners; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GROOME. I present a letter addressed to myself from Samuel I. Kinna, of Frederick County, Maryland, in regard to a modification of the law with relation to granting honorable discharges to soldiers charged with desertion, and, treating it as a petition, I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent to present a letter addressed to himself on the subject of the discharge of soldiers now appearing on the rolls as deserters. The Chair thinks that questions of that kind, respecting the regularity of discharges from the Army, have generally been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GROOME. Very well; let that reference be made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS. I present severally the petitions of William J. Ward and James B. Blackwell, guardian of Willie Blackwell, a minor, praying that compensation be made for certain commissary supplies furnished to the Army of the United States. The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I present sundry petitions, signed by soldiers in different parts of the country, principally the States of Missouri and Colorado, praying for the passage of a law conferring the benefit of pensions on soldiers generally. The character of the legislation desired is set forth very fully in the prayer of the petitions. I move the reference of the petitions to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ALLEGED ELECTION OUTRAGES IN VIRGINIA AND MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was committed the duty of making certain investigations, to report a resolution and ask for its immediate adoption.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read for information:

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the investigation into certain alleged occurrences in the States of Virginia and Mississippi ordered by the Senate by its resolution of January 29, 1884, to be made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, may be made by any subcommittee thereof, and that said committee or subcommittee shall be authorized to proceed to said States, or either of them, and to sit wherever it may be found necessary for the purposes of said investigation, and, if necessary, to appoint an additional clerk, and that the expenses of said investigation be paid from the appropriation "for special and select committees," upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee making the same; and that the committee have authority to cause its proceedings and testimony taken to be printed from time to time as it may see fit, exclusively for its use.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to Rule XXV, which provides that to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate there "shall be referred all resolutions directing the payment of money out of the contingent fund of the Senate, or creating a charge upon the same." This resolution appears to provide an appropriation, although it says it shall "be paid from the appropriation for special and select committees."

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will pardon me, the expenditure from the contingent fund of the Senate has already been directed by the resolution which passed the other day, and this resolution provides for applying that expenditure from the fund which is appropriated expressly for select committees. I suppose that by unanimous consent, if there be any technical question, it can be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A bill (S. 235) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Augusta, Me.;

A bill (S. 55) to provide for the erection of a public building for the use of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in the city of Carson City, in the State of Nevada;

I am also instructed by the committee to report that in its opinion a recital by the governor of the State that the person named for Senator was legally elected is all that is required under the existing law. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] who introduced the bill desires that it shall be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

PAY OF HOUSE COMMITTEE CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 116) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees and other employés of the House of Representatives shall begin, to report it without amendment, and I ask that it may be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CALL. I wish to say a word upon the joint resolution. I, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, dissented from the propriety of passing such a measure, and I wish to state in a very few words why I did so.

The joint resolution divests the House of Representatives of its power to say when the duties of its employés shall commence. If it can not fix the time when their pay commences, it can not fix the time when their duties shall commence.

The Constitution says that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." To my mind it is very clear that this can not be true and at the same time another House of Congress prescribe the time when compensation shall commence, for the Senate might say, "We will not agree until the end of the session that their pay shall commence," if they have any power to limit the time when the duties shall commence. I find in Story upon the Constitution very briefly the following words, which I shall read, as giving my reasons for opposing the joint resolution:

SEC. 837. The next clause is "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." No person can doubt the propriety of the provision authorizing each House to determine the rules of its own proceedings. If the power did not exist it would be utterly impracticable to transact the business of the nation, either at all, or at least with decency, deliberation, and order. The humblest assembly of men is understood to possess this power, and it would be absurd to deprive the councils of the nation of a like authority.

It is very clear to me that if the Senate can limit the time when the House employés shall commence to perform their duties or when their pay shall commence, or if the House can limit the time when in the discretion of the Senate the duties of its employés shall commence or their pay, then each House is not the absolute judge and can not determine the rules of its proceedings.

Further, this is not a measure for the appropriation of money. It is to fix the time when the pay of these clerks shall commence, and that by law, thus divesting each succeeding House of the absolute authority which each succeeding House of the Legislature has of the power to determine the rules of its proceeding, to say what shall be the manner in which their servants shall perform the duties attached to the legislative proceedings of that body.

What is included in the words "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings?" And how shall we ascertain it? The rule is clear by which all language is ascertained by the ordinary meaning of the words and by the object or purpose of their use. Rule of proceeding is the customary method.

The method of procedure in all legislative bodies is by committees, clerks, bills, resolutions, and records or journals, and by order and decorum. No one will deny that these methods or rules of proceeding are necessary, and, if so, they include all things necessary to their existence. The only question is whether the payment of money or compensation is necessary for these methods or rules—whether you can have a journal without paying for the book in which it is kept or clerks without compensation for their labor. In other words, the customary and necessary means to any object or purpose are included in the requirement that the purpose or object shall be accomplished.

The constitutional object or purpose here is two separate legislative bodies, each of them "determining the rules of its proceeding." The conclusion demanded is that whatever is necessary for the separate performance of the legislative duties of each is included and intended in this requirement. But the argument of the committee must be that the time when the officers of each House shall commence the performance of their duties and the time when their pay shall commence shall not be fixed by each House, but shall be fixed by both Houses.

It is said that instead of "each House" determining what is necessary to its procedure, two Houses formerly existing made a law which has taken the place of this constitutional provision and requires both Houses to fix by law the time when the pay of the employés shall commence.

This is only to affirm that the Revised Statutes have changed the organic law. I do not agree with this reasoning, and therefore shall vote against the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. The joint resolution is necessary from the fact that the Revised Statutes provide that no one can receive compensation for any duty performed until he shall have taken an oath of office. The clerks of several committees of the House of Representatives have been performing service without taking that oath, and this is simply to relieve the House from the provision which is contained in section 1756 of the Revised Statutes, which requires the oath to be taken before any compensation can be paid. It is a matter that has passed the House of Representatives several times. A similar resolution was passed in 1880, and one I believe in 1878.

Mr. BECK. I hoped the Senator from Iowa would read the clause of section 1756 of the Revised Statutes which induced all of the committee, I believe, except the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to recommend the passage of the joint resolution. It is a House joint resolution. They send it to us. They desire that we shall agree to what they have done, and the committee agreed to do it without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t." We are allowing them to do just what they desire, which is to pay these clerks from the time they began the discharge of their duties before they were sworn in. They could not be sworn in because the committees were not appointed, and yet the gentlemen who were to be chairmen of those committees had the clerks there at work not knowing what day they could be sworn in, and they now ask us to agree to a joint resolution which they send to us, to which we say "certainly." Section 1756 of the Revised Statutes reads thus:

Every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit, either in the civil, military, or naval service, excepting the President and the persons embraced by the section following, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any part of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath.

They ask relief from that provision in the Revised Statutes. We say "yes;" and that is all there is of it.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

D. C. ALLEN.

Mr. COCKRELL. On the last day of our session, from the Committee on Claims, the bill (S. 385) for the relief of D. C. Allen was reported adversely. I have been informed that there is additional testimony, and I ask that the order indefinitely postponing that bill be set aside and that the bill be placed upon the Calendar. I did not observe the report at the time it was made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks that the order indefinitely postponing the bill named by him be reconsidered. Without objection it will be so ordered. The Senator asks that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. Is not that a case which I reported?

Mr. COCKRELL. No; the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] reported it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar unless objection be made.

Mr. COCKRELL. I will not ask that it be recommitted until we get the additional testimony.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

THOMAS H. REEVES.

Mr. COCKRELL. Some days ago the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands reported adversely the bill (S. 352) for the relief of Thomas H. Reeves. I had stated to him at the time, or just about the time he reported it, that I should have no additional evidence, and suggested that he report the bill; but before the report was made I received information from the parties concerned that the additional evidence would be furnished and I aimed to communicate that fact to him, but did not give him the information until after he had made the report. I ask that the order indefinitely postponing the bill may be reconsidered, and that the bill may be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri asks that the order indefinitely postponing Senate bill 352 be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is reconsidered. The Senator further asks that the bill be placed on the Calendar. It is so ordered, there being no objection.

ELIZABETH GORDON.

Mr. GROOME. On the 29th ultimo the Committee on Pensions made an unfavorable report upon the bill (S. 650) for the relief of Elizabeth Gordon, and the bill was indefinitely postponed. With the consent and approval of the Senator who made that report, I ask that the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the bill named by the Senator from Maryland was postponed indefinitely? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. GROOME. I now move that the bill be again referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the following numbered bills of the Forty-seventh Congress be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Senate Committee on Finance: S. 551, 695, 1023, 1696, 2403.

On motion of Mr. GEORGE, it was

Sizer, deceased, be authorized to withdraw from the files of the Secretary's office the papers and documents accompanying the bill for the relief of Henry E. Sizer, being Senate bill 380 of the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, upon his complying with the rule on this subject.

SUPERVISING ARCHITECT.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to forward to the Senate the testimony taken by a committee of the Treasury Department during the last summer, and the report of said committee, touching the administration of the Supervising Architect's office by Supervising Architect Hill. And that the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate, under and by virtue of what provision of law the Supervising Architect is appointed, and the scope and extent of his powers under such appointment; whether he executes an official bond, and whether he disburses public money in virtue of his appointment as Supervising Architect; and, if so, from which appropriation, and for what purpose.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. Let the resolution be printed and lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the resolution will lie over under the rule, and be printed.

CRIMES OF INDIANS UPON INDIANS.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to send to the Senate copies of the correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Department of the Interior concerning the case of Johnson Foster, a Creek Indian, who was accused of the unlawful killing of Robert Poisal, an Arapaho Indian, in the Indian Territory, in September, 1882; and a copy of any opinion of the Attorney-General given in that case relating to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over such crimes committed by one Indian against another Indian within the Indian Territory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think that had better be printed and lie over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama asks for the present consideration of the resolution, but there is objection. The resolution will lie over under the rules, and be printed.

ISSUE OF UNION PACIFIC OBLIGATIONS.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask for the present consideration of the following resolution:

Whereas by section 4 of an act "making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873, it was provided "no dividend shall hereafter be made by said company but from the actual net earnings thereof; and no new stock shall be issued on mortgages or pledges made on the property or net earnings of the company without leave of Congress, except for the purpose of funding and securing debt now existing or the removal thereof. Any director or officer who shall pay or declare, or aid in paying or declaring, any dividend or creating any mortgage or pledge prohibited by this act shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding two years, and by fine not exceeding $5,000."

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior inform the Senate whether the Union Pacific Railroad Company has issued any new stock or made any mortgage, pledge, lease, running arrangement, or other traffic contract since March, 1873.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I believe the preamble is subject to action yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know what the preamble is. I have a general objection to agreeing to preambles. I am perfectly willing to agree to the resolution, but before agreeing to a preamble I should like to read and study it. I agreed to the resolution because I can remember that, but I do not know how much of an indictment the preamble is.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The preamble merely recites the act of Congress passed in 1873, a clause of an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOAR. The preamble does not say what corporation that applies to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It applies to the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. HOAR. Let it be read again.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The preceding part of the act quoted refers to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and it was not necessary to put in the whole of the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is passed, and the preamble will stand unless objection be made.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 3,000 extra copies of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, reported from the Judiciary Committee on the 4th day of February, 1884, be printed in pamphlet form for the use of the Senate.

COLORADO SCHOOL LANDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions," the Calendar of unobjected cases is in order. The first business on that Calendar will be laid before the Senate.

The Chief Clerk announced as first in order the bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts;" and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] pending to this bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. An objection was made to that amendment by several Senators, though I do not think the objection well founded, that it seemed to endanger the passage of the bill of the Senator from Colorado. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Committee on Public Lands have reported a bill for California precisely like the amendment I offered to this bill, and at the proper time I shall ask to have that bill considered.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill in order will be announced.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 1024, precisely like the one just passed, applicable to California. It is Order of Business No. 110.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent to take up Order of Business No. 110 on the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. Let the title of the bill be read for information.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think I shall object. Let the Calendar go on in order.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin objects. The next bill on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

OREGON AND WASHINGTON INDIAN WAR EXPENSES.

The bill (S. 936) to provide for the payment of so much of the expenses incurred by the Territories of Oregon and Washington in the suppression of Indian hostilities therein in the years 1855 and 1856 as have not been heretofore provided for and paid was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOAR. I move that that bill be referred to the Committee on Claims. It seems to have gone to no committee of the Senate as yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER] who introduced the bill is absent and sick, and requested that this bill lie on the table for the present before it shall be referred. The Chair hears no objection, and such order will be made. The bill will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. HOAR. Very well.

SPECIAL ASSISTANT ATTORNEYS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next business in order is the resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] directing the Committee on the Judiciary to examine and report what legislation, if any, is necessary to restrict the appointment of special assistant attorneys, &c.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I ask that that lie over without prejudice. All the information called for has not yet been returned to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the resolution lying over without prejudice? The Chair hears none, and the next business on the Calendar will be stated.

KANSAS CITY, FORT SCOTT AND GULF RAILROAD COMPANY.

The joint resolution (S. R. 21) for the relief of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The preamble recites that the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, successor to the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, has, under and in accordance with the provisions of "An act to secure the rights of settlers upon certain railroad lands, and to repeal the first five sections of an act entitled 'An act granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad and its extension to Red River,' approved July 25, 1866," restored to the United States all the unsold lands received by it under its land grant and paid into the Treasury the proceeds of all lands sold. The resolution therefore provides that the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, successor to the Missouri River, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, shall be entitled to the payment in full of all compensation earned heretofore by the last-mentioned company in transporting mails and military and other supplies for the Government to the same extent and effect as though no lands had been granted for the benefit of the company.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is there any report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. SAWYER January 9, 1884:

The Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. 21) for the relief of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, have had the same under consideration, and report the same back as follows:

By an act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, there was granted to the State of Kansas, to aid in the construction of a railroad "from the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad, Eastern Division, at the line between Kansas and Missouri, at or near the mouth of the Kansas River, on the south side thereof, southwardly through the eastern tier of counties in Kansas, with a view to its extension so as to effect a junction at Red River with the railroad now being constructed from Galveston to Red River at or near Preston, in Texas," and known as the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad Company, "every alternate section of land or parts thereof designated by odd numbers, to the extent of ten sections per mile on each side of the road, to be selected within twenty miles from the line of said way," * * * "not granted, reserved, or sold, and to which the right of homestead settlements or pre-emption had not attached at the date of definite location thereof" (14 Statutes, 236). A map showing the definite location of said road was filed in the Department of the Interior June 27, 1868, and the lands inuring to said grant on the line of the road thus established were subsequently withdrawn from settlement for the benefit of the road, namely, under dates of June 12 and October 4, 1869.

A map showing that the road had been constructed in accordance with the conditions of the granting act was filed in the General Land Office in January, 1871.

The name of said road was changed from the "Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad" to the "Missouri River, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company" by decree of the probate court of Johnson County, Kansas, on October 5, 1868, and was subsequently again changed to that of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company.

By an act of Congress approved March 3, 1877, entitled "An act to secure the rights of settlers upon certain railroad lands, and repeal the first five sections of an act entitled 'An act granting lands to the State of Kansas to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley Railroad and its extension to the Red River,' approved July 25, 1866," the first five sections of said act of July 25, 1866, were repealed. By the second section of said act of March 3, 1877, the Secretary of the Interior was directed to issue no more patents to said company, and to withhold all patents not delivered.

The subsequent provisions of the latter act required the company to accept of the terms, conditions, and impositions thereof, including the reconveyance of all the lands patented to it, the repayment of all moneys received from the sale of lands, the cancellation of all outstanding contracts for the sale thereof if the contracting parties should consent in writing thereto, the repayment to purchasers of all moneys paid on outstanding contracts. These provisions have been complied with and performed by said company within the time named, and the papers evidencing such performance are now on file in the Department of the Interior.

In 1869 the construction of the road was commenced and within two years was completed through and beyond all the public lands from which its grant could have been satisfied.

By reason of the existence of this land grant, the Missouri River, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company, between the date of its construction and the taking effect of the act of March 3, 1877, was subjected to certain deductions from its regular and proper charges for the transportation of the mails of the United States, and also of certain military and other freights of the Government, which it is the purpose of the joint resolution under consideration to cause to be paid to the company.

As stated above, the company has complied with all the provisions of the act of March 3, 1877. In other words, it has conveyed to the United States all the lands received by it by virtue of said grant and not sold by it, and it has paid into the Treasury the proceeds of all the lands of said grant by it sold, so that the Government has been restored to the condition it was in practically before said grant was made, and the railroad company has had no benefit whatever from the grant. The amount of compensation withheld from said company in consequence of said grant being 50 per cent. of the regular charges for the transportation of freight, and 20 per cent. of the regular charges for transportation of the mails between the date of the construction of the road and the taking effect of the act of March 3, 1877, is about $25,000, which it is the purpose of the joint resolution to require the repayment of.

Your committee deem it only fair and equitable that as the Government has been placed in its original condition, it should now do the same by the railroad company, and therefore recommend the passage of the joint resolution, with certain formal amendments submitted.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the preamble? The Chair hears none, and the preamble will stand.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. CULLOM. It seems to me these bills ought to be read at length, so that we may know what they are.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills are read at length.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not hear this one read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read at length. The question is on its passage.

The bill (S. 380) for the relief of James Bridger was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That James Bridger be, and he is hereby, authorized to commence his suit in the Court of Claims against the United States, at any time within one year after the passage of this act, for the value of the improvements by him erected and constructed at Fort Bridger, situated in Green River County, in the Territory of Utah, and appropriated by the United States to its own use; and the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the said claim free from the bar of the statute of limitations; and said claimant and the United States shall have the right to use as evidence before said court any papers or documents in the War Department in relation to said claim, and any other competent testimony relative to the claim; and said court shall render judgment in favor of said claimant for the value of said improvements as found by said court.

Mr. PLATT. Let the report be read, if it is not a long one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is two pages.

Mr. PLATT. Then let the Senator reporting the bill explain it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. In 1843 James Bridger located certain lands in the present Territory of Utah, that is, he went upon them and took possession. He erected improvements on those lands, which were subsequently known as Fort Bridger. In 1857, when General Johnston went to Utah with his army, he took possession of Bridger's improvements and lands. He entered into a contract with him, or some proper officer entered into a contract with him, by which it was agreed that the Government should pay him $10,000 when he showed that he had a good title to the land, and a certain yearly rent was agreed to be paid also. Bridger has never been able to show that he had a valid title to the land, and the Government subsequently issued an order making it a military reservation. The Government is still in possession of the lands that were in the possession of Bridger at that time, and the War Department is now improving the buildings and erections on the land with the view of making it a permanent fort. This bill simply provides that Bridger may go into the Court of Claims and prove the value of the improvements on the land at the time it was taken possession of by General Johnston, and get judgment for the value of those improvements.

Mr. PLATT. And not for the land itself?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Oh, no.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would suggest, in view of the fact that it has been reported to us that the claimant, James Bridger, is dead, and that fact is not conclusively known yet, there be inserted as an amendment to the amendment the words, "or his legal representatives," immediately after the name "James Bridger," so that it will do for either. I move that amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Let the title be amended so as to read "A bill for the relief of James Bridger or his legal representatives."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made unless objection be interposed, and the title will stand as amended.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 31st ultimo approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 713) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel H. Lockett, of Alabama; and

An act (S. 1256) for the removal of the remains of the late Maj. Gen. Edward O. C. Ord, United States Army, from Havana, Cuba, to Washington, D. C.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 19.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to clause 7, section 12.

Mr. BAYARD. I submitted to the Senate at its last meeting my reasons why it would be inadvisable, and I think unlawful, for us to adopt the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey. I trust therefore the Senate will decline to accede to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. The amendment is, after the word "quantity," in line 46 of section 12, to strike out "than eleven square leagues," and after the word "land," in line 47, to strike out down to and including the word "quantity," in line 49, as follows: "to or in the right of any one original grantee or claimant, or in the right of any one original grant to two or more persons jointly, nor for a greater quantity;" so that the whole clause will read:

> No confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity of land than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONGER. In section 3, line 6, I move to strike out the words "when the person testifying is dead;" so as to make the section read:

> SEC. 3. That the testimony which has been heretofore lawfully and regularly received by the surveyor-general of the proper Territory or State, or by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon all claims presented to them, respectively, shall be admitted in evidence in all trials under this act, so far as the subject-matter thereof is competent evidence; and the court shall give it such weight as, in its judgment, under all the circumstances, it ought to have.

I have commented on this clause heretofore, and shall merely refer to it now. Testimony has for thirty years been authorized to be taken before the surveyor-general, who was appointed a commissioner under the law; the parties interested have at very great expense obtained testimony which, if not received now, by reason of the lapse of time and the loss of witnesses, can never be restored. This bill excludes the receipt of such testimony, unless the witnesses are dead; and this exclusion applies not only to the verbal testimony of witnesses, but to documents and papers. There is a proviso still remaining in the bill that the court shall give the testimony received where the witnesses are dead such weight as, in its judgment, under all the circumstances, it ought to have. In view of that restriction, I see no reason why all the testimony taken under the laws heretofore passed should not be received in the examination of these cases.

Mr. BAYARD. I certainly hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Michigan. In the first place, this bill for the first time in the legislative history of these claims provides for a trial and hearing on both sides before a judicial tribunal. The hearings and the examinations heretofore in regard to these vast unmeasured bodies of land have been in a great degree ex parte; the character of testimony which has sought to sustain many of these grants has been vague and unsatisfactory to a great degree. The consequence has been that, for want of a proper representation upon the part of the respondents, large bodies of land have been confirmed by Congress in what has subsequently turned out to be absolute ignorance of what they were doing. The limitation affixed by the committee was one of long deliberation and careful consideration. It applies the regular, the usual rule of evidence in courts to cases of this character. If the witness be alive there is no hardship that he shall be produced and be cross-examined, because an examination without a cross-examination may prove, as we all know in common experience, entirely illusory. The half truth may be worse than the whole lie.

In the present case there is no hardship, because if the witness be dead his deposition can be read with what force it may be entitled to before the tribunal; and if he be alive the rights of counter-claimants, now provided for for the first time, can be tested by compelling his presence and subjecting him to the usual tests for the evisceration of truth. It would be the greatest error, it would be an assault upon justice, to permit a great mass of depositions, which are in reality but little more than mere ex parte affidavits, to be received as evidence in the cases involving the large amounts and the valuable properties affected by this bill.

I trust therefore that the careful consideration of the committee will not be disregarded, and that the Senate will sustain them in throwing around these cases this necessary safeguard for the protection of private rights as well as public rights, which was designed by the clause in question. If the witness be dead his deposition may be read; if he be alive there is no reason why he should not be called and subjected to cross-examination. Therefore whether you look at the private interest or the public interest, both demand alike that this safeguard and protection should be maintained. I trust the Senate, in the face of the loose character of the testimony, the hearsay oftentimes which has crept in, will not permit this safeguard to be stricken out of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. As has been said by the Senator from Delaware, the surveyor-general of New Mexico and the Commissioner of the General Land Office in the investigations which have been authorized by existing laws were of course allowed to receive and doubtless did receive ex parte affidavits. Very likely in many of these cases the surveyor-general may never have looked upon the face of the person whose testimony was presented; very likely he had no other evidence of the existence of such person as the witness who assumed to testify except his signature, real or pretended, to the paper which was presented to him and the authentication of the officer before whom the oath purported to have been taken.

Now, Mr. President, as we are providing here a scheme by which these titles shall be brought to the tests of legal evidence, the rules of evidence that are in force in the courts of the country, it seems to me that it would be entirely out of character to say that everything which had been admitted as evidence by a surveyor-general in any of these Territories or by the Commissioner of the General Land Office should by the reason of the fact that he had received it as evidence be evidence before the court. It might very well be that the evidence was incompetent by reason of some rule of law such as the Senator from Delaware has suggested; a court would possibly exclude it because it was hearsay testimony; but under the section, as the Senator from Michigan proposes to amend it, such testimony must be received. The hearsay statements, by the section as amended, would necessarily be received as evidence in the case.

This makes interminable confusion of rule. If there be anything in the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan that some of these witnesses are remote from the points where they would have to testify, and that it would be subjecting the claimants to unnecessary expense to require them to produce the witnesses again in court, his amendment, I think, should be so framed, if it is allowed at all, as that the court should have to judge of the question whether the evidence was admissible in itself under the rules of law, and should further have the power, upon any suggestion of fraud or deceit or forgery in connection with the testimony—upon any such suggestion from the adverse claimant or from the district attorney of the United States—to compel the production of the witness in open court, that he might be cross-examined, or to exclude his testimony. It may be that there might be some of this evidence that would be competent by the rules of law that would be difficult to obtain again, the authenticity and genuineness of which might not be challenged by the Government. If there should be any such, I would see no objection to allowing it to be introduced; but it does seem to me, if we are to proceed to test these titles in courts of law, that it would be—I will not use the term that was upon my lips; but it would certainly be anomalous to dump in upon these courts of law a mass of papers such as have been accumulated by the surveyor-general, and to compel the receipt of all that as evidence without reference to whether it conformed at all to the recognized rules of evidence in courts of law and equity.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, the result of the adoption of this bill without the amendment would be to make a farce of all the labors and all the expense of about nine hundred claimants who have taken testimony under the provisions of a law passed in 1854. Many of them having died long ago, their heirs have gone on and taken testimony. This has involved an expense of thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars in the aggregate. This would make that labor and that expense performed in accordance with the only law authorizing testimony to be taken a perfect farce.

I am no friend of these claims. I do not care how quickly they are swept out. I have no doubt many of them are forged and false and fraudulent claims. I would rather the matter should be disposed of in some manner to protect those who have legal claims. But there have been reports made to Congress, at intervals of five to ten years, from 1857 up to the present time, by committees of the Senate and by committees of the House, stating that this testimony had been taken at great expense. Congress has acted upon this testimony in every case which has been presented to Congress and disposed of; and in every case where a claim has been passed Congress has acted solely upon this kind of testimony in passing the claim. There are, it is said, about nine hundred claims pending on the testimony already taken before the surveyor-general under the provisions of this law. A commissioner of the General Land Office in one of his reports made the following statement to Congress:

It might perhaps be suggested that, inasmuch as in the majority of the cases these claims will have to go into court for the final adjudication of title, the commission might be dispensed with and the courts vested with original and exclusive jurisdiction in all cases. This course would be open to the following objections:

First. Delay, which is the principal objection against the present mode of settling these claims under the act of 1854. In this connection it should be taken into consideration, first, that the courts already have all of the legitimate business they can attend to; and second, that if the adjudication of the title in these cases were made an original proceeding in the courts, the whole case would have to be made up in the court, requiring in each case a period varying from two or three days to a week or ten days, according to the particular circumstances in each case, while, on the other hand, if the case is brought into court in the form of a complete transcript of the proceedings of the commission thereon it can be disposed of in a comparatively much shorter time.

If the confirmation of these claims were left entirely to the court, it would in my judgment be a low estimate to fix the limit within which they would all be confirmed at twenty-five years.

Second. The commission, as constituted in the proposed bill, with its interpreters and two law agents, one of whom is required to be skilled in the Spanish language, furnishes a more perfect and effectual means for the protection of the interests of the United States than if the adjudication of these claims were devolved upon the courts. The bill contemplates that one of the law agents shall be in constant attendance upon the commission, while the other, whose duties will be more in the nature of a special attorney or agent, is abroad collecting testimony in behalf of the Government. In many instances it will be necessary for each agent to visit the premises in person to procure the information and witnesses necessary to a proper defense of the interests of the Government. The district attorneys could not possibly perform these duties, if it were required of them, for the reasons, first, that outside of the time necessary to the discharge of the duties properly pertaining to their respective offices they would have but little time to devote to these duties, and second, that it would be necessary, in order to properly perform them, for the district attorney of each judicial district to be familiar with the Spanish language.

In this same report of General Williamson, a careful head of the Land Office, he stated to Congress that if the testimony had to be taken again and the cases commenced de novo you might safely calculate that it would take over twenty-five years for any court to hear and finally determine these proceedings.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator do me the favor to tell me what are the processes by which this testimony has been taken? The Senator says it was taken in conformity with the old law. I am ignorant of the provisions of that law myself, and I should like to know in what manner this testimony of which he speaks has been taken, what has been the rule of law, and what efforts have been made to bring out the whole facts.

Mr. CONGER. I can not answer fully.

Mr. DAWES. I think the Senator can tell in general the provisions of the law. I acknowledge my ignorance of this law.

Mr. HAWLEY. I have the statute right here, and if the Senator from Michigan is willing I will read a portion of it.

Mr. CONGER. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. The statute of July 22, 1854, is as follows:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general, under such instructions as may be given by the Secretary of the Interior—

I have not those instructions—

to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico; and for this purpose may issue notices, summon witnesses, administer oaths, and do and perform all other necessary acts in the premises. He shall make a full report on all such claims as originated before the cession of the territory to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848, denoting the various grades of title, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each of the same under the laws, usages, and customs of the country before its cession to the United States, and shall also make a report in regard to all pueblos existing in the Territory, showing the extent and locality of each, stating the number of inhabitants in the said pueblos, respectively, and the nature of their titles to the land.

It goes on to say that such report shall be made to the Secretary of the Interior and laid before Congress, with a view to confirming bona fide grants.

Mr. DAWES. That does not quite give the information which I am after—whether in practice there has been any such thing as cross-examination by an adverse claimant or by the United States, or whether it is a fact, as was suggested by the Senator from Delaware, that affidavits were received. All its value, it seems to me, would depend on answering that question.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, an officer of this Government was directed by law to inquire into and examine these cases. He was required to go upon the ground and ascertain and find the boundaries of any claim presented to him which had boundaries defined. He was bound by law to have presented to him whatever of muniments of title there might be in the hands of the claimants, to take testimony, hear statements both for and against the confirmation of the claims, and take testimony where there were conflicting or overlapping claims. This was the law first for the Territory of New Mexico, and then it was extended over the other Territories mentioned in the bill, conferring the authority on the surveyor-general in each under the instructions of the Department, which I have not, for all these matters are very voluminous, and from year to year these reports were made by the surveyors-general of these Territories and States respectively. Large masses of testimony were returned with the surveys which must be used, and the only ones which can be used, but yet under the provisions of this bill there has got to be a new survey, new lines, new testimony, new proof of landmarks which have been entirely destroyed and obliterated and cannot possibly be replaced in many instances. By the provisions of this bill all that testimony, all these surveys, all these official proceedings, are thrown out, unless perchance it be testimony of some person who has since died; and there has been room for a great many to die from that time to this all over these Territories. The reports show that somewhere between six and seven hundred cases have been reported; in each one there is a great pile of surveys, examinations, and official records which are legal in their nature, and by virtue of the law ready to be presented, I presume, with affidavits made here and there, for and against claims. I presume, as in all such cases, there is conflicting testimony; there is no doubt about it.

I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to the fact that the custom and usage and laws passed to settle land claims under all other treaties with all other people have been by commission. It was so with Great Britain, with Spain in regard to Florida, with France in regard to all the northwest territory bordering upon our northern frontier, and which we received subject to the stipulations of the treaty of 1763 between France and England, continued through the English occupation of that territory; and by our treaty with England we were required to recognize the old stipulations of the French and English treaty of the last century, of 1763, as well as the stipulations of the treaty with Great Britain in the surrender of that territory and the definition of its boundaries. In those cases the land claims were settled by a commission, and by a commission of three persons, except in one case, where there were five, if I remember aright.

In 1854 Congress in its wisdom thought that the commission should be confined to a single person, a recognized officer of this Government, the surveyor-general of the Territory within which the claim might lie, who had ability and authority to make all necessary surveys himself, to go upon the ground to see the landmarks; when the claim was bounded by rivers or mountain ranges or had natural landmarks, either of tree or rock or hill or river or creek, to personally find where the boundaries were and define them by his survey. That has been done for almost thirty years, with those living around him to point out and assist in defining these boundaries, with the testimony of those then living who knew, with the old documents, perhaps since destroyed, not preserved and reported to this Government, copies of which only were presented as a part of the proof. From time to time these examinations and surveys and reports of the surveyor-general have been sent to Congress. I have them here in the report of the committee, from which I have read a letter, as long ago as when General Williamson was Commissioner of the General Land Office. I have also the report of the present Commissioner, Mr. McFarland, which I will read:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., June 9, 1882.

SIR: Complying with the direction for report contained in the reference, dated 1st instant, of the Assistant Secretary of a letter to you, dated 31st ultimo, from Hon. George C. Hazelton, of Committee on Private Land Claims, House of Representatives, inclosing H. R. 3149, entitled "A bill to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories," and making certain inquiries in connection therewith, I have the honor to state that the total number of claims, including pueblos, reported to Congress by the surveyor-general of New Mexico, under the eighth section of the act of July 22, 1854 (10 Statutes, page 309), is..... 141

Of this number there have been confirmed by Congress.....	64
Rejected by the Supreme Court of the United States under fifth section act of June 21, 1860	1
Pending in Congress		76

Relative to Colorado and Arizona, would say in reply that under act of February 28, 1861 (Statutes 12, page 172), the surveyor-general of Colorado has reported one claim, and under act of July 15, 1876 (16 Statutes, page 304) the surveyor-general of Arizona has reported thirteen claims.

As none of the claims reported by the surveyors-general of Colorado and Arizona have been confirmed, the number pending in Congress is the same as reported, to wit, fourteen.

From the foregoing it will be observed that the number of claims reported by the surveyor-general of New Mexico is.....		141
Reported by surveyor-general of Colorado.....		1
Reported by surveyor-general of Arizona.....		13
Making a total of claims reported.....		155
Of this number there have been confirmed by Congress.....	64
Rejected by the Supreme Court of United States under fifth section of act June 21, 1860.....	1
Total pending in Congress.....		90

Of the 90 claims pending in Congress as aforesaid, three were rejected by the surveyor-general of New Mexico, and two were rejected by the surveyor-general of Arizona, and the case of the Una de Gato, originally recommended for confirmation, was, upon reinvestigation, subsequently reported as fraudulent.

It may be proper to state in this connection that in the claim of Gervacio Nolan, numbered 39, and that of Jose Sutton, numbered 45, both in the Territory of New Mexico, adverse reports were made by the proper committee of Congress. These claims are also included in the number pending as aforesaid.

In response to the second clause of the second question in Mr. Hazleton's letter, I inclose herewith a copy of office letter dated January 9, 1878, to the honorable Secretary of the Interior. This letter estimates the total number of grants in New Mexico to be 1,014. I find upon examination of the report of the surveyor-general of New Mexico of August 22, 1881, that up to that time only 190 claims, including pueblos, had been filed with him, and deducting the 141 which had then been reported by him, would leave 49 still pending in his office and 824 claims yet to be filed with him, assuming that none have been filed since that date.

While I have no means of determining the accuracy of the statement contained in said letter as to the probable number of grants in New Mexico, which may or may not be overestimated, yet I concluded to transmit a copy of the same, and the information upon that point may be accepted for what it is worth.

From the most reliable information in the possession of this office, it is believed that the number of claims to be reported by the surveyor-general of Arizona will not exceed 11. All the claims pending in Congress, with the exception of about 12, have been surveyed, and the preliminary surveys are found, upon examination, to cover an area of about 5,500,000 acres.

This office is not advised of the existence of any private land claims in the State of Nevada nor in the Territory of Utah.

Mr. Hazleton's letter and inclosure are herewith returned.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

N. C. McFARLAND, Commissioner.

Hon. H. M. TELLER,
Secretary of the Interior.

Three successive Commissioners of the General Land Office, three successive Secretaries of the Interior, up to the present time have urged upon Congress to appoint a commission and turn over to a commission all the documents, papers, surveys, and files in each of these cases. From time to time the House of Representatives has passed a bill providing for the appointment of a commission in accordance with the usage and customs of the country in all past time. It has been met in the Senate from time to time by a bill requiring cases to be commenced de novo in the courts—for this is not a new bill; it has passed the Senate, I think, three times—a bill sending these claims to the courts, and as many times the House of Representatives has refused to pass a bill imposing upon claimants the additional expense and trouble, ay, the impossibility, of again bringing to the attention of Congress all the proof to which they are entitled in the settlement of these cases.

There is a conflict, and we may as well notice it, which may prejudice my view of the case with some, a conflict between those who entertain my views and those who seek to send these claimants to courts already overburdened with business, and when one point is there decided to send them to another court, and from that to another, until every case shall finally land in the Supreme Court of the United States. The Commissioner from whose report I have read well says that with the business of these courts it is impossible for any court having charge of all these claims and taking testimony anew in all these matters to get through a fair examination of them in twenty-five years. Sir, without some new organization of the Supreme Court of the United States it is impossible that the men now living and acting as judges there or their successors, who may be young when appointed, shall be alive to determine the last of these claims. We know, the Committee on Private Land Claims which reported this bill knows full well, that no case in the Supreme Court can hope to be reached now in less than three years from the time it is presented there unless by special act of Congress the case is given precedence.

What kind of encouragement is it to a man who may have a just and legal claim sanctioned by treaty to be put off to such a remedy? How does this Government stand before the civilized nations of the world after having permitted claimants for thirty years under the authority of the laws to present their case and make their proof till they are old and worn and wearied, and some of them gone to their graves—how does it look in the view of the civilized world for us to pass a bill such as this committee has introduced to require the very claimant who has had the claim far back in Mexican times running along till now hoping from year to year that Congress would take up the testimony and pass upon it—how does it look in the face of the civilized world to have these men whose rights have been and are nominally protected by the solemn obligations of solemn treaties required to commence anew their cases, and commence anew the struggle to retain their homes and their land upon which they and their fathers have lived for two hundred or three hundred years, and to which now they have a mere right of occupancy, with their titles suspended in Congress, that half-way house between the hell of destroying their claim and the heaven of giving them their rights under the treaty!

I say that is a mockery of justice to which all good men should look; it is a mockery of justice to compel these men to begin again in the courts the assertion of their rights and the prosecution of their claims. You might better say to them at once, "We will forfeit all these claims because forsooth somebody wants your land;" better say at once to the Mexican nation with whom we made this solemn treaty, "We are carrying out treaty stipulations; for thirty years we have had laws to carry out treaty stipulations; we stand before the world acting in good faith because we have had the surveyor-general before whom these men might go; they have acted under our laws; we have given them the privilege of doing it; they have gathered together piles and piles of documents and surveys at great expense; we have fulfilled the treaty; but now there comes a time in the year of grace 1884 when the wisdom of Congress thinks these claimants should be delayed longer and when we can set aside the law, and while nominally and sneakishly conforming to the treaty we place impediments in the way of the successful prosecution of the claims of these people until they shall be discouraged and give them up to the rapacity of the nation." That is the way it looks to me.

I doubt whether many of these claims are not fictitious. I have no reason to believe but that many of them have been trumped up by those whose ancestors perhaps dwelt for a time upon these lands or on which some of them built an adobe house. That is not for me to determine. The Government did not stop to say to another nation: "If there is any wrong in these things we will throw away all the claims." No, in the face of the world we made an honorable, fair treaty; in the face of the world we pledged the faith of this new, young, growing Republic of ours, which professes so much love for the dear people, which protects the right to land above every other right in our whole borders, that we would look on those who owned these lands when Spain ceded them to Mexico and when Mexico ceded them to us as having all the rights of citizens of our country and as entitled to protection in their property.

I would leave the case to anybody who will examine the law of 1854, and go to the Land Office and look at the multitude of testimony and files and surveys that have been presented there, and see how one after another of the original claimants has passed away and their heirs and legal representatives have been submitting papers. This bill proposes to send them back without a particle of their old proof, or surveys, or documents, or testimony, to begin again in the Territorial courts (of which there are three or four in a Territory), and the provisions of this bill give them no benefit of what they have done under the law; but they must fight their battle for their land over again.

Sir, in my judgment it would be a foul stain upon the good faith of this Government to pass such a bill with such a provision. I think the bill itself is entirely wrong in principle and theory. I shall ask the Senate at the proper time to adopt the substitute which has been adopted several times by the House, which has been recommended to Congress by three successive Secretaries of the Interior, and recommended by the Commissioners of the General Land Office several times, and has received the approval of the governors and people and claimants in the Territory mainly concerned, and of all who favor and of all who are opposed to the granting of these claims. I shall ask it to see if it may not be possible that we may preserve the good faith and fair fame of our Republic as well in regard to Mexican greasers as to our own people.

But my point now is that this amendment is a proper and a necessary and an honorable one. I want the votes of Senators for it, and therefore I called for the yeas and nays, so that it may be seen whether we will pay any regard to our treaty obligations, whether with all our love for the great people we represent we will protect even the poor Mexican in his rights.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I do not know that I can throw any light on this subject, but being a member of the committee that reported this bill, I desire for a few moments only to reply to some of the suggestions of my esteemed friend the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

I understand his amendment to the third section to be that we shall strike from the sixth line the words "when the person testifying is dead," and he advocates this change in the interest, he says, of right, good faith, and justice. Well, sir, in the interest of right, good faith, and justice it seems to me that this language should be retained instead of being stricken from the section.

We propose to establish by section 3 a rule of evidence that shall control the courts where the litigants having these private land claims shall go. I submit that it is a very strange departure from the usual rule that where there are living witnesses who can be produced to undergo examination and cross-examination and where the truth may be sifted by such cross-examination, ex parte affidavits should be taken and used in court instead of the production of witnesses who are living. I submit that the testimony which has been taken before the surveyors-general of the different States and Territories before which these peculiar claims may have been, without notice to the adverse party, without a chance for cross-examination, ought not to be received in the courts before which these cases are to be tried where the witnesses are now alive and can be produced. Surely every lawyer upon this floor will agree with me as to the evil of deciding cases by that class of testimony. It has been my fortune in the few weeks that I have been in this body to spend many hours in the committee-rooms of two committees, one the Committee on Claims, the other the Committee on Private Land Claims, and I have frequently waited when ex parte affidavits have been brought into those committee-rooms for the opportunity to see the witness who has sworn on paper without any chance for the adverse party to cross-examine him.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that in these cases the United States is the adverse party, and if its own officer charged with this particular duty was not on the ground to cross-examine and with the power to send for all the witnesses he desired.

Mr. MANDERSON. That may be so. It may be that the surveyors-general of the States and Territories had that power; but I think it will be found to be in fact a power that has been but seldom exercised, and the testimony which it is proposed shall be taken into the courts that shall adjudicate these claims has not been taken in the shape of cross-examination by an officer of the Government, but consists of affidavits taken by parties in interest and merely filed with the surveyors-general. I protest against the use of that sort of testimony for the purpose of establishing good faith, right, and justice. I say it is not good faith or justice to parties that they should not have the opportunity where the witness is living to subject him to a cross-examination.

Mr. CONGER. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to say that the testimony was taken under the provisions of the law of 1854. If the gentleman has examined any of the cases he will see that it was in the nature of examination and cross-examination according to the usual forms of testimony. I do not want to be understood that that is the character of all the testimony; but that was the usual form of the testimony.

Mr. MANDERSON. Unquestionably there are cases where there has been cross-examination of witnesses, and their examination has been under notice to the adverse party; but I submit that it will appear by the records of the Private Land Claims Committee of the Senate that the mass of the cases which have been adjudicated in times past, and most of the cases now pending, have been attempted to be confirmed upon simple ex parte affidavits, and that there has been no opportunity to those having adverse interests to cross-examine.

Mr. BAYARD. I will say that the only witnesses called were such as the tribunal, consisting of the surveyor-general alone in a judicial capacity to do right between the parties, called for. There was no one there representing one side, where there were persons representing only the other side.

Mr. CONGER. But he was the Government officer himself; he was the officer of the Government representing its interests.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, but we understand how very slackly many officers of the Government perform the duties devolved on them, and I think it will appear that that is the fact more in the offices of surveyors-general where they come to adjudicate the matter of private land claims than in any other instance.

But my friend the Senator from Michigan says that this will work manifest injustice, because here are surveys and records of officers that can not be produced under this bill. I do not understand that that is the effect of the language of section 3. Records of public officers, surveys made and made of record by surveyors do not die. The statute provides that they may be introduced as evidence by the simple certificate of the surveyor-general in any of the courts of the country, and even supposing the surveyor-general or his assistants who made the original surveys were dead, the chances are that their records still live and that over the seal of the surveyor-general and his certificate, made perhaps many years ago, they are as competent proof as though every man who ran a chain was yet living to give the detail of the survey.

I do not think that during the consideration of the pending proposed amendment any argument or discussion upon the question whether these are proper tribunals to try these causes is in order, but replying to the distinguished gentleman, I will simply say this: I agree with this committee that the proper tribunal to try these cases is the regularly established courts of the country. I do not believe in the creation of special tribunals for the trial of special causes; I do not believe in commissions. The courts of the country, open to all litigants under the well-defined rules governing the admission of testimony, are the proper places to try interests so important as those that arise under the treaty with Mexico. And I believe, sir, that it will be found that justice will be better meted out, that the good faith of the treaty will be better kept by going to these regular tribunals. If they are overcrowded with work enlarge them. If it so be that many years must be occupied, by reason of the heavy dockets of these Territorial courts and the immense press of business around the Supreme Court of the United States, enlarge the courts; make them more abundant; make some court between the Supreme Court and the Territorial courts that shall pass upon these questions; but I do not believe in the organization of any special commission while these courts exist and are competent to afford substantial justice.

I shall oppose the proposed amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I have been listening to this debate with some interest. I said to the Senator from Delaware when the bill was taken up I was anxious to be informed. We are coming, I suppose, somewhere near a conclusion of the debate, and yet I am not informed of the necessity or justice of this bill, and the more I hear about it the more dissatisfied I am with it. In the hope that I may get some further or better light I may as well now as at any other time state why I do not like the measure.

When we acquired certain territory from Mexico we made the usual covenants that a civilized government might be supposed to make under the circumstances, guaranteeing to all the Mexicans in that land the right to remain or to go away, to hold their lands or to sell them and take away the proceeds, all without cost, tax, or embarrassment of any description whatever. That was our guarantee. After we had taken full possession—and we were deliberate about it all—in 1854 we passed a very reasonable, sensible, and humane bill. Here were many thousands of Mexicans scattered about the territory, some occupying larger, some smaller grants; many of them living in the pueblos where they had village lots. Under the act, which I have already read once and need not read again in full, we made it the duty of the surveyor-general, under such instructions as might be given him by the Secretary of the Interior, to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to land under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico; and for this purpose he was to issue notices, summon witnesses, administer oaths, and do and perform all other necessary acts in the premises.

Then he was to "make a full report on all such claims as originated before the cession of the Territory to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848, denoting the various grades of title, with his decision as to the validity or invalidity of each of the same under the laws, usages, and customs of the country before its cession to the United States; and shall also make a report in regard to all pueblos existing in the Territory, showing the extent and locality of each, stating the number of inhabitants in the said pueblos, respectively, and the nature of their titles to the land."

All this was to be laid before the Secretary of the Interior, who was to lay it before Congress, with a view to confirm all the bona fide grants. Under that we have gone on these thirty years—theoretically gone on. Action under it has been suspended for three or four Congresses, while an attempt has been made to get this bill through, the general judgment of Congress having been against it for all these years, but it has determined friends. Now, let us see what sort of a bill it is.

What is the case? About seventy claims for considerable tracts have been confirmed in New Mexico. The Secretary of the Interior made reports forwarding the reports of the surveyor-general several times concerning the pueblos, and the claims in the little villages were confirmed; most of those are out of the way. What remains? Some of the larger grants have never been disposed of, and outside of the pueblos but not included in the great grants are a number of small grants, small holdings, six, ten, twenty, sixty, one hundred and sixty, two hundred, or three hundred acres, as I am informed by gentlemen familiar with the Territory. Some of the people holding the larger grants have made their due application to the Interior Department. The surveyor-general has been upon the land or near it; he has summoned witnesses as provided for in the statute of 1854; he has looked at the papers; he has made formal report to the Secretary of the Interior in favor of various grants, and the Secretary of the Interior has laid those facts before Congress, recommending the confirmation of the claims.

With regard to other landholders, they are exactly where they were when the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was made. They are raising a few acres of grapes and grain; pasturing probably a few cattle; they have a mustang; they are living in the little hut where they lived before we brought them under the American flag.

Now this law is proposed. What does it effect? What should we suppose ought to be done? I should say one of two or three things. First, continue the process under the law of 1854, but more energetically and more thoroughly. Then I should say that an easy way of doing it without disturbing these people unnecessarily or causing them great expenditure would be to appoint an honest commission of three, or five, or seven, with power to subdivide itself, if need be. Let it go into the Territory, and let it summon people to come there and present their claims, and let it make careful examinations, with full power of summoning witnesses and cross-examining; let there be attorneys for the Government with the commission to assist in the inquiry. Take this or any other most expeditious, just, and paternal way. Treat these people not as if they were trespassers to be put out of the lands, but treat them as respectable people in those lands where they and in many cases their fathers have been, in some cases, for many generations.

But the bill says that these people, big and little, the ten-acre fellows and the two-hundred-thousand-acre men "may," meaning "shall," come into court, dropping all they have hitherto done before the Department of the Interior, dropping the whole of it dead—may come into court and make a full statement by petition of their claim to this land. "Claim," sir! Why, they are in, and have been, some of them, one hundred and fifty years. Why do you wish to make them come and make a claim? They can not understand how they are to "claim" the land that nobody ever claimed against; and yet you say they must.

That is not all. You say each petitioner shall give bonds for the costs in his case. That is not all. You say that if he proves before the inferior court in the Territory that the land is his under Mexican and Spanish title, the United States attorney for the Territory shall appeal to the supreme court of the Territory, the bond for costs remaining. You go on to say that if the supreme court of the Territory decides in favor of this old Spaniard or Mexican, the United States attorney shall certify the record up to the Attorney-General of the United States; and then if the Attorney-General of the United States fails to give any direction in the case, the Territorial attorney shall bring the case before the Supreme Court of the United States. It requires a positive prohibition on the part of the Attorney-General of the United States to keep the case from going to the Supreme Court of the United States. A man as peaceably in possession as any one of us—and I venture to say there are large numbers of them who have been on those lands longer than any man in the Senate has been on any land anywhere—is to be attacked and carried through eight years of litigation, giving bonds to pay the costs in either and in any event; no matter how the suit turns out he is to pay the costs.

Mr. LAPHAM. The Supreme Court here tries the fact also.

Mr. HAWLEY. I suppose so. The Supreme Court of the United States, as the learned Senator from New York says, may try the whole question of fact for the third time.

Now, what is the real process of this bill? It looks like permitting a wronged citizen to appeal to the great sovereign for justice. Put in plain English, this is the case: The United States attorney in the Territory shall bring suit against every Mexican he can find, and every Spaniard he can find claiming to have a title older than the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. That is it; he shall bring a writ of ejectment against him and try the title, compel him to give bond, and carry him to the Supreme Court of the United States, where he shall not recover costs if he wins in the ordinary form, but shall pay all costs, lose or win. That is the case.

What does the treaty say? What did we promise in behalf of these people?

> Mexicans now established in Territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican Republic—

Now, this is the essence—> retaining the property which they possess in the said Territories, or disposing thereof and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.

Mark this: "without any contribution, tax, or charge whatever."

And yet the very first step that you take is against a man in peaceable possession, who may have been there for two hundred years, to compel him to give bond for the costs of six or eight years of litigation. Is that keeping the treaty in spirit or in letter? That is not all.

After all the explanations that Senators have given or have undertaken to give here, I can not clearly discover who has to come forward and make petition to be established in his already indisputable title. I was told by one Senator—I wrote his words down at the moment—"if the title is complete they want nothing of the United States." Another Senator said, "If a man has had juridical possession delivered to him under a Spanish or a Mexican grant, his title is complete, and he needs no further confirmation from the United States." That is a mistake. If he has had juridical possession delivered to him under a Spanish or a Mexican grant he may consider his title complete, and may never have heard a question of it for a hundred and fifty years, but I would not advise him to stand upon that. He shall go to the court, because if perchance he really has made any mistake, if he has really anybody burrowing under him, and if he has delayed going to court for three years he is gone, he has lost his land forever. All that he has got to do to lose his property is to sit still in his ranch, and in three years his title is in the United States Government; his claim "shall be deemed and taken in all courts and elsewhere to be abandoned and forever barred."

What, then, is the use of saying in the beginning of this proposed act that it may be lawful for any person claiming under this title to come to the United States court, when a little further on you say if he does not come in three years he shall lose his whole title forever?

If the title is complete, said one Senator, they want nothing of the United States. Let us see. In line 9, upon the first page, the bill refers to persons claiming "by virtue of such lawful incomplete Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey as the United States are bound to recognize and confirm." But if you turn over to the second page, to lines 27, 28, and 29, you see that they are required to state in their petition "whether the said claim has heretofore been confirmed, considered, or acted upon by Congress." What are they doing in that court if their claim has been acted upon and confirmed by Congress? Is it not a "complete" title? Yet the bill evidently contemplates that such people should all, and would far better, come into court to have the whole question tried over again. They shall come there and state whether the claim has been confirmed or not. Suppose the man says it has been confirmed by act of Congress, is the court then ready to say, "You go out with a clear title?" If that is so, what does it mean when it only provides that any persons claiming by an incomplete title may go there? No man in the whole Territory, claiming under Spanish or Mexican authority, can afford to risk his estate under the provisions of this bill; all must go to court.

There is an attempt in the twelfth section and in the seventh paragraph of it, merely an attempt, to do a wrong; and in a hasty way an hour ago (I do not think the question was understood, very few Senators were here, it was the usual lunch hour), a very sensible amendment, so in my judgment, was voted down, and the paragraph stands as it is in the printed bill, that "no confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity than eleven square leagues of land," &c. That is the essential part of it.

Suppose we enact that? Is it going to make one cent's worth of difference with the man who has a lawful Spanish grant for eleven and a half leagues, and has lived on it for one hundred years? Have you barred him? Can he not bring suit against any trespasser for the extra half league? I think he can. I do not think you will have deprived that man, except so far as force deprives him. I do not think you will have taken away his legal title at all.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who addressed us a short time ago, says he does not wish to have special tribunals established, but would rather these men should all go before the existing courts in these Territories. Very well; let us take him at his word, in the full breadth of his statement. Leave these people where they are. The courts are open to them. If any man has a cause for attacking their titles let him call them to the courts. But you have reversed the operation. These people may come to the court, but if they do not come in three years you say to them, "You have lost your land forever." They may come to court if they will guarantee the payment of the costs of six years' proceedings, to be paid whether they win or lose.

There is much talk of these claims, as if they were all illegitimate, consisting of musty old papers, forged or stolen and brought in to establish title to great tracts of land. They are not. I am assured by gentlemen who know about the subject that many of these claims, or what would be claims under this bill, which are peaceable titles now, are held by small farmers. There is a great mistake about the large tracts. Some seem to think because a patent speaks of a hundred thousand acres, or five, six, eight, ten, or eleven leagues of land, that the tract is owned by some hidalgo, some great ranchero, who is the lord of thousands and hundreds of thousands of cattle; but it is an error. The original grant may have been under one name; it may be known, if you please, as the Smith, or Jones, or whatever it may be grant; but there are very likely hundreds, it may be thousands, of people upon it.

It would take too long to tell the whole story, but I could give a brief history of one of these grants. That is why I came to pay attention to the bill. This brief was laid casually in my hands for examination. I read it, and therefore I listened to the discussion. Here is one of these large grants. In 1806, or thereabouts, a Spanish ensign applied to the lieutenant-colonel commanding at Santa Fé for a grant of land. Spain had a great deal of land and was generously at work giving it away, as we have been giving ours away, to promote settlements. The colonel ordered the alcalde of that region to go out and examine such land with a view to giving it away. The alcalde made a report that it could properly be done; and so the alcalde starts out with the twenty-six people who were to have lots of land given them, and proceeds in his quaint way to say:

> On the 1st of March, in this year 1808, I, Manuel Garcia de la Mora, chief alcalde of the town of La Canada, proceeded to the rancho of San Joaquin, and in view of, and in obedience to, the foregoing decree of Lieut. Col. Joaquin del Real Alencaster, governor of this royal province, I, said chief alcalde, proceeded to the Chama River cañon, called the San Joaquin cañon, accompanied by the twenty-five settlers, and there appearing also fourteen other citizens without land, and his excellency having given me verbal instructions to the effect that should other persons come forward to increase the settlement land should also be assigned to them, with the same rights as the others enjoy, and all the settlers being assembled, I proceeded with the distribution of the land to them, as appears from the quantities of land they received, noted in the list and certified by me—> and into the possession of which I placed them, taking them by the hand and leading each settler over his own piece of land, and placing him in possession in the name of the king, whom may God preserve! And they ran joyfully over the land, plucking up weeds and casting stones, and shouting aloud, "Long live the king that protects and helps us!"

That is the official document which is the title of these poor fellows to their land. This certificate is a part of the muniments of title in the case of one of these grants. It is not the great possession of one lord of the land, but is inhabited this day by hundreds of the descendants of the forty persons who were then put in possession by turf and twig as well as by written muniments of title. This very grant was some seven or eight years ago finally approved, and I should say that it was approved after a contest in the territory under Mexican control in 1832. It was also cordially approved years ago by our surveyor-general. It has been reported by the Secretary of the Interior to Congress several times; twice favorable reports were made upon it by committees of the House. I do not know whether they had a just title or not. I know nothing about it any further than I have stated. It has been surveyed, approved by the Interior Department, and sent here. It is not one man's grant; it is the possession of hundreds of people claiming under one original grant, and they are to be sent back now to bring a petition in their own behalf. That is a large possession. Who owns it now, or how many of them, I do not know. They can combine and one petition will answer for the whole of them. But in the case of these small farms I advise, and I think the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] who is I suppose the father of this measure and will undoubtedly defend it now—I think the distinguished Senator from Vermont will advise a man in New Mexico who holds not over 2,000 acres of land in the ordinary poverty of that land, in preference to going to the Territorial court, to the supreme court of the Territory, and to the Supreme Court of the United States under bond to pay expenses—I advise him, and I think, I say, he will advise him, to saddle his mustang and go to Mexico or to some region out of the reach of the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think I ought to say one word, although I dislike to do it situated as I am; but as I was a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims for several years when this bill was under consideration Congress after Congress, and always reported favorably and always passed by the Senate when it was reached by a very large majority, I think I ought to say a word or two.

The Committee on Private Land Claims and its members, in the course of the six or eight or ten years that the matter has been under consideration, have received a great many letters from the kind of settlers that my friend from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] speaks of, the men of small holdings. Without a single exception, so far as I remember, all the possessors of these small holdings implore us by passing a bill of this character to secure them in their possessions against great and powerful people who wish to clean them out and everybody else. I think if my friend from Connecticut, in respect of the Cañon de Chama grant, were a little further informed he would find that a powerful person or a combination of persons claim to have become the proprietors of every one of those small holdings and of all the surrounding country within the exterior pasturage limits that the community was given, and wish to have the thing confirmed in a lump. Their point before us was not the trouble about the small settlers, but the eleven-league men. The small settler never has any eleven leagues nor any hundredth part of it. One gentleman who represented the Cañon de Chama grant—I thought I recognized the color of the paper when I saw my friend have it—gave the committee, when we were unable to see that a grant to a community of a right of pasturage left people who claimed to be the successors of those small holdings the owners in fee of the vast pasturage surrounding, fair notice, as he said, that while we might pass this bill through the Senate it should never become a law until we let them into the whole extent of their grand claim outside of the small holdings, which would not embrace five hundred acres altogether, which was of no possible account to them, upon the ground that a community right of pasturage granted to a town gave a legal title in fee to all the land over which the pasturage went when the settlers had long since abandoned their little holdings, and there was not any community left at all. So I think we may dismiss the Cañon de Chama.

The whole state of the case is just this, Mr. President: It is true, as it is true in every case where you are to ascertain rights, that some people will be put to expense that they can ill afford to bear. Justice can never be administered in any other way. It never has been, and it never will be. The only question is, how you can best administer it.

In respect of every one of these grants to small holders, as in the case of the Cañon de Chama, if there are any people left there now, one section of the bill provides for a single application in the name of the community (where there was a community grant that is done up all at once) and provides for every settler who has any rights left petitioning, without their all being obliged to bring their separate petitions. It all stands on the original grant, and whatever rights there are are provided for.

But the real difficulty with this bill, the real obstacle in respect of its progress, is the one that was so candidly stated to me; not the difficulties of these small holders, every one of whom that we have ever heard implores us to pass it for their protection against powerful influences, but the influence of gentlemen who wish to obtain (and they have a right to do it if they can) these enormous grants contrary to the policy and the laws both of Spain and of Mexico, and in the hope that if we do not limit it some things can happen that have happened so often before when there was no limitation of enormous grants being confirmed which turned out to be utter and entire frauds. We therefore thought it was better for the public interest, for the interest of these small holders, to limit the jurisdiction of this inquiry to what the laws of Spain and Mexico required in those cases, and if anybody could show a case where a larger grant ought to be confirmed, to let him come to Congress afterward and make his special case.

Now a word as to incomplete titles, and then I am done. There was great force in what my friend from Connecticut said in respect of forcing a man who had been in possession of his little holding, him and his ancestors, for two hundred years, and who had a complete title under the Spanish and the Mexican laws, to go to the expense of coming into court and proving it over again. While many of these larger holders, who wanted to get title under a patent by act of Congress, urged us most strongly to take in all grants, complete as well as incomplete, it seemed to us unjust, and that anybody who is willing to stand upon the title he had should not be obliged to bring it forward, but those who were willing to admit that they required some further action of the Government, that they had not got a complete title under Mexico or Spain, should come forward in order that the public and private ownership might be settled.

That is the whole of the story, and therefore, following the suggestion of my friend from Connecticut, or following that idea (he did not suggest it to us of course), we thought it was better to only apply the bill to the case of incomplete grants, and leave those who had good titles without being put to any expense.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator kindly allow me to ask, then, what are we to understand by the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth lines, on page 2, that the petitioner is to state "whether the said claim has heretofore been confirmed, considered, or acted upon by Congress?" If it has been confirmed by Congress, that drops the proceeding immediately.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That would dismiss the case at once; that would end it. In the other case it might happen that there was still another aspect of it, as we endeavored most carefully to provide for every contingency, where there was still in respect of one of these grants a question of boundary that a man claimed more than apparently he would be entitled to on the papers under his complete grant, and claimed there was an addition to it, so as to compel every claimant to state the whole history of his claim. Ordinarily it would happen, if he stated what the history of his claim was, that he had got a grant which by a simple application of Spanish and Mexican law would show the court where it was. If he had got the case which he brought forward, where it appeared to them that his claim was complete, they would drop it at once and say, "You are all right; it is not necessary to go on with this case at all; we have no jurisdiction over it." In other cases it might happen, and so we added that provision for both purposes, that a man who claimed that in respect of part of his grant his title had become complete, in respect of some other part, as to boundary or something, it was not, and he wanted that tried, so as to make an end of every point of dispute.

That was the object of it, and I submit to my friend from Connecticut that in that view it ought to be considered a good one.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senator will allow me another suggestion—one I made in my remarks, but he did not notice it; he did not remember it, perhaps. I see here provided in section 11 of the bill—

> That all claims which are by the provisions of this act authorized to be prosecuted shall, after three years from the taking effect of this act, if no petition in respect to the same shall have been filed as hereinbefore provided, be deemed and taken, in all courts and elsewhere, to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred.

Suppose a manuel, somebody or other in one of those cañons, having been there a long time, considering his title to be absolutely secure, does not go at considerable expense and employ a United States citizen, a lawyer, to go up to court and give bond, but stays and attends to his own business, and there happens to be some little flaw in his title, something that might have been defended against. It is all very easily supposable. At the end of three years, this man in possession there, thus far undisputed possession, the claim is to be considered as forever abandoned and barred; it becomes United States property, falls under the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and is open to the ordinary operations of the land laws. Now, I do not think that is a fair proceeding; I think it would be a monstrous one, if I am right in my supposition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It certainly is, as my friend from Connecticut, states it. It is the case of every man in a government of laws where other people's rights are concerned as well as his own, who happens to meet, as will sometimes occur, with misfortune just such as my friend has stated. It is very hard indeed in that case. That was the precise provision in the California land commission act, and it must be a provision in every act which makes an end of disputes. It has happened in more than one instance, I remember, though I do not remember the names of them, where exactly that thing has occurred that some poor settler away up in the mountains or somewhere did not come forward, although the law about California made claimants everywhere, with perfect as well as imperfect titles, come forward, and they were barred too, just the same. It happened that some people did not come forward. They appealed to Congress, and Congress in every instance where it appeared that their claim was a just one, made provision for it. It is one of those things that are necessary in respect of making an end of disputes so as to secure everybody in his possession, and to allow the rest of the land to be disposed of, that you shall have a limitation and a provision to end the affair; and it will happen always, if you take a large number of cases in this world, that there will be here and there one where it works very hard indeed.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand perfectly well from the little law I have read what the law means by its being in the public interest that there shall be an end of litigation, but I submit that the committee in this case reversed all these operations. Why does not the committee say that if this Mexican manuel, in the cañon aforesaid, has been in peaceable possession twenty years he shall have acquired an absolute title. On the other hand, they say that if he does not come forward in three years and establish one he shall lose everything.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will pardon me, as he asks me the question, because we give him a law that we give to no other citizen of the United States. No man settling on the public lands of the United States gets any title by possession. That subject was considered by the committee, and it was discussed whether it would not be better to say that any possession, after a long length of time, should be conclusive evidence of title; but that was contrary to the whole land policy of the United States from its foundation down to this day; and so we thought we were not justified in making an innovation of that character. That would be a question for the court on raising a presumption of his making out a good title if he had a long possession.

Mr. HAWLEY. But this is not a case of acquired title upon public lands of the United States. It is a simple transfer under the treaty of the Mexican there in lawful possession to us with his rights unimpaired. Our law of 1854 recognized that, and declared that all these claims should be left as they were, set-off and defined, and not included in United States land, for we promised by the treaty to hold them sacred as private property duly conveyed, the title to which had absolutely passed. I am not talking about acquiring possession of the United States lands against the Government or an adverse holding.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Every settler here has a title from the Government where he lives (take it Mexico before the acquisition of this territory), or he has not, and this is exactly one of the ways to find out on which side of the truth he stands, whether he has a title or not. We can not take the question in advance. If he has a title we protect him; if he has not a title and has not any rights which entitle him to have a title in equity and justice under the laws of Mexico, then we say, "the land you are on is the public land, and you have no right to it." The Mexican can acquire no title against his government by possession any more than the American citizen. The law is the same everywhere about that. There is the answer to that. It begs the very question.

The point is to find out whether a Mexican had a good title from his government or had a title that the government would have been bound to make good in the regular course of proceeding; and this tribunal is instituted to find out that thing. It is not necessary, therefore, to say there may be a case where the court will decide wrong; there may be a case where the man will fail to come forward when he has really got a good title and ought to be protected. That must happen everywhere in human affairs, and when such a case is presented as there have been from California Congress is only to do the best it can for him as a mere matter of grace and generosity and of duty, if it is within our reach; but the law must go on uniformly applied to everybody alike. The law merely provides for separating private rights from public rights, and that is all there is to it.

I admit, as my friend from Connecticut says, that it will happen, probably in one case in a hundred under this bill, as it did under the California law and all other laws, that some man will be wronged; as it happens in one case in a hundred in the great judicial tribunal next door to us that probably in one case in a hundred, if the same judges ten years afterward, looking over the same facts again or additional facts with those, would say, "We made a mistake; we decided the case wrong against this man." But that is the fault of human society, and we can not help it.

Now, I will say one word as to the act of 1854, which I think my friend from Connecticut puts a somewhat incorrect construction upon. I think on a careful reading of the whole of that act, and the history of all that had taken place before it in respect of the Louisiana purchase and the Florida lands, he will find that the act of 1854 was merely a public inquiry under the authority of Congress for the information of Congress in order that it might proceed to do what it thought was fit in all the cases or in each case.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly; I never claimed anything else.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It compelled no man to go before the surveyor-general; it authorized him to compel no man to come before him. He could summon a witness but he could not make him come. He had none of the powers of a court, except the power of a magistrate to administer an oath to anybody who was willing to take it. If he asked a question of a witness and the witness refused to answer, that was the end of it, he could not do anything about it.

It is a misconception to suppose that any rights have been acquired either as to proof or anything else under the act of 1854. We should have been very glad to have provided, if from our experience in such affairs it would have been safe, that all the affidavits and other things that were taken by the surveyor-general might be used over again; but we had found from sad experience in a study of all the history of transactions of this kind that that would open the door to frauds that all of us would be ashamed of in a very short time. Therefore we felt obliged to provide that this matter should be proved up anew where witnesses could be compelled to attend and testify and where they could be compelled to answer questions, and if they were dead then we went to the extent of saying that these affidavits of no more legal importance than that any one of us might give and totally inadmissible in a court of justice, might be received in order to promote, as far as we could in safety, the general interest of all these settlers.

Mr. HAWLEY. The treaty says that these Mexicans shall have all their rights and all their lands "without their being subjected on this account to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever." If the charge had been one incident only to a summons before a convenient tribunal established there, with a hearing and an end to it, even though it would have been a contribution levied then to establish a right on the part of the people we are guaranteed to protect, one could have said less; but the bill levies this contribution upon them: a trial in the lower court, an appeal from that trial, if it be favorable; a trial in the higher court, an appeal from that if it be favorable; a trial in the Supreme Court of the United States, unless the Attorney-General expressly prohibits it. I should like to know from the gentleman's experience (he knows much more about it than I do) what would be the probable charge to a Mexican of four to six years in the Territorial courts and about three years in the Supreme Court of the United States upon a land case, and how much one thousand acres of average New Mexico land would be worth to the man in comparison with that cost.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can say as I have got into this debate (and I am sorry for it, because I do not like to do it), that relatively the cost would be considerably less than in attempting to get through Congress any private land claim or any other private claim of any kind by a citizen of the United States. But that is not a complete and an entirely fair answer; that is only relative. If it be necessary that Mexican citizens who had property when this territory was acquired, or claims to property, shall be called upon to perfect their titles, if they had any, to do them justice it is necessary that they should be called upon to do something about them. You can not force justice upon a man. It would be barbarous and wicked to proceed ex parte and say that the United States will proceed through its courts without any notice to these people and call upon them to bring forward their title and set up their claims. They are claims not of perfected property but claims upon the justice and legal obligation of the Government under the principles of public law to complete a transaction that they had not yet ended with the Government of which they were formerly citizens or subjects.

The reason for this appeal business I will tell my friend from Connecticut, and I am sure he will sympathize with it. In the Territories a great many people have said (and I am afraid sometimes with some truth, and if it happens once in twenty times that is enough) there is now and then a judge who is under some bias. The bias is generally against the small holder and in favor of the man who has a big mine, or a big ranch, or a big land speculation. We were afraid as a matter of justice to the men who threw stones and tossed grass and said "Long live the king," that their case might be magnified into an enormous thing by their selling out and covering a great deal of land, or else the other way. We provided, therefore, that when the single judge, for that is what it is in the district of the Territory, had gone through with the case, had taken all the testimony, made up his opinion on it, like a master in chancery, it should be brought before the full bench in order that judges from other parts of the Territory by consulting together might exercise some restraint and control over this one single disposition of what might be very important interests to the settlers and to the public interests of the United States. Thus we had been told sometimes (and there is sad experience in the Supreme Court of the United States; it runs all through the reports about these land cases) that a very large percentage even of those that were disposed of in the district courts of California, for instance, after they went to the district courts there, turned out to be very bad cases after all, and that the interests of the settlers and the small holders would become swamped by great combinations, fraudulent combinations on fraudulent titles. Then appeals were provided to be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States very much in the way that these are, only they were not required to be reported to the Attorney-General. Some appeals were taken, one notable one, where we are now called upon in the Committee on Private Land Claims to correct an error against one of these frauds, where an appeal was taken and was dismissed, as it was said, on the motion of a public officer of justice who was counsel for one of the claimants. That may not be true, but that is the story; and then we are called upon to make that good; the Supreme Court never got a chance to get hold of it.

We thought it was right for the public interest, for the safety of the settlers, and for the safety of the people of the United States, looking to the welfare of these Territories, to have every case from the supreme court of the Territory reported to the Attorney-General of the United States, and put in such a shape that no snap judgment should be got either way, in order to secure these great public interests that I am speaking of, and these small holders against great combinations. That is troublesome, I admit; but that every man may be protected in his rights, if he claims any, and that the public may be protected in their rights, you must have some means of accomplishing those purposes. We thought that that was the least obnoxious one that could be suggested, and if any better way could be named I certainly for one would be glad to adopt it.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator one question? He would appeal from his own court in the lowest instance through a general caution, a general fear of his own courts. Now, if he again loses his case in the higher courts, would it not be fair for him to pay the costs?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, the appeal from the single judge to the three in the Territory or the four—there are perhaps only three in any of the Territories covered by this bill—is a thing that occasions no expense. It merely removes the papers, the evidence to all the judges together, like a report of a committee to this body, for review.

When that court has decided in favor of the claimant, then all there is—although my friend puts it in a strong and back-handed way—is that there shall be a report to the Attorney-General, so that the Department of Justice shall have its attention particularly called to each case and that no slip in the Department of Justice, no contrivance of clerks or anybody else, shall prevent the Supreme Court of the United States from reinvestigating that case if, on examination by the Department of Justice, it appears proper that they should do so. It is true, I repeat, that in some cases that will be hard and expensive, but our sad experience has shown that the interest of the settler, the interest of the small holder, the interest of the people of the United States who wish to settle on the public lands in the regular way, requires that we should put up every possible safeguard against the enormous frauds that have so often happened.

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand, then, that in the second trial in the Territory before the supreme court of the Territory it is not to cost anybody anything?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very little.

Mr. HAWLEY. I will go there with my cases.

Mr. CONGER. When a case is sent to the courts why should not all the papers in the case in the Department, all the files connected with it, be sent to the courts. Is not that the usual provision of law? This is the first instance I know whereby the provision of law, all possible testimony of every description, as I have said before, is to be withheld from the court, unless it be the testimony of a witness who is dead. Now, the Senator from Vermont—I have asked his attention to this and he is going away just at the wrong time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will come back, then.

Mr. CONGER. He did not reply to any suggestions I made because perhaps they were unworthy of notice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; I was not in when my friend spoke.

Mr. CONGER. I want somebody on this committee to tell the Senate why every law referring cases pending in Congress, as these are, to some commission or court for adjudication has sent all papers and files in the case to have their proper weight as the court might think best, and why this of all others is excluded, and all the testimony is to be taken again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you want an answer now?

Mr. CONGER. In a moment. From the beginning my objection was to this bill in that respect. I have reiterated, from time to time, the objection to that provision of this law; and whether it is so immaterial that it does not merit any response at all, or whether the whole practice of the Government heretofore in regard to the Court of Claims and special courts has been so wrong that it is changed now, I can not tell; but it seems to me to be a great hardship. Believing it to be so, I have honestly presented it here, and no one has ever said one word justifying such a provision so contrary to all rules.

Now, I have this to add, that under this bill with that clause stricken out the United States, through its officers, may dispute any testimony on file, may call any witness to disprove what is already on file among the proofs. There is no restriction upon it, and I say that the claimant should have the right to such files and surveys and testimony as he has taken for perhaps thirty years, and not have all swept away by this bill. I should like to know why not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I most respectfully deny that there is any such rule of law or practice of the Government of the United States as my friend from Michigan describes, if I correctly understand him. I do not understand when a case is sent from a Department to the Court of Claims or from this body or the House of Representatives to the Court of Claims, that anything which goes there among the papers is evidence at all that would not be evidence if the party had produced it originally before that court. If it be a deed, a contract, a grant, a release, he can present it and have the benefit of it if he can prove that it is authentic. But I confess that my knowledge of law is so limited that I do not know any statute of the United States or any decision of any court which holds that when cases are sent to the Court of Claims affidavits that a claimant against the Treasury has presented are evidence there for any purpose whatever.

Mr. CONGER. I have not the law here, but I ask the Senator, if he will permit me, whether in the cases referred to the Court of Claims in later years under his administration there is not an express provision that the files and the papers in the case shall be sent to the Court of Claims and that they shall give such weight to them as shall seem to the court just; and there is the additional provision that additional testimony may be taken and presented to the court. That is the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I remember the first part of what my friend from Michigan says that all papers relating to any claim that goes to the Court of Claims, which are in the Departments, are to be sent to that court; but I do not remember the phrase that he adds that that court shall treat them as evidence, except upon the ordinary principles of law, that whatever would be evidence if the party presented it then and there would be evidence, and if it was not he would make it up. If my friend can show me any such absurdity as that, I should like to see it.

Mr. CONGER. I accept that invitation with great pleasure, because I have the statute right before me, and I dislike always to put my own individual words or my recollection in competition with the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no competition; I only say I do not know any such law.

Mr. CONGER. I read from the statutes of the United States passed at the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, page 485, chapter 116:

An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government.

That heading could very properly be applied to this bill:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation and determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proofs, and documents pertaining thereto, to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States, and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; I remember it so far.

Mr. CONGER. That is what I have said, that these documents should all be presented to the court, and as this bill says the court should give them such weight as in their judgment they are entitled to. That is in this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You did not read that in the statute.

Mr. CONGER. It is not in the statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought not.

Mr. CONGER. Of course it is not in the statute. By the bill which the gentleman reported, and which passed, all these papers are sent to the court, and they are to consider them as proof, vouchers, papers, statements; but in this bill is the additional provision that the court shall give them such weight as they are entitled to if the witness is dead.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That goes a great deal further than the act about the Court of Claims which the Senator has read. This bill goes a great deal further than that, because that bill only sends cases to the Court of Claims and they do not then make a final judgment. They only report to Congress. Even in that case the law that sends a claim to the Court of Claims does not provide what effect shall be given to that mass of papers, affidavits or whatever it may be. It says the court shall have those papers before them, but I could readily approve and I think I would have voted for it in that bill which provides that the whole shall again be reported to Congress, just like the surveyor-general of New Mexico was to do, that the court should take affidavits and anything else and that they should give weight to everything as far as they thought it entitled, because we finally rehear the whole thing, and as we have to rehear it, not on cross-examination but as a body going on probabilities, it was in the line of justice. But here Congress has nothing to do with the final re-establishment of these claims, leaves it to the judiciary, and leaving it to the judiciary we apply, as every country has done and must do, judiciary rules; that is, for the finding out of truth in the regular way where the witness can face the court and the cross-examining counsel and can be compelled to tell all that he knows, instead of a part of it.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. President, for further comment upon what I have said and what the Senator from Vermont has said, I will read this provision, section 3, as it would stand if the words are stricken out which I have moved to strike out:

That the testimony which has been heretofore lawfully and regularly received by the surveyor-general of the proper Territory or State, or by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, upon all claims presented to them, respectively, shall be admitted in evidence in all trials under this act—

Leaving out "when the person testifying is dead"—

so far as the subject-matter thereof is competent evidence; and the court shall give it such weight as, in its judgment, under all the circumstances, it ought to have.

This provides, unlike the bill I have read and all other bills which I have examined, that the testimony shall be sent to the court, but it puts in a restriction that it shall not be used except where the person giving the testimony is dead. All live witnesses, all witnesses that can be cross-examined, all vouchers and documents, all living persons are shut out by this provision, and I have not yet heard any defense of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GARLAND. The Senator from Delaware who has charge of this bill has been called from the Senate on account of the illness of one of his children. He desires to be here during the progress of the bill. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BOWEN. Will the Senator give way a moment? As I understand the condition now, there is the original bill before the Senate and the substitute offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. GARLAND. The pending question is on the amendment to section 3.

Mr. BOWEN. I wish to offer at this time a substitute for the original bill and for the one offered by the Senator from Michigan. I ask to have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Colorado will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. GARLAND. I renew my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 4, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. BISBEE. On last Friday I was paired with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] on the Fitz-John Porter bill. By inadvertence the pair was not reported to the Clerk. I ask that this statement shall be put in the RECORD. I would have voted "no," and Mr. JONES "ay."

Mr. HARDEMAN. On Friday I asked to be excused from voting on the Fitz-John Porter bill. I was denied the privilege, and then stated I should vote "ay." I am recorded as not voting. I ask that my name be recorded as having voted "ay."

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman vote?

Mr. HARDEMAN. Yes, sir; after my request to be excused from voting was not granted, I voted. I wish to be entered either as excused or as having voted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair on Friday did not understand whether the gentleman voted or not. He rose and made a statement.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I said then if I could not be excused I would vote "ay."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia states that he did vote and voted "ay." Is there objection to recording his vote?

There was no objection.

MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. CRISP. I rise to a question of privilege. My colleague from Georgia, Mr. HAMMOND, is in the House and desires to be sworn in.

Mr. N. J. HAMMOND appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1757 of the Revised Statutes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

On motion of Mr. VANCE, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House the petition of North Carolina Cherokee Indians, dated Tahlequah, December 1, 1881, for final settlement with the United States and for reimbursement of moneys for lands in North Carolina.

E. H. GEORGE AND H. W. WALKER.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to which was referred the following resolution—

"Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to E. H. George the sum of $125, and H. W. Walker the sum of $250, the said compensation being for services rendered in closing and opening new books in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms and preparing mileage reports for payment"— respectfully report that they have carefully considered the same, and ask its passage.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported by the Committee on Accounts.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DUNN. I ask unanimous consent to present and have printed in the RECORD a very short petition.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

COMMITTEE CHANGES AND ADDITIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces some additions to the committees authorized by resolutions of the House and some changes in committee assignments. The Chair desires to state that the changes have been made by request of the members affected by them.

On Rivers and Harbors, Mr. JOHN R. THOMAS, of Illinois, in place of Mr. JONATHAN CHACE, of Rhode Island.

On Foreign Affairs, Mr. W. W. EATON, of Connecticut, in place of Mr. GEORGE D. WISE, of Virginia.

On Naval Affairs, Mr. GEORGE D. WISE, of Virginia, in place of Mr. W. W. EATON, of Connecticut.

On District of Columbia, Mr. NICHOLAS E. WORTHINGTON, of Illinois, Mr. FRANCIS W. ROCKWELL, of Massachusetts.

On Education, Mr. FRANCIS W. ROCKWELL, of Massachusetts, in place of Mr. SETH L. MILLIKEN, of Maine.

On Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, Mr. JONATHAN CHACE, of Rhode Island, in place of Mr. JOHN R. THOMAS, of Illinois.

On Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, Mr. GEORGE R. DAVIS, of Illinois, in place of Mr. WILLIAM T. PRICE, of Wisconsin.

On Expenditures in the Department of Justice, Mr. CHARLES F. CRISP, of Georgia, Mr. SETH L. MILLIKEN, of Maine.

On the Select Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic, Mr. WILLIAM T. PRICE, of Wisconsin, in place of Mr. GEORGE R. DAVIS, of Illinois.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. HOUK. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," many of the States and Territories of the United States received grants of public lands "for the endowment and maintenance of at least one college, where the leading object shall be, without excluding scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life."

And whereas a number of institutions have availed themselves of the benefits of this fund and it is doubtful whether in some instances the true intent and purpose of this act of Congress is carried out by promoting or endeavoring to promote as the leading object "the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Education be specially charged with the duty of inquiring into the working and management of such institutions as may be using the fund so appropriated, and of reporting specifically in the case of each; also to recommend such measures as will secure to the industrial classes the benefits intended by such act.

Resolved, That said committee shall have full power to send for persons and papers and witnesses, and to exercise all other powers requisite to the making of a thorough investigation into the facts in each case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution just read?

Objection was made.

Mr. HOUK. I believe if the House will hear me for one moment the objection would be withdrawn. The adoption of this resolution can do no one any harm, and under it we can certainly ascertain whether this fund is properly used for the purposes for which it was appropriated. I have reason to believe that in some colleges it is not so used.

Mr. MONEY. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The call for the regular order is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. HOUK. Then I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Education.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred accordingly.

SMOKING IN THE HALL.

The SPEAKER. Complaint has been made to the Chair that there is smoking on the floor of the House. The Chair desires to call the attention of members to the rule, which will be read by the Clerk, and to state that he will instruct the officers of the House to see that it is rigidly enforced.

The Clerk read as follows:

While the Speaker is putting a question or addressing the House no member shall walk out of or across the Hall, nor, when a member is speaking, pass between him and the Chair; and during the session of the House no member shall wear his hat, or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause. (Rule XIV, clause 7.)

Mr. KASSON. I hope that rule will be enforced.

MARSHALS OF WEST VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives asking for complete lists of marshals and deputy marshals in West Virginia for 1882 and 1883, adopted January 21, 1884.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to have that communication referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. It is proposed to follow it up with some other resolutions which have been referred to that committee.

The SPEAKER. It will take that course; the Chair thinks that is the proper reference.

The communication was accordingly referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Deparment of Justice.

CONTINGENT FUND OF NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a detailed statement of the expenditures of the contingent fund for the Navy Department, &c., for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department.

BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, asking for a deficiency appropriation for the Bureau of Construction and Repair; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CONSULAR FEES, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a statement of fees collected, accounted for, and reported by the various diplomatic and consular officers of the United States during the fiscal year 1882–'83, together with a tariff of consular fees and a full list of consular offices; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, submitting papers and reports of Messrs. Marshall, Gilfillan, and Sibley, appointed December 22, 1882, to re-examine and ascertain the damages occurred to the Chippewa Indians residing upon Lake Winnebagoshish and Leech reservations, in Minnesota, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EMPLOYÉS OF STATE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting the names of all persons employed in his Department, and recommending no change in the clerks and other employés; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

NEW YORK SHIPPING COMMISSIONER.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Commerce. That committee, to which was referred a resolution of inquiry, instruct me to report the same back to the House and recommend that it be adopted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House what sum or sums have been paid into the Treasury by the shipping commissioner of the port of New York under the act of Congress passed June 7, 1872, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of shipping commissioners," &c.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. REAGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONEY. I renew the call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, this being Monday, the Chair will proceed to call the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for printing and reference to their appropriate committees. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and Territorial Legislatures are in order; also resolutions calling for executive information for reference to their appropriate committees.

LOUIS STALLINGS.

Mr. HERBERT also introduced a bill (H. R. 4389) for the relief of Louis Stallings; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, and ordered to be printed.

REFUND OF PUBLIC-LAND PAYMENTS.

Mr. HERBERT also introduced a bill (H. R. 4390) prescribing the proof to be made on applications for the refund of moneys paid for lands erroneously entered; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. OATES. The resolution which I send to the desk is submitted for reference to the Committee on Rules at the unanimous request of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

The resolution was read, as follows, and referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That subdivision 3 of Rule XI be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, to wit: "To the revision and codification of the statutes of the United States and to the amendment and revision of statutes which do not peculiarly appertain to the jurisdiction of other committees other than the Judiciary."

JURISDICTION OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. PEEL, of Arkansas, introduced a bill (H. R. 4391) to amend section 2, chapter 137, Statutes at Large, of an act entitled "An act to determine the jurisdiction of the circuit courts of the United States, and to regulate the removal of causes from State courts, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1875; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

RULES.

Mr. RANDALL. Under instruction from the Committee on the Rules, I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-sixth

Congress, as amended by this House, be the rules of the House of Representatives of the Forty-eighth Congress until further order of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this resolution, if adopted, will be to bring into force in this House the rules of the Forty-sixth Congress except as amended by the present House. This House has changed Rules X and XI by the creation of two committees, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Committee on Labor. This resolution also adopts the change made by increasing the membership of seven other committees of the House, the Committees on Banking and Currency, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Territories, Public Buildings and Grounds, and the District of Columbia.

One effect of the adoption of the resolution will be to change the eighth clause of Rule XVI, and to restore the rule as it was made in the Fortieth Congress and agreed to in the Forty-sixth Congress on the report of the Committee on Rules.

I ask that the Clerk will read the eighth clause of the sixteenth rule, showing the difference between it and the rule of the Forty-seventh Congress, and then that he will read the rule I send to the Clerk's desk to be incorporated in lieu of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

8. Pending a motion to suspend the rules, or on any question of consideration which may arise on a case involving the constitutional right to a seat, and pending the motion for the previous question, or after it shall have been ordered on any such case, the Speaker may entertain one motion to adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other motion till the vote is taken on the pending question; and pending the consideration of such case only a motion to adjourn or to take recess (but not both in succession) shall be in order; and such motions shall not be repeated without further intervening consideration of the case for at least one hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the Clerk to read now the rule we propose in lieu of what has been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pending a motion to suspend the rules the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House do now adjourn, but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion until the vote is taken on suspension.

Mr. RANDALL. That is the rule which was adopted originally in the Forty-fifth Congress, and reaffirmed in the Forty-sixth Congress on the report of the Committee on Rules, but which was changed in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. REED. I desire to offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

That clause 2 of Rule XXIV be amended so as to read as follows:

"2. On all days other than Monday, as soon as the Journal is read and approved, and on all Mondays (except the first and third in each month) after the call of States and Territories, there shall be a morning hour for reports of committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed and a copy thereof mailed by the Public Printer to each Member and Delegate: Provided, That during such morning hour it shall be in order to consider such bills as would otherwise go to or are already on the House Calendar, if the committee in charge when called shall so direct. The Speaker shall call each committee in regular order, and if the Speaker shall not get through the call of committees before the House passes to other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving preference to the measure last under consideration; but whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on one day it shall not be in order for such committee to report further until the other committees shall have been called in their turn."

That clause 4 be so amended as to read as follows:

"4. After one hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees, except on the second and fourth Mondays of each month, it shall be in order to proceed to business on the Speaker's table, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or to the House Calendar, motions therefor having priority in the order named. The morning hour shall continue until the House determines to go to other business."

That clause 5 be so amended as to read as follows:

"5. When the House proceeds to the Speaker's table the business shall be disposed of in the following order:

"First. Messages from the President and other executive communications.

"Second. Messages from the Senate and amendments proposed by the Senate to bills of the House.

"Third. Bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading, that they be referred to committees or put on their passage; and the motions so to refer shall have precedence of all motions touching their disposition.

"Fourth. Engrossed bills and bills from the Senate on their third reading."

That clause 6 be amended so as to read as follows:

"6. When a motion is made that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it shall be in order, pending that motion, if directed by a committee, to move to designate a bill to be first considered in the committee, which motion shall not be subject to amendment or debate, and only one designation shall be pending at a time. If no bill be designated, or, being designated, is disposed of in committee, it shall then consider first bills for raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other bills on its Calendar.

"7. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days."

Add to Rule XXIV the following clause:

"8. After the morning hour, on the second and fourth Mondays of each month, it shall be in order to consider legislation relating to the District of Columbia, unless dispensed with by a two-thirds vote of the House."

That there be added to Rule XXIV the following clause:

"9. Before the morning hour it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of unfinished business other than that in the morning hour or on the Speaker's table, and the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules."

Mr. REED. As the matter stands, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. REAGAN. Before the gentleman proceeds to argument, let me suggest whether it would not be better to let it lie over for to-day. Do not the rules require that?

Mr. RANDALL. I personally have no objection to having it go over.

Mr. KASSON. I wish I might connect with that proposition an order to have it printed with the original text. One part I understood, and the other needs careful consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. In that connection it is right for me to say the gentleman from Maine has the authority of the committee to offer this amendment, and at the same time it is also due I should say the majority do not approve of its adoption.

I am content, however, to allow the report to go over and to be printed, because I consider that to be only a reasonable request. But in connection therewith there is this point which I wish to arrange with gentlemen on the other side; that in consequence of its remaining over, instead of being acted upon at once, there shall be no advantage taken of the Chair by the suggestion that we are acting under no rules at the present time.

Mr. REED. That you may rely upon.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I have no objection whatever to its going over, and as I am compelled to be absent to-morrow, I should like to have it go over until Wednesday next, if it meets the wishes of gentlemen.

Mr. REED. That, of course, would not be objected to.

With the consent of the House I will now make the remarks which I desire to make explanatory of the amendment I have offered, in order that they may also appear in the RECORD in connection with the report of the committee and the proposed amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I will, after the gentleman from Maine has concluded, state my views, or rather the views of the majority of the committee, so that all of them may appear together.

Mr. CALKINS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if the understanding suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania be adopted, the Chair will continue to administer the rules of the House as they have been heretofore administered until this matter is disposed of.

Mr. KASSON. The Chair will have unanimous consent in that regard.

Mr. BUDD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to send to the desk and have read a proposed amendment which I desire to offer to the rules?

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection whatever to the reading of the proposed amendment. Then it will be in order for the House by voting down the previous question, which I shall in due time ask, to let in all such amendments.

Mr. BUDD. I desire now to offer an amendment to Rule XXIV, so that it may go into the RECORD with the report of the committee and the other proposed amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. Let it be read for the information of the House, and that will take it into the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that it is presented to be read now for information only.

Mr. RANDALL. I have yielded for that purpose.

Mr. KEIFER Only for information, but not to be considered as pending.

Mr. BUDD. I desire to offer it as a pending amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. I object to that.

Mr. BUDD. Let it then go into the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no authority from the Committee on Rules to permit the introduction of any other amendments.

Mr. BUDD. Well, then, I offer it to be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV additional clause as follows:

"When any public bill or resolution shall have been referred to a committee, and the committee shall fail or refuse to report said bill or resolution back to the House of Representatives, either favorably or unfavorably, for thirty days, it shall be in order for the member who offered the bill or resolution, on any Monday, immediately after the morning hour, to move to discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill or resolution, and the House shall then dispose of the bill or resolution by recommittal or by final action, such as a majority of the House may determine."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine is recognized.

Mr. RANDALL. It has been suggested around me that the debate on this subject might also go over.

Mr. REED. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that as a matter of course the report as read and the pending amendment, without an explanation, would give the House very little idea of their purport and importance.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman had better go on, then, with his argument.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to explain what this amendment means. I have no doubt that the importance of the subject on which I shall now address the House will give me a hearing, because on the decision of the House upon the amendment which I have presented depends the conduct of the business of a great nation. We are authorized by the Constitution of the United States to make rules, not for the hinderance of business, but for the transaction of the business of this House and of the country. The rules which the majority purpose to adopt are substantially the rules of the preceding House, with the omission of the clause in regard to dilatory motions attending the consideration of contested-election cases. Under the clause relating to election cases we were enabled to prevent filibustering on the consideration of the question of the right of a member to a seat upon this floor. The committee now propose to annul that rule and go back to the old system.

I have not, Mr. Speaker, the slightest objection to that, because the effect, in my judgment, will be the same. With a Republican minority, there will be no necessity of preventing filibustering in the consideration of election cases; and I sincerely believe that in the future, having learned from the past, there will be no need of it even if we should have that happy result which I hope for in the next Congress, a Democratic minority much smaller than we have ever had before. [Laughter.]

Now the amendment which I propose, in order to be understood, must be taken in connection with a description of the present system of rules. Under the present system, when a bill is presented here in the House it goes, as a matter of course, to its appropriate committee. When it comes out of that committee it goes upon one of three calendars: first, the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, if it be a bill appropriating money; or, second, it goes to the Private Calendar, and is considered in Committee of the Whole on Friday; or, if it is a bill of a public nature and does not appropriate money, it goes to what is called the House Calendar. The principle of our present rules is that every question shall be taken up in the order in which it finds itself upon the calendars, and if the House were to transact all its business, and act upon every bill so reported, that system would be perfection itself, because it would only be a question of time as to when any measure would be acted upon.

But, unfortunately, Congress does not do all its business. It does not do even 10 per cent., I think I may safely say that it does not do 8 per cent., of its business. Now, if Congress does not do but 8 per cent. of its business, the question is which 8 per cent. shall it do? In other words, how shall the selection be made? Your present system says that it shall be made by considering whether it is first on one of these calendars or not. Now, do you not see that the effect is to confine the business of this House to those cases which get earliest on the calendars. And what kind of cases are those? Are they cases which demand consideration? Are they cases which require deliberation? Not at all. On the contrary, they are cases which require the least deliberation and which are of the least importance to the country.

That is the immovable system on which you have to do your business. What is the effect of it? Why, when a man finds that his bill is on the third page of the Calendar, he just gives it all up; and he has resort to an entirely different system. What is that system? Why, it is the system of asking unanimous consent. You will say, "Is not that a good system? If a bill can be passed that does not have any objector to it, is not that a good bill to pass?" Well, now, that sounds well. But what is the effect of it? The effect is that the responsibility is thrown upon one man, and he has to incur the personal odium of objecting to a bill under circumstances that do not quite justify it.

I hear a bill read and it occurs to me that it is not a proper bill; but I have not any special information on the subject, and while I am considering whether I will incur the enmity of my fellow-member by objecting to that bill, and on grounds that may turn out to be utterly insufficient on examination, I hear the voice of the Speaker sounding through the Hall: "No objection is heard," and away goes the bill. One-half at least of the bills for public buildings of the last session of Congress were passed in that way; and it is a most vicious and pernicious system of legislation.

I tell you if you dam up waters they have got to go over the top of the dam. If you obstruct the public business some of it is going to be done; and it is to depend not on the justice of the measure but the impudence of the member. It is merely a question whether he can worry the Speaker into a recognition. And he is going to take that time to demand recognition when the man is outside of the Hall of the House who is opposed to his bill. Why, sir, the regular programme of procedure is to station men in different parts of the House and rush at the man who evinces any disposition to oppose the bill that is up; and before the House knows what has happened the bill is through.

I say this system of legislation is vicious in the extreme, and the effect of it on the Speaker is certainly to destroy all peace of mind he can possibly have toward the end of a session. He is simply torn in pieces by the requests and demands of members, each one of whom is looking after his own interests and is regardless of the interest of everybody else.

There is but one other way of doing business; and that is also dependent upon the recognition of the Speaker. You must get a suspension of the rules under a two-thirds vote of the House. Now, I say to you gentlemen that the object of Congress is to do the business of the country. That is what we come here for. That is what we are paid for. In this country the business of every legislative body is done and ought to be done by its majority. If it is a bad majority, they take the consequences of their action. And the people are our final governors.

Some men may say that if a majority have the control of the House there will be bad bills passed. I do not doubt it. And I tell you that is one of the risks of the republican form of government, that the people and their representatives may occasionally do wrong; but it is worth while to do the business of the country in the proper way and under the guidance of the majority.

What is the system which I propose and to the explanation of which I desire to have the attention of the House? It is in no respect a novelty. It is the old system that prevailed here before I was a member of Congress, a system, however, somewhat curbed and controlled, because the whole business is placed in charge of the appropriate committees of the House.

I propose first that we shall have a morning hour, and that that morning hour may last all day, if the House choose, and sixty minutes whether the House chooses it or not. During that morning hour any committee may report bills until it gets through, and demand present consideration of them; but with this limitation, that if they have taken up one day in reporting bills they may go on and finish the bill under consideration, but after that the next committee shall have its chance. I am bound to say to you that this will not afford the House a great deal of relief; but it will afford it the relief of steady, systematic work, and every man knows how much can be done if a little is done every day.

Mr. BLAND. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REED. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAND. Is that the rule we had formerly, before the adoption of the new rules?

Mr. REED. That was the former rule before the codification. Originally it was held that the morning hour could extend over the whole day, but the late Speaker of the House, Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, when he came to the chair, held that that hour was strictly limited to sixty minutes; and then, as I am informed—I speak only from information—the choke in the business began. The House was not allowed to get out of the cast-iron tube of sixty minutes in diameter into which it was got by that rule. I do not enter any question whether that ruling was correct or not. I speak of it simply as a historical fact.

The next difficulty is this: When you come to consider business on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, except appropriation bills, which have the right of way, what is your condition? If you want to get at a bill which is on the second page of the Calendar, you must in the first place object to the first bill on that Calendar. Then the chairman of the Committee of the Whole goes out of the committee, the Speaker takes his place, and the question is put to a vote of the House whether it will consider that bill or not to which objection was made. The vote is taken, and then the chairman goes back into committee, and if the House has refused to consider that first bill, the second bill is called up and you object to that. Out goes the chairman again, in comes the Speaker, and there is another vote by the House. Then out goes the Speaker, in comes the chairman, and the third bill is reached and you object to that. Out goes the chairman, in comes the Speaker, and there is another vote of the House; out goes the Speaker, in comes the chairman, and so you go on. That is perfect child's play. You can not in a day's time in that way get over two pages of the Calendar to save your life.

In other words, when a bill is on the third page of the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole there is no way of getting at it except by unanimous consent, and that is a one-man power, for any one man can object and stop it. Now, occasionally the one-man power is a good thing. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is an admirable illustration of the virtues and, in some cases, I think, of the vices of the one-man power. [Laughter.] He sometimes stops a very bad thing, and sometimes he stops a very good thing. I do not know that I can say exactly where the balance is.

The proposition that I make is that any committee of this House may come into the House and have a vote on the consideration of any proposition that they may indicate. That gives everybody notice of what is going on. The committeemen on both sides will notify their fellow-members of the House of what the committee proposes to do. In that way any committee may come in and propose to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and take up for consideration a particular bill. If a majority of the House shall vote to consider it, then it will be considered.

I know what that will result in; it will result in the consideration and passage of a great many bills I do not believe in. But the question is not what I believe in, but what a majority of this House, elected by the people, may believe in. If you gentlemen on the other side are willing to do any wrong things, I am willing to risk your punishment by your superiors, the people. And if my side was in the majority and was willing to do wrong, I should be willing to risk my punishment by my superiors.

My next proposition is that the House may proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table when the House wishes, with the same limitation as now.

There are many limitations in my propositions which I have made to accommodate myself to the views of other gentlemen as well as my own. Under these limitations we will be enabled to go to all the calendars, whereby we can transact public business and take up such bills as the majority of the House are willing to take up. I proposed these rules in the last Congress, and members on my side of the House were willing to adopt them. But gentlemen on the other side, fearing that there was some partnership in it, were unwilling to adopt them, and by declining to vote, as we had a very small majority here, they kept us from adopting them. We never could get a quorum here except for those non-partisan judicial performances which are called election cases. [Laughter.]

I now offer these propositions to a Democratic House in the same good faith in which I offered them to a Republican House, because I believe in the government of the people, and I am not afraid of the government of the people through their representatives. There are times, and I see the examples in front of me now, when I think the people make dreadful mistakes [great laughter]; but I believe they can be rectified by allowing men to act out the wishes which the people set in motion. If the people do foolish things and suffer the consequences of them, they will not be likely to repeat their foolishness.

There in small compass is the whole business so far as it involves change of system. I propose also by one of my amendments to give two days for the Committee on the District of Columbia, to enable them to transact their business. For my part I think it is due to them, under all the circumstances, that they should have that privilege.

There is one other change which I propose, which is to give unfinished business precedence, the same that it had before; and that any parliamentarian will see is the natural, necessary, and proper change to be made if the other changes are also made.

I sincerely hope that all party feeling on this question may be put aside, and that gentlemen will vote upon it with reference to their duty toward the House. You can at once perceive that I can have no partisan motive on this subject, that no partisan question can arise in my mind about it, because I submit the proposition to a House which is overwhelmingly Democratic.

Mr. RANDALL. The method of transacting business proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] will be recognized by all who were members of the last House as substantially the same as was then pending, and which the minority of that House prevented the consideration of. In renewing it now the gentleman from Maine exhibits his consistency and establishes his sincerity; and the majority of the Committee on Rules, so far as they can, establish the judgment of what was then the minority of the House.

I do not wish to discuss this question in the light of any partisan advantage. I argue that the proposition of the gentleman from Maine will establish and extend the old rule. He is in error when he states that I first held that the hour for morning business meant sixty minutes. Before I became Speaker of this House that dial was placed in front of the Clerk's desk so that members might be able to see when the sixty minutes of the morning hour were up. When I was called upon to decide upon that point, I gave what I conceived to be a common-sense construction of the rule. If an hour was three hours, if an hour was one hundred and eighty minutes, the rules ought to say so; and when the rule said an hour, I held it absolutely meant sixty minutes.

The proposition of the gentleman from Maine enables this House to inject, out of order, into the morning hour, whether it be limited to sixty or one hundred and eighty minutes, a bill which may block the business of that hour, as we have seen under the old rule, for days and weeks—yes, for months. When the Committee on Rules proposed this change in the Forty-sixth Congress, they submitted a report from which I ask the Clerk to read an extract, as it bears upon the proposition now immediately under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

> In the revision submitted by the committee it is proposed to have a daily call of all the committees, all business reported, save that to which no objection is made to its "present consideration," to go to the Committee of the Whole House, whether public or private, and to a House calendar composed only of bills not making appropriations of money.
> This plan secures two desirable objects, viz:
>
> First. The printing of all bills and accompanying reports, thus giving time for their examination by members before consideration; and
> Second. Saves unnecessary waste of time in preventing, by what is known as "filibustering" in the morning hour, the consideration of a bill reported by a committee, thus blocking the way against reports from other committees to which little or no objection would be made.
> Numerous instances might be cited, during the past few years, where the "morning hour" has been consumed by dilatory motions for days and even weeks, thus making it possible at the close of the session to defeat action on an important bill, which could only be reported by unanimous consent or by a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote, which vote might not be obtained.

Mr. RANDALL. That was not a partisan report. We reported it with unanimity, the committee being composed of three of the then majority in this House, and two of the minority. It enabled every bill to have consideration in its order, and did not permit a bill to be placed, by a majority of the House, ahead of any other bill. But it granted to the House the power, at any and all times, to reach a bill when a majority of this House so desired, but to do so in an orderly and just way, so that every bill, when its title was read, could have the opportunity of being then considered. It did not allow a bill to be displaced improperly by momentary pressure, the momentum, perhaps, of immense sums of appropriation.

How has that rule worked? I can not better illustrate this than by saying to the House that three times this session we have been upon the House Calendar. We have also been in Committee of the Whole upon the Private Calendar and in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. This rule has allowed the reaching of bills on the Private Calendar on Friday. True, we have not considered many bills on that Calendar; but all of us understand the reason.

Mr. CALKINS. My friend knows that we have not in Committee of the Whole considered a single general appropriation bill; and it is those that choke up other business.

Mr. RANDALL. That is no fault of mine, as the gentleman well understands.

Mr. CALKINS. I am only stating the reason why we have gone to the Calendar so often; it is because we have had no general appropriation bill before the House.

Mr. REED. How many times did we go there in the last Congress?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not remember. The last session was a short session, and in all short sessions——

Mr. REED. How many times during the last Congress? I did not confine my inquiry to the last session. We did not go to the general Calendar but twice during the whole of the last Congress, and then we disposed of a couple of unimportant bills.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman well understands that at the short session of Congress the general appropriation bills necessarily take up a large portion of time——

Mr. REED. I applied my inquiry to the whole Congress.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will be quiet I will answer him.

Mr. REED. I want you to understand me, that is all.

Mr. RANDALL. At the last session the appropriation bills and the tariff bill took up practically the whole session to the exclusion of everything else. I am not able to answer distinctly how often we went to the Calendars in the last Congress, but I will endeavor to learn and apprise the gentleman. But it was not the fault of the rules that we did not go there oftener; it was because a majority of the House did not want to go there, the reasons for which are perhaps as well understood by the gentleman as they would be if I should go into any lengthy explanation.

Now, the gentleman says that the Speaker is going to be "crushed" at the end of the session unless he is relieved in the manner proposed in the gentleman's amendment. In reply to that suggestion I will only say that the Speaker does not seem to fear that "crushing," for he unites cordially in recommending that this amendment shall not be adopted.

Mr. REED. He will feel differently toward the end of the session.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, as to the business of the District of Columbia the gentleman has thrown out a thought which may engage the attention of members of the District Committee. There is no controversy whatever in the Committee on Rules as to the days and the number of days that this committee shall have; and whether the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine be adopted or not, the Committee on Rules will report (I think with unanimity) that the Committee on the District of Columbia be allowed two days in each month. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine changes the order of the unfinished business. It really creates two classes of unfinished business, which in my judgment, to say the least, is confusing.

This much I wish to say in quick reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Maine in favor of the amendment which he has proposed, so that my objections, such as they are, should go out in connection with this proposition, together with the facts he has indicated as prompting him in urging the adoption of his amendment. As a minority member at the last session of Congress I was entirely opposed to his proposition when it was then offered. I thought then it was a change of the rule which would be dangerous and might lead us in an unfortunate direction. Reflection and experience since then have only confirmed me in the judgment at which I then arrived. I may say, too, that the minority of the Committee on Rules, then opposed to reporting the gentleman's proposition, have in this Congress become the majority and control the action of the Committee on Rules, and now sustain me in making the report on their behalf to the House in favor of the rule which I have had read at the Clerk's desk, and in opposition to the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maine.

I will now demand the previous question.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment, so that it may be printed for information?

Mr. REAGAN. I thought it was the general understanding that this subject was to go over.

Mr. RANDALL. In demanding the previous question on the report of the committee I am only acting in obedience to what I believe to be the instruction of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REAGAN. It seems to me that these rules ought to be discussed fully, so that they may be modified wherever they shall be found defective.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have an amendment to offer, and I ask the gentleman to yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to hear amendments any gentleman may desire to submit. I do not object to their being offered for information of the House and ordered to be printed in the RECORD. If the House then, after fully considering them, shall not want the previous question ordered, the majority can refuse to do so. The House can then vote down the previous question and allow the fullest consideration and discussion of every amendment which any gentleman may desire to offer.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state whether he accepted the proposition that this subject should go over for one or two days?

Mr. RANDALL. I did; long ago.

Mr. KEIFER. Then I suggest that it go over at this point, without further debate, in pursuance of the agreement entered into by unanimous consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. To what time?

Mr. RANDALL. I said I would consent to the subject going over after there had been some explanation.

Mr. REAGAN. I think it would be as well to let the matter go over without the previous question, because we may want some modification of other rules. I think the whole subject should be thrown open to discussion.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not ask that the previous question shall be ordered at this time, but I merely want my demand for the previous question pending. I do not wish to take away from gentlemen the opportunity to offer amendments so that they may be printed for information in the RECORD.

Mr. REAGAN. Will that not preclude us necessarily from the opportunity of expressing our views generally and suggesting such amendments as we may deem to be proper?

Mr. RANDALL. It is altogether foreign to my purpose—foreign to any motive I had in connection with the subject—exactly opposite to what I want to do. I want the fullest discussion and the widest opportunity given to the House in connection with its rules, to afford every opportunity to change them as the majority of the House may deem best.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman permit me to offer an amendment, so that it may be printed?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly. I merely wish to suggest to the House and to the Chair that by demanding the previous question I merely desire to retain control over the report of the Committee on Rules which I have had the honor to submit.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair supposes, the whole matter was to lie over, but the day to which it was to lie over was not indicated.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not agree with some gentlemen that under the rules this report might lie over. I am inclined to believe, as has been heretofore decided on a report coming from the Committee on Rules, that no right of objection, compelling the report to lie over for one day, exists on the part of any member.

Mr. REAGAN. As I understand, the gentleman from Pennsylvania agreed that this report should go over for a day or two, so it might be fully considered. To meet his convenience, as I understand, it was agreed that it should go over to Wednesday next.

Mr. RANDALL. I still agree to that.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the agreement touching the going over of this could not be so changed that instead of being taken up on Wednesday it should be taken up on Thursday. My reason for this suggestion is that this morning I introduced a very important proposition, which was referred to the Committee on Rules, and on Wednesday next I am likely to be absent, and Thursday will suit me better.

Mr. RANDALL. As the absence of rules is not to be taken advantage of by anybody I am willing to let it go over to Thursday.

Mr. KASSON. That was agreed to unanimously on both sides this morning.

Mr. RANDALL. I am content to leave it for consideration until Thursday next, if that is the wish of the House.

Mr. KASSON. I shall be very much obliged personally for the delay, because of necessary absence on Wednesday, and also because of the measure to which I have referred.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want it to come up to-morrow, for the reason, as I have said, that I must be necessarily absent, and am willing to extend the same courtesy to others.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to its going over until any day this week.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow an amendment to be offered now?

Mr. RANDALL. I will first hear the question of the gentleman from Kentucky who first addressed me.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. On the 7th day of January last I offered an amendment to Rule XXIV, which appears in the RECORD of January 8. It was referred to the Committee on Rules, and as I understand they have never acted upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I was not instructed by the committee to make any report upon that subject.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I know it; but I wanted information——

Mr. RANDALL. I am not at liberty to say when the Committee on the Rules will be prepared to report upon the matter; nor do I admit the statement of the gentleman to be entirely correct that they have as yet failed to consider the subject.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. There is no report to show. There is no evidence of any action on the part of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no authority from the committee to inform the gentleman as to the status of the matter.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. My principal object, however, in rising at this time was to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania in charge of this report if he has any objection to having this amendment printed in the RECORD, together with the report of the committee, for information, in order that it may come before the House at the same time the report of the committee is to be acted upon.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I now desire, with the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to offer an amendment to be read.

The SPEAKER. It can only be read for information at this time.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I desire to have it read for information now, but hope to get action upon it when the report of the committee is before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to have it read for information and printing in the RECORD.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I ask that the amendment which I have already offered be read also for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV additional clause as follows:

"When any public bill or resolution shall have been referred to a committee, and the committee shall fail or refuse to report said bill or resolution back to the House of Representatives, either favorably or unfavorably, for thirty days, it shall be in order for the member who offered the bill or resolution, on any Monday, immediately after the morning hour, to move to discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill or resolution, and the House shall then dispose of the bill or resolution by recommittal or by final action, such as a majority of the House may determine."

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have offered an amendment which I desire to have read.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule X by inserting after the line "on Revision of the Laws, to consist of eleven members," the following, to wit:

"On Political Rights of Women, to consist of eleven members."

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I hope, Mr. Speaker, when this matter is brought before the House for consideration the gentleman from Pennsylvania will consent to give us a vote upon the amendment which I have offered, an amendment which affects the rights of every member, and without which seven men on any committee can prevent the action of a majority of the House by refusing to report back a bill. I have offered this amendment at every session for the last five sessions, and it has been referred to the Committee on Rules and they have failed to make any report, thereby showing the necessity of this rule, for a majority of the committee have prevented a vote on this important amendment, asserting the right of a majority of this House to control instead of a committee.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I am a mere creature of the House obeying the instructions of the committee. All that is necessary for the House to do to obtain a vote upon that proposition, if it desires it, is to vote down the previous question. I am not, however, instructed by the Committee on Rules to permit a vote on the amendment.

I will now hear the question of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to ask my friend from Pennsylvania a question. It will be recollected that when the rules of the last House were adopted we had in this House a lengthy discussion on that subject. I wish to know now whether we are about to adopt rules for our guidance and government on a report from the Committee on Rules, who propose to place a yoke on our necks, without allowing us who are not members of that select oligarchy an opportunity of discussing that question at some length?

Mr. RANDALL. The very great liberality which I have shown in allowing every amendment to be read and printed so as to give to each member an opportunity of reflecting upon these different propositions is a full answer to the inquiry of the gentleman that the Committee on Rules does not propose the kind of yoke he refers to.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire that there shall be three to four hours allowed for the discussion of this matter.

The SPEAKER. The matter is only open at present for the presentation of amendments.

Mr. ANDERSON. I submit the following amendment, which I desire to have printed in the RECORD.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIV be amended by adding the following words:

"Provided, That an ex-member of Congress, on and after the fifth day from his first admission to the floor of the House, shall only be admitted thereto during the remainder of that Congress by an order of the Speaker; nor shall the Speaker issue said order until such ex-member shall have certified upon his honor as a man that he is not personally, pecuniarily, or professionally interested, either directly or indirectly, in the passage or defeat of any claim, bill, or other measure pending before Congress or any of its committees; that he is not, either personally or professionally, in the employ, service, or interest, either directly or indirectly, of any railroad, telegraph, or other company, corporation, person, or combination of corporations or persons having a pecuniary interest in the passage or defeat of any claim, bill, or measure pending before Congress or its committees; and pledging his word that, while the House is in session, he will in no way communicate with a member thereof respecting any claim, bill, measure, or action which may affect the welfare of any railroad, telegraph, or other company, corporation, person, or combination of corporations or persons having an interest in legislation pending before Congress. The Committee on Rules, upon ascertainment of any violation of this proviso, shall immediately declare the offender forever deprived of the privilege of the floor as an ex-member of Congress."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in reference to this proposition that the committee have recognized fully the fact that there is an abuse existing in relation to this privilege extended to ex-members. They have not proceeded in it far enough to be able to make a recommendation thereon to this House so as to cut in between the case of ex-members who come here in the interest of legislation and those who come here from higher motives or for purposes of pleasure.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman allow me this question: whether the Committee on Rules will probably be able to recommend some action which will meet both sides of this question? If so, I do not care to press this.

Mr. RANDALL. I would rather the gentleman should press it. Let the House have the fullest opportunity of reflection upon the subject. We all who have been here for many years realize the great advantage that comes to legislation by reason of exclusion from the floor of all persons who have no legitimate right to claim that privilege.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. It will be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the rules:

"That the second and fourth Mondays in each month, after the morning hour, shall be devoted to the consideration of reports of committees in relation to the business of the District of Columbia and of the Territories of the United States, not to include propositions for the admission of new States."

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I send to the desk an amendment to Rule XI, so that bills relating to the improvement of the Mississippi River, as well as bills relating to levees, may be referred to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman from Missouri will tell me his object, and the effect of his proposition, I may be able to say whether the Committee on Rules have had his amendment under consideration.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. The object is this: The House will remember when this question was presented, on the reference of a bill making a million-dollar appropriation, to one of two committees, the main argument used in this House was that under the rules the only bills properly referable to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River were measures relating to levees exclusively. It was argued that the rules did not permit any broader reference than that. Now, beyond that, independent of any question about the reference of an appropriation bill—I have no intent in this indirect way to bring that question here—I do think the rules should be intelligible; that is, they should plainly show what can properly go to one committee and what to another. And unless you amend that portion of the rule, strictly speaking, no bill can go to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River, except bills relating to levees.

Mr. RANDALL. I will answer the gentleman from Missouri by saying that while the individual members of the Committee on Rules did not commit themselves except as they have heretofore done on a yea-and-nay vote in the House on the proposition referred to by the gentleman from Missouri, and hence make no recommendation with reference to it, yet they could not shut their eyes to the fact that the House had delivered its judgment in relation to this matter, and they considered themselves, in consequence of that vote, somewhat restricted in relation thereto.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. Those amendments, as I understand, are being read merely for information?

The SPEAKER. They are read for information and to be printed in the RECORD with the report of the committee.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, as follows:

Amend section 22, Rule XI, so as to read:

"To the improvement of the Mississippi River, its levees and tributaries, to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. I also ask the Clerk to read another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XIV by striking out, wherever they occur, in rules relating to time allowed for debate, the words "one hour" and inserting "thirty minutes."

Mr. KASSON. In view of the situation in which the amendment of the rules is now placed, I ask consent that the resolution for the amendment of Rule XXI which I submitted this morning, and which was referred to the Committee on Rules, may be printed with the others, that it may be considered when the other amendments are pending.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be so considered.

The amendment proposed by Mr. KASSON is as follows:

Resolved, That the third paragraph of Rule XXI be amended by striking out all after the word "progress," in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "not including propositions for increase of salaries: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the recommendation of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the amendment proposed, the same being germane to the clause of the bill affected thereby."

Mr. COX, of New York. I submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee to ascertain the results of the Tenth Census be appointed, to have the same number of members, duties, privileges, and power as the committee of the same name had in the last Congress; and that said committee be authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE —. There shall be appointed by the Speaker at the beginning of each Congress a committee, consisting of fifteen members, eight members from the party in control of the organization and seven members from the opposition, to be known as the Executive Committee of the House of Representatives. It shall be the duty of said committee to consider all bills which may be reported favorably from any other of the standing committees of the House, and to determine which of said bills shall have preference in being brought before the House for consideration. In the order of such preference such bills shall be reported to the House without amendment, and placed upon a calendar to be known as the Executive Calendar. And it shall be in order at any time after the reading of the Journal and expiration of the morning hour for the chairman of such Executive Committee, or any member thereof, when acting under the instruction of said committee, to call up any bill upon the said Executive Calendar for consideration. If his said motion be sustained by a majority vote of a quorum present the bill shall be considered under consideration. The said Executive Committee shall fix the time to be allowed for debate upon each bill so reported, and such time shall not be extended except by a majority vote of a quorum present. At the expiration of said time so fixed or extended a vote shall be taken upon the question without further debate. Nothing in this rule shall prevent the offer of amendments to the bill when under consideration, or to interfere with the preference already given to the consideration of appropriation or revenue bills, or to prevent the consideration of any of the other calendars of the House whenever the House may so direct.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with the understanding the consideration of the report of the Committee on Rules will be postponed until Thursday next, and, together with the pending amendments and the amendments which have been read for information, will be printed in the RECORD.

JUDGE SAMUEL B. AXTELL.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a question of privilege. I present the memorial of Richard W. Webb, a citizen of the Territory of New Mexico; and also a resolution, which I ask the Clerk to read.

Mr. KEIFER. Subject to the privilege of raising the question whether it be a matter of privilege or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. It relates to the impeachment of a judge in the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. KEIFER. Is this in order now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes if the resolution relates to the impeachment of a public officer, or to the institution of an investigation for the purpose of such impeachment, it would be a matter of privilege.

Mr. KEIFER. A resolution of inquiry could go in under the call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what the resolution is until it is read.

Mr. SPRINGER. The petition is very short, occupying just one page, and it explains the resolution itself. Let the petition be read first.

The SPEAKER. The question as to whether it is a matter of privilege is reserved.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the Clerk read the petition first. It will disclose the facts.

Mr. KASSON. The petition is not a matter of privilege, while the resolution may be.

Mr. SPRINGER. The petition is referred to in the resolution and is a part of it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the petition of Richard W. Webb and accompanying statement of charges against Samuel B. Axtell, chief-justice of the supreme court of the Territory of New Mexico and judge of the first judicial district thereof, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and printed, and that the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and ascertain whether the allegations contained in the foregoing charges and specifications are true, and whether the conduct of the said chief-justice or judge has been such as to render him unfit to discharge the duties of the office of chief-justice or judge, as aforesaid, and report thereon to the House such action, to be taken by impeachment or otherwise, as they may advise; and in making such examination and investigation the said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KASSON. That is clearly not such a question as entitles the memorial to present consideration. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois my only ground of objection is that one person who may or may not be responsible might in this way spread before the whole country charges which have not been examined by any committee, and of which we have no evidence or authentic information. I think the gentleman from Illinois must himself see the propriety of this going to the committee. For that reason I must object to the memorial being read, but I do not object to the memorial and resolution going to the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow the memorial to be read? It is very short and will explain the full purpose of the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I have just given the reasons why we ought to object to that on principle. I do not object to the resolution being received and referred to a committee; but I make the point of order that it is not in order to read the memorial at this time.

The SPEAKER. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to ask for the reading of the charges or for the reading of the petition asking for an investigation?

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the reading of the memorial, which is very short, only one page of manuscript, and that will explain the matter more fully.

Mr. KASSON. I submit to the Chair that this is simply a resolution of inquiry, with an accompanying paper, and as such, under our custom and rules, ought to go to a committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. It simply instructs the committee to inquire into the "foregoing charges and specifications."

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman why he can not be content to let the resolution go to the Committee on the Judiciary in the first instance, and then the committee can report it back to the House for adoption if they deem it proper to do so?

Mr. KASSON. That is all that the House can be prepared to act upon at this time. I have no objection to the resolution being referred to the committee, and the committee can then make the inquiry.

Mr. SPRINGER. The resolution itself is a reference of the matter to a committee; let the resolution be adopted.

Mr. KASSON. It is a serious thing to put any kind of sanction by this House to a charge against a public officer, of which I have said I myself never have heard anything. I hope the resolution will be referred to the committee.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask to have the memorial read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] claims that this is a matter of privilege. No charges, so far as the Chair knows, have been made on the floor of the House, and no charges have been read against this officer. As the Chair understands it, the gentleman from Illinois does not ask that the charges be read, but that the memorial asking for an investigation be read. The doubt which the Chair has about the matter——

Mr. SPRINGER. The memorial itself states the charges, if the Chair will have it read. I have asked that the memorial be read as a part of the resolution, and the House can not act intelligently upon the resolution until the memorial has been read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that having looked at the memorial he finds that it does contain charges against a judge of the United States court in the Territory of New Mexico. Upon that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] offers a resolution that the memorial and charges be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation. The question is made that this is not a matter of privilege. Of course the Chair is somewhat familiar with rulings made upon similar questions heretofore, but is willing to hear gentlemen on the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think that gentlemen on the other side will understand the question much better if they will allow the memorial to be read.

The SPEAKER. A paper not to be acted upon by the House can not be read except by unanimous consent. The gentleman offers a resolution and then asks that another paper be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask that the memorial be read as a part of my remarks. It is really a part of the resolution itself, and the resolution is without any meaning unless the memorial is read.

Mr. KASSON. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] I will say that no remarks are now in order except by unanimous consent, unless this is a question of privilege. If it is in the first instance a question of privilege, then we may discuss it, and the gentleman if he chose to do so might have the memorial read as a part of his remarks.

The point I make is that this is not a question of privilege, for it is not a resolution of impeachment, but simply a resolution instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into a certain thing. But that resolution itself is not in order at this time.

I only wish to add further, that I do not desire to make any objection to referring the whole subject to a committee; it ought to go there if it has the sanction of one member of this House. What I object to is that it is not in the form of a question of privilege, and no remarks upon the subject are now in order. I do not object to the whole thing being referred to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The doubt which the Chair entertains on the subject arises from the fact that the resolution itself does not make any charges or recite any charges or direct an impeachment. It simply proposes to refer a memorial to a committee with instructions to examine into charges which it is assumed are contained in the memorial. The Chair would like to hear the opinions of gentlemen upon this question, because its proper decision may be of importance hereafter.

Mr. RANDALL. If the resolution is in the nature of an impeachment it is a question of privilege, although the rules do not make mention of that as one of the privileged subjects. Neither do the rules recognize the report of the Committee on Elections as a privileged subject. Yet both impeachments and the right of a member to a seat here are constitutional questions which rise above the rules of the House.

The gentleman from Illinois who introduced this resolution ought to tell us, so that we can vote understandingly, whether it is a resolution of impeachment or not.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have stated to the House that the memorial which accompanies the resolution, and to which the resolution refers, does state that this judge has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. It specifies them in detail to the number of eight or ten, and specifications accompany them, with the names of witnesses upon whom the petitioner relies to prove every one of the charges. I ask that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that that committee have authority to send for persons and papers to ascertain the truth of the statements contained in the memorial.

The charges are specific, and the names of the witnesses relied upon to make good the charges are given.

Mr. RANDALL. Then this is a step in the direction of impeachment.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is an allegation that this judge is guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors. The charges are set forth in plain language and in a comprehensive manner. I ask this House to investigate them.

I will state to gentlemen on the other side that I have some knowledge myself of the condition of affairs in the Territory of New Mexico, as I was there upon a visit during the last summer. I know the gentleman who presents this petition. He is a reputable, honorable citizen, and a member of your own political party. He is backed by almost the entire bar of the Territory, as gentlemen will see by examining the names accompanying this paper. There is an almost general demand from the bar and the citizens of New Mexico that this investigation shall be made. I hope that gentlemen on the other side, in the interest of the pure administration of justice, will withdraw all opposition and allow this matter to go where it belongs, to the Committee on the Judiciary for investigation.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to answer that by the simple statement that there is no question of "sides" here at all. The point of order is made on the gentleman's resolution. He does not himself propose an impeachment. This is a resolution of inquiry, directing a committee to inquire into the matter. I have repeatedly stated that there will be no objection to the committee taking jurisdiction of the subject-matter if, as the gentleman from Illinois says, this memorial is a respectful one. The point of order I make is that the memorial does not in any way strengthen the resolution, because what a member of the House does not propose here in order to give jurisdiction a man in New Mexico can not. It is upon the resolution that the question of privilege is to be decided. I hope that the gentleman from Illinois and the Speaker will not misunderstand me. There is not the slightest hostility to an investigation upon the statement of the gentleman from Illinois. What we object to is spreading broadcast unsupported charges against judicial character before there has been the slightest inquiry by any committee of the House whether there is ground for believing them to be true. If they should be found true, the gentleman will find every one of us voting to sustain an impeachment. But I do object to this system of slandering official character without the facts being substantiated by some organ of this House in the first instance.

Let the matter go to a committee. Let them inquire. Let them report an impeachment if the facts justify it. But I do object to getting in on this floor, under the form of a resolution of inquiry, a lot of as yet unsupported charges against the judicial character of a man about whom I know nothing except that he is a judge and prima facie entitled to our respect and fair treatment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question? Suppose this resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, what will be their powers in the premises?

Mr. KASSON. The reference of the resolution with the memorial gives the committee entire jurisdiction to report an impeachment of this officer if they find the facts justify it.

Mr. SPRINGER. But they will not have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KASSON. We will give them that power; there is no objection to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is all there is in the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. Whenever the committee ask that power they can have it without objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] proceeds, the Chair would like to call his attention to a point which he conceives to be involved in this question. If a member on the floor should prefer articles of impeachment against a public officer, the Chair has no doubt that it would be a privileged matter under the Constitution, because this House possesses the power of impeachment. But this is not a resolution proposing to impeach any one; it simply instructs the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the truth or falsity of certain charges made against a public officer in a memorial which has been presented. The inquiry may result in an impeachment or it may not; but the doubt which the Chair has arises upon the distinction between a mere proposition to investigate charges against a public officer and a proposition to impeach that officer.

Mr. COX, of New York. May I speak to that proposition a moment?

Mr. KASSON. The point of order is sustained, as we understand.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not believe we ought at present to allow this matter to come in as a question of privilege. Why should we undertake on a mere memorial to slime over anybody? Non constat this judge may be as virtuous and just an officer as any other judge in the country. This is not a question of privilege—at least not now. Send the matter to your committee; and if upon examining the memorial they think it serious enough, let them ask for authority to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KASSON. That is sensible.

Mr. COX, of New York. If the matter should come up hereafter in the form of a proposition for impeachment, it then becomes a question of privilege; not till then. I hope my friend from Illinois will consent that this matter shall be sent now, just as it stands, to the Committee on the Judiciary, which has jurisdiction of such matters.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from New York has stated all that I have desired to accomplish by the introduction of this resolution, that the Committee on the Judiciary be placed in such a position that they can look into these charges and report whether there is a case here which requires action on the part of the House. I have no objection to referring the matter to the committee with instructions (if they deem it proper) to send for persons and papers in making the inquiry.

Mr. KASSON. That is right.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection——

Mr. BELFORD. I object.

Mr. REED. If the Judiciary Committee regard that matter as something they wish to investigate, they can come to the House and ask for permission to send for persons and papers.

Mr. KASSON. That is understood.

Mr. REED. This is a question of right procedure. It is not usual to make it a matter on which capital can be made. It is a question of right procedure, and every member of the House knows it is not correct procedure upon the single memorial of an individual to give to a committee power to send for persons and papers and thus initiate proceedings. It is proper such a thing should go to a committee, and if the committee deem there is proper occasion for it they can send for persons and papers, and if, after sending for persons and papers, they deem it is a proper case for impeachment they can prefer articles of impeachment. Any other method is unjust.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to accommodate my friend.

Mr. REED. It is not a question of consideration; it is a question of decency. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to make it as easy for you as possible.

Mr. REED. The gentleman says he wishes to make is as easy for us as possible. If that be so, then he would not appear on the floor at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Illinois does not occupy the floor half the time that the gentleman from Maine does, and always with this difference, that I never speak without having something to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has accepted——

Mr. BELFORD. But I have not accepted it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. On that I demand the previous question.

Mr. BELFORD. I wish the gentleman from Illinois to answer this——

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BELFORD. You spent a summer in New Mexico.

Mr. SPRINGER. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BELFORD. I am coming to it, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Come to your statement or question which you propose to ask.

Mr. BELFORD. It is impossible for me, like the gentleman, to come to a conclusion without any intermediate steps. [Laughter.] You spent a summer in New Mexico investigating some claims there which were attacked——

Mr. SPRINGER. No; I did not.

Mr. BELFORD. I so understood it. I say the gravamen of the charges against Judge Axtell is based on this and nothing more, that certain citizens of New Mexico had acquired title to a large and valuable tract of land—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BELFORD. Just wait.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded, and the merits of the charges against the officer——

Mr. SPRINGER. I know nothing about the matter to which the gentleman refers. I have had nothing to do with the matter and know nothing about it.

Mr. BELFORD. I say that is the substance of the charges. Now these jumpers—— [Cries of "Regular order!"] I say you seek to impeach—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The subject-matter of the memorial is not before the House for debate, and, there being no objection, the memorial and accompanying resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered

APPROPRIATIONS FOR CERTAIN DESTITUTE INDIANS.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I present at this time the report of the conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution appropriating $50,000 for certain destitute Indians. I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 3, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out from said amendment the words "not exceeding $5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "three thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary;" and add at the end of the amendment the following: "which advertisement shall be made for ten days in at least four of the principal cities of the West;" and the Senate agree to the same.

E. JOHN ELLIS,
WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
THOMAS RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The within statement accompanying the report, required by the rules, will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution appropriating $50,000 for certain destitute Indians submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action recommended in the accompanying conference report:

If the action of the conferees is concurred in, the joint resolution will appropriate $100,000, of which sum $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, will be available for telegraphing and making purchases of supplies, including cost of advertising, which advertisement shall be made for ten days in at least four of the principal cities of the West.

E. JNO. ELLIS,
WM. S. HOLMAN,
THOS. RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. ELLIS. Unless some gentleman desires a further explanation I shall ask the adoption of the report.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana if he can state to the House whether there was any appropriation for the purposes contemplated by this resolution in the appropriation bill of the last year; and, if so, please to state the amount.

Mr. ELLIS. I have not the information asked by the gentleman from Texas at hand, but I can get it by sending to the committee-room for it. I could only give him now the approximate figures.

Mr. MAGINNIS. There was an appropriation made for this purpose. I think about $45,000 was appropriated, although I am not certain as to the exact amount.

Mr. CHACE. What was the question of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. REAGAN. My question was whether there had been a certain amount appropriated for this specific purpose during the last year; and, if so, how much.

Mr. ELLIS. The amount appropriated for the Crows last year, or the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, was $105,000. The amount appropriated for the support of the Indians at Fort Belknap, at Fort Peck, and at Blackfeet agency was $138,000.

Mr. REAGAN. Were those two items for the benefit of the same Indians that this appropriation is for?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me ask the gentleman whether the appropriations of last year were the usual appropriations for this purpose?

Mr. ELLIS. No; they were much less than the usual appropriations.

Mr. BLOUNT. And hence the deficiency?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, sir. Furthermore, these Indians have been heretofore totally supported by the Government. While we have been giving largely in excess of the appropriations for the current year, they have been supported in part by the buffalo which were plentiful upon their hunting-grounds. But this year they have entirely disappeared, and these Indians have been put upon a soil to work it which absolutely requires irrigation before it will produce anything. Their attempts at farming have been entirely unsuccessful, their crops having been totally destroyed by frosts and drought, and they are now in a condition of absolute starvation.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana in this connection, since only about seven months of the fiscal year have passed, how such a deficiency can have arisen? He has just stated that the appropriations of last year were less than usual. Now, were the appropriations only such in amount as to justify this additional appropriation when but little more than half the year has passed, or does the necessity for an immediate appropriation grow out of the condition of these Indians at this time?

Mr. ELLIS. I think, in the first place, the appropriation of last year was inadequate. I think it was far less than should have been given. But this appropriation is attributable particularly to the other causes, the failure of their crops and the absence of game.

Mr. RYAN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that if the same condition of things had existed in regard to these Indians during the present fiscal year as existed in former years, the appropriation would have been nearly if not fully adequate. But, as I understand it, their crops have utterly failed, and the game upon which they have been accustomed heretofore largely to subsist has entirely deserted that part of the country. Hence this deficiency.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman in that connection whether the estimates for the last year were less than usual.

Mr. RYAN. I am not certain as to that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would also like to know if the Committee on Appropriations have seen proper on their own motion to make this recommendation.

Mr. RYAN. The appropriations were less than for the preceding year, and——

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me say that the policy pursued in this case is the same which prevailed in other cases, that where these Indians have been placed in a condition to begin farming operations they have been supplied with cattle, grain, and feed, and other necessaries until they have become, to some extent, able to support themselves. Then these supplies are gradually reduced, and they are compelled to look to agriculture alone for their support. That was the policy, as was stated by the gentleman from Louisiana, who was upon the committee during the last year, and who was fully conversant with the plan which had been adopted in that respect.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have no doubt that what the gentleman says is entirely correct, but what I wish to know is whether or not these reports were made to the Committee on Appropriations of last year by the Department, whether in that appropriation bill these provisions were made on the suggestion of the Department or whether they came from the committee on its own motion.

Mr. HISCOCK. Were made upon consultation with the gentleman who had charge of this matter in the Interior Department.

Mr. BLOUNT. The report of the committee was made after that consultation?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. And in less than seven months this deficiency is asked for?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not prepared to say whether the committee may not have reduced the appropriation somewhat below the estimate of the Department. But I am prepared to say it was after full consultation, and as the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS] will bear witness, it was supposed a sufficient amount was given. And a sufficient amount was given if the crops had been good and the other conditions the same as in previous years.

Mr. CHACE. My information from the Department is that the appropriation last year was not what the Department asked for.

Mr. RYAN. It was not what the Department asked for.

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS].

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would like to make one statement in regard to one of these tribes of Indians, because I never could understand upon what ground the Committee on Appropriations or the House have justified the constant reductions that have been made in their annuities. Some ten years ago a treaty was made with those Indians by which they gave up certain portions of their lands and we occupied them. The consideration was to be $50,000 a year. That treaty was never ratified by the Government.

Mr. CHACE. It was made in 1868.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Yes, but never formally ratified by the Government. Yet the Government went on and took all the benefits of it; and then when the Indians came in and claimed the $50,000, Congress, after allowing it for some years, cut it down year after year until the last committee cut it down almost to nothing. I always thought if not a breach of treaty it was a breach of faith.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to be permitted to say a few words.

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, our Indian policy and the manner of its administration are justly calculated to awaken suspicion on this floor and throughout the country. And we have here now the extraordinary fact that at the expiration of half the year we are called upon to appropriate an additional $100,000 over the appropriations that were made at the beginning of the year and which it was supposed would be sufficient. I say the fact that now at the expiration of half the year $100,000 additional is asked for these fifteen thousand Indians will, of itself, awaken the inquiry as to how many Indian agents and contractors for supplies are to be benefited by this appropriation.

When we think of an expenditure of seven or eight millions of dollars a year for these Indians, besides what they ought to make toward their own support, and when that is spent that we have to supply deficiencies, such requests as these in connection with the history of the management of Indian affairs in this country awaken at least inquiry and comment. It seems to me the amount asked for by the committee of the House, $50,000, was extravagant and unnecessary; and now an additional $50,000 added to that, it seems to me, ought to secure a rejection of the report of the committee.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to say one word in reply to the gentleman from Texas. So far as the committee has been able it has guarded the appropriation, limiting the expense of purchasing and advertising, and guarding the Government as far as legislation could guard the Government. In reply to the assertion that these people are not entitled to the humanities of the Government, I must say that I totally dissent from the views of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. REAGAN. I was rather arguing against the rascalities of the Indian agents.

Mr. ELLIS. It is, sir, the fault of your race and the fault of your Government that these people are reduced to the condition that they are in now. You have taken their lands, you have violated your treaty obligations until the recital of your conduct toward them is enough to make the face of every honorable and honest American burn with shame. Your civilization has driven the game from them on which they have subsisted year by year. The Government has adopted the more humane policy of endeavoring to civilize them and teach them to work. And now, in the infancy of this policy, when they have gone upon these reservations, when they have been placed upon inhospitable soil without means of irrigation, with crops failing and with game disappearing and when they are in a condition of starvation, the gentleman prates about the injustice of the Government making these appropriations. I say they are sanctioned by every law of humanity and by every principle of civilization.

I move the previous question on the report.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. ELLIS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, there were ayes 137, noes not counted.

So the motion to adjourn was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with law, an abstract of the militia force of the United States, organized and unorganized, according to the latest returns received at the office of the Adjutant-General of the Army.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This communication, together with the accompanying reports, if there be no objection, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think this communication needs any reference to the Committee on Military Affairs. A bill touching that subject has been reported and is upon the Calendar. I move that the communication be printed and laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill (H. R. 1015) for the relief of Fitz-John Porter was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request to the Senate this morning to be relieved from further service as chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator to desire to be relieved from further service on the committee as well, or only from the chairmanship?

Mr. WILSON. Only as chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks consent to be relieved from further service as chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining. Will the Senate grant the request?

The request was granted.

Mr DOLPH. I ask to be relieved from further service upon the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress.

The request was granted.

He also presented resolutions of the American Laryngological Association of New York, urging the erection of a fire-proof building for the library and museum of the Surgeon-General's Office; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COKE presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of Texas; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Joint resolution.

Whereas notice is given by John D. Miles, United States Indian agent, Cheyenne and Arapaho agency, Indian Territory, dated October 16, 1884, that all that portion of the cattle trail known as the "Western cattle trail," which passes through the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indian reservation, Indian Territory, and heretofore used from Texas to Kansas, can no longer be used for trail purposes, as that part of said Cheyenne and Arapaho reservation through which the said trail passes has been leased for grazing purposes: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the senate and house of representatives of the Eighteenth Legislature request the United States Congress through our honorable Senators and Representatives to bring the matter before said body, and to use their influence to have said cattle trail opened.

J. W. BOOTH,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

Mr. COKE presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Texas; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

H. C. R. No. 2—Concurrent resolution.

Whereas the frequent commission of crime in the Choctaw and Chickasaw Nations within the Indian Territory, contiguous to the northern border of this State, often affecting the personal and property rights of our own citizens, demands a more efficient and prompt remedy than is or can be afforded by any existing Federal jurisdiction, by reason of their great distance from the place of holding the courts: Therefore,

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States are respectfully requested to provide by law for a term of the Federal court at some accessible and convenient point within and near the northern border of this State, with jurisdiction of offenses committed within said Territory.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be furnished by the secretary of state with copies of this resolution, and they are urgently requested to advocate the passage of a law providing for such Federal court, with jurisdiction as aforesaid.

THE STATE OF TEXAS,
Department of State.

I, Joseph W. Baines, secretary of state of the State of Texas, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the concurrent resolution passed by the Eighteenth Legislature of the State of Texas, approved January —, A. D. 1884, and now on file in this department.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and have impressed hereon the seal of the State at Austin, Tex., this January 31, A. D. 1884.

[SEAL.] J. W. BAINES, Secretary of State.

Mr. HARRIS. I present a preamble and resolution adopted by the Cotton Exchange of the city of Memphis, calling attention to and earnestly urging the propriety of the erection of a retaining wall for the bank of the custom-house in that city. I ask their reference to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Are the resolutions addressed to the Senate?

Mr. HARRIS. The resolutions are not addressed at all. They are in the form of instructions, urging the two Senators from the State of Tennessee to urge the matter upon Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to present resolutions in the nature of a memorial on the subject which he has named. If there be no objection, they will be received and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WILSON. I have received a preamble and series of resolutions adopted by Shelladay Post of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Monroe, Iowa, which were evidently intended for the consideration of the Senate, in favor of granting to the soldiers and sailors who served in the Union Army during the war of the rebellion a uniform pension of $8 per month. I ask that they be received and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent to present a paper intended for the consideration of the Senate, the nature of which he has described. If there be no objection, it will be received and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the memorial of George E. Welles, a citizen of Toledo, Ohio, stating that he is the owner of land in the State of Iowa, conveyed by that State to the Des Moines Navigation Company; that he has paid taxes on it for thirty years and secured possession of it; that his title is good; and he protests against the passage of the bill now pending in Congress directing that he be sued in the name of the United States for the purpose of destroying or clouding his title. The controversy is familiar no doubt to the Senate, known in olden times as the Des Moines navigation grant. I do not know to what committee it should be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the impression that the Committee on Public Lands has that subject under consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well, let it go there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Cornelius R. Roland and 41 others, citizens of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of an act to redeem the trade-dollar and to suspend coinage of other silver dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 940) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be examined certain vouchers filed, or to be filed, by the State of Missouri, or her agent or agents, for sums claimed to be due from the Government of the United States on account of payments made by said State since April 22, 1882, to the officers and enlisted men of her militia forces for military services rendered to the United States in the suppression of the rebellion, as evidenced by the proper pay-rolls heretofore filed with, examined, and accepted by the Government of the United States, and to report to Congress, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

A bill (S. 421) for the relief of Thomas J. Miller, of Washington Territory.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 556) for the relief of A. H. Von Luettwitz, submitted an adverse report thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

GUANO ISLANDS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was directed a few days since by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report back the bill (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands, with a recommendation from the Committee on Foreign Relations that it be put on its passage at once on account of the inconvenience of the restriction now upon commerce. It was laid over informally at the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM]. I will ask, therefore, the unanimous consent of the Senate to let it be passed now. It will take but a moment, as I am satisfied no one will object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the bill named by him. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BECK. I do not propose to object to the consideration of the bill, for I know nothing about it, but I shall object whenever I can to any interruption of the regular morning business until the reports of committees and the introduction of bills are called for. I now object until they are called.

Mr. RANSOM. I hope as this bill was put over at my suggestion that the Senator from Kentucky will not object to its consideration to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that after resolutions are gone through with, it will be in order for the Senator from Ohio to move to take up the bill.

Mr. BECK. That is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will wait until then, and I will only say now that I make the motion at the earnest request of persons engaged in commerce, who say that this restriction is a very great interference with a commerce which is of importance to the whole country, and any Senator who hears the section read would certainly allow the bill to be passed.

Mr. BECK. I do not object to the bill, for I know nothing about it, but I do object to the interruption of the regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of standing committees are still in order.

REPRINTING OF BILLS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print Senate bills 140, 141, and 398, to report the same with an amendment striking out the last two, which have been already reprinted with the reported amendments, and to reprint the first one. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. BLAIR on the 29th ultimo:

Ordered, That Senate bill 140 to establish a bureau of statistics of labor; Senate bill 141 to fix and regulate the hours of laborers and workmen and mechanics employed by the Government of the United States; and Senate bill 398 to provide temporary aid to common schools, be reprinted, the files being exhausted.

Mr. BLAIR. Senate bill 140 is the only one which the committee desire to have reprinted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Chair understands this is a resolution referred to the committee. If the Chair is right about that, the Chair must submit the question on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Printing was read, being to strike out, after the word "labor," in line 1, the words:

Senate bill 141, to fix and regulate the hours of laborers and workmen and mechanics employed by the Government of the United States; and Senate bill 398, to provide temporary aid to common schools.

So as to read:

Ordered, That Senate bill 140, to establish a bureau of statistics of labor, be reprinted, the files being exhausted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to which was referred a resolution to print 3,000 extra copies of the bankruptcy bill, to report it without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That 3,000 extra copies of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, reported from the Judiciary Committee on the 4th day of February, 1884, be printed in pamphlet form for the use of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 1418) for the relief of Evalina P. Low; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 54) to authorize the printing of the journal of the joint committee of Congress of December, 1865.

Mr. MORRILL. I will state, with the leave of the President and the Senate, that this is the journal of the committee of fifteen authorized in December, 1865, on reconstruction. It is a journal that never has been printed. All the results of the work of that committee were printed when presented to Congress, but this contains the various propositions that were from time to time offered and the votes of the committee. It will be found to be an interesting document on all sides of the Chamber. At the decease of Senator Fessenden, who was chairman of the committee on the part of the Senate, this book [exhibiting], containing a very well-kept, clear journal for a year, was transferred to Portland, Me., and not until recently has it been ascertained that it was in existence. It must be a document of too much importance to remain out of print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont ask that this joint resolution be now put on its passage?

Mr. MORRILL. No; I merely ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. MORRILL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MCMILLAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of John Johns, late captain of the First Minnesota Battery, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. DOLPH, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claims of contractors on the steamer Thomas Corwin be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. HAMPTON, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to Senate bill 1082 and Senate bill 1477, Forty-seventh Congress, first session, be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. MORGAN, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of J. C. Hamner, administrator, be taken from the files and sent to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers on file in the case of Robert Otis, administrator of Heirn, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CRIMES OF INDIANS UPON INDIANS.

Mr. MORGAN. The order of resolutions being reached, I ask for the consideration of the resolution I offered yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] and laid over under the rules. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to send to the Senate copies of the correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Department of the Interior concerning the case of Johnson Foster, a Creek Indian, who was accused of the unlawful killing of Robert Poisal, an Arapaho Indian, in the Indian Territory, in September, 1882; and a copy of any opinion of the Attorney-General given in that case relating to the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States over such crimes committed by one Indian against another Indian within the Indian Territory.

Mr. MORGAN. My object in offering the resolution is to get information from the Department of Justice in respect to the case mentioned there. Similar to that was the case of Crow Dog, decided in the Supreme Court of the United States, for the killing of Spotted Tail, a Sioux Indian, in the Indian Territory. I am trying to get the facts now, so as to bring to the attention of the Senate and its Judiciary Committee or its Committee on Indian Affairs the state of the law in respect to homicides and other grave offenses committed by one Indian upon another within the limits and jurisdiction of the United States.

The resolution was agreed to.

SUPERVISING ARCHITECT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER], which lay over under the rules.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to forward to the Senate the testimony taken by a committee of the Treasury Department during the last summer, and the report of said committee touching the administration of the Supervising Architect's Office by Supervising Architect Hill. And that the Secretary of the Treasury communicate to the Senate under and by virtue of what provision of law the Supervising Architect is appointed, and the scope and extent of his powers under such appointment; whether he executes an official bond, and whether he disburses public money in virtue of his appointment as Supervising Architect, and, if so, from which appropriation and for what purpose.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. FRYE. I ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Fish and Fisheries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question being one of privilege which is now pending, the Senator will suspend until this resolution is disposed of, when the Chair will entertain his request. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will now recognize the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FRYE. I ask to be excused from further service upon the Committee on Fish and Fisheries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks to be excused from service upon the Committee on Fish and Fisheries. Will the Senate grant the request?

The request was granted.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I ask that the vacancy upon the Committee on Fish and Fisheries be filled by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the vacancy upon the Committee on Fish and Fisheries occasioned by the retirement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] be filled by the Chair. That order will be entered if there be no objection. The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] to the place made vacant by the retirement of the Senator from Maine.

PROTEUS COURT OF INQUIRY.

Mr. BUTLER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the record of the proceedings, testimony, and findings of the court of inquiry in relation to the events connected with the loss of the steamer Proteus in the Arctic Ocean.

Mr. HALE. Let that lie over a day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over under the rule.

DESTITUTE INDIANS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask consent to present the report of the committee of conference on the joint resolution which has just come from the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Senator from Iowa submits a conference report, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 3, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out from said amendment the words "not exceeding $5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "three thousand dollars, or so much thereof as may be necessary;" and add at the end of the amendment the following: "which advertisement shall be made for ten days in at least four of the principal cities of the West;" and the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

E. JOHN ELLIS,
WILLIAM S. HOLMAN,
THOMAS RYAN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate consider at this time the report of the committee of conference. The Chair hears no objection. Will the Senate agree to the report?

The report was agreed to.

GUANO ISLANDS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate proceed to consider the bill to which I referred a few minutes ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 874.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 874) to further suspend the operation of section 5574 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, title 72, in relation to guano islands.

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to place on record the grounds of this brief bill I will state that the law which authorized our citizens to acquire interests in guano islands in South America provides that—

No guano shall be taken from any such island, rock, or key, except for the use of the citizens of the United States or of persons resident therein.

But it provides that—

This section shall, however, be suspended in relation to all persons who have complied with the provisions of this title for five years from and after the 14th day of July, 1872.

The guano that is imported into this country is now used to mix with phosphate in South Carolina and perhaps elsewhere, and has become a very important article of commerce. The result has been that Congress has twice suspended the operation of this prohibition against the exportation of guano. This bill simply continues that suspension, and allows Americans to bring the guano here and mix it with phosphates and ship it abroad, mostly to Germany. It is plainly and properly right; but I think it ought to go further; I think the law itself ought to be repealed; but the Committee on Foreign Relations thought it was better merely to suspend it for the time being, in the hope that Congress will in due time repeal the law, which is now no longer necessary and is practically obsolete.

Mr. INGALLS. Had we not better have the section read at length from the Secretary's desk?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will have it read. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the section of the Revised Statutes referred to will be read at the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5574. No guano shall be taken from any such island, rock, or key except for the use of the citizens of the United States, or of persons resident therein. The discoverer, or his widow, heir, executor, administrator, or assigns, shall enter into bond, in such penalty and with such sureties as may be required by the President, to deliver the guano to citizens of the United States, for the purpose of being used therein, and to none others, and at the price prescribed, and to provide all necessary facilities for that purpose within a time to be fixed in the bond; and any breach of the provisions thereof shall be deemed a forfeiture of all rights accruing under and by virtue of this title. This section shall, however, be suspended in relation to all persons who have complied with the provisions of this title for five years from and after the 14th day of July, 1872.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I believe this is the second time since I have been a member of the Senate when there has been a proposition to suspend the operation of this act. The provision of the entire act, which I do not think was explained fully by the Senator from Ohio, was that a discoverer of any island upon which there was a deposit of guano or other fertilizing substance should have the exclusive right to use the deposit upon that island on condition that he should sell it only to people in the United States, at a certain fixed price, prescribed in the statute; but it was provided, when the law was enacted, that the operation of it should be suspended for five years, so that the discoverer might sell to foreign countries at an enhanced price to that fixed by the Government. The first suspension, I believe, was in 1872. In 1877, when this suspension had expired, the proprietor of a certain island in the Caribbean Sea, I think, who had discovered guano, came up and secured a further suspension of the operations of the act.

So there have been at least ten years since I have been in the Senate during which the citizens of the United States have been deprived of any advantages under this act or of any benefit from the discovery of these islands. The Army and Navy are pledged to the protection of the discoverers of these islands against anybody else, against any other citizen of the United States going there and seizing any deposits which may be on the islands; but the United States made that pledge upon the condition that the discoverers of these fertilizing ingredients should sell them exclusively for the benefit of the people of this country. The proposition now to suspend the operation of it still further is saying to the people of this country, "You can not now secure any of these increased fertilizing properties without this law being suspended and their being exported to foreign countries, where they can get a larger price than they are allowed to charge citizens of the United States."

I think we ought to legislate for the interest of the people of this country as well as for the interest of those persons who have discovered these islands and are making fortunes out of them. I do not know about the opportunities for the exportation of fertilizers, but I know that five years ago parties came here and said they could not live at the price fixed by the statute for the sale of guano to American citizens, and could procure a larger price by sending it to foreign countries, and they asked for a suspension for five years more in order that they might develop in these islands the deposits of guano and sell them to American citizens at the price named in the statute. I do not think we are legislating in the interests of the people of this country; I think, on the contrary, we are denying them the benefit which they would derive if this act were not suspended.

I do not know anything about the operations of these gentlemen, whether they are profitable or not, but I do know that the provisions of the statute require them to sell guano to the people of this country at a certain price in consideration of the fact that they should have the exclusive right to take these deposits and that the Government of the United States pledged itself, pledged the Army and the Navy if necessary, to protect them in the exclusive use of the deposits. I am opposed to the further suspension of this act. If there is any benefit to accrue from the act to the farming interest of this country I am in favor of the farming interest having that benefit.

Mr. RANSOM. Some days since, when the bill was reported by the Senator from Ohio and unanimous consent was asked for its immediate consideration, knowing what a very deep interest the people of my State feel in the subject of agricultural fertilizers, I requested that the bill should be laid over until I could have an opportunity of examining it. I have done so as well as I could, and I find no reasonable objections to its passage.

When the islands were discovered in reference to which the statute was passed, one provision of which is now proposed to be suspended, they were perhaps the only islands or places which were known to contain that character of fertilizer. Within the last fifteen years in the State of South Carolina immense beds of phosphates, far exceeding any previous conception, have been discovered, and those phosphates are now being sent from the port of Charleston all over the world, at least wherever commercial fertilizers are used, and they are sent at comparatively a low price. That discovery has reduced the price of phosphatic guanos all over the world; and now the owners of these islands, if I understand rightly, simply ask that they may export their guano to other countries just as the owners of the deposits in South Carolina export theirs. This seems just and reasonable. They are American citizens, and it is the duty of this Government to protect their persons, their property, and their pursuits.

I can say to my friend from Delaware that he can not be more sincere than I am in wishing for cheap fertilizers, but the discovery of the beds of phosphate has already reduced the price of this character of guano at least 100 per cent. Phosphates from South Carolina are now competing with guano, or rather fertilizers of phosphatic character, and must successfully compete with them in all countries with which we trade in that article of commerce. It seems to me on reflection that I ought not to object to the owners of these islands having the same right with other people to send the results of their labor where they please. The competition in this country can not well be made greater than it is now, and if I understand the question rightly already the competing companies around Charleston and competition from abroad have reduced the price to a very low or reasonable standard. I do not see any benefit to come to our farmers by not allowing this as it seems to me very proper request. If I could see that the restriction would make the cost of fertilizers cheaper I would be the last man to advocate this bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. These deposits are very different from those in South Carolina. South Carolina phosphate has been used for a number of years. I have had it used on my land, but I prefer a different phosphate than that which is made from South Carolina rocks and costing perhaps a little more money. The deposit here is of a very different character from that of South Carolina rock. It is called guano; but the South Carolina rock is nothing but rock that has been reduced by acids and other ingredients in order to bring out the fertilizing properties there are in it. These are deposits of guano, which does not come in competition with South Carolina rock nor any other phosphates that are used, but is a different, distinct fertilizer. The discoverers of these islands secured the absolute right to use these deposits upon the express condition that they would furnish the guano to the people of the United States at certain fixed prices named in the statute. It is part of their contract with the Government of the United States, the Government pledging itself to secure to them the exclusive right to take these deposits and sell them, and pledging the protection of the Government to those parties having a monopoly, and in consideration of the pledges made by the Government they agreed to sell exclusively to the people of the United States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Will the Senator yield for one moment for a question?

Mr SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. In what act of Congress other than the one named by the Senator from Ohio, whose operation he seeks to suspend, is the authority found for protecting the discoverers of guano islands?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If Senators will look at the Revised Statutes they will find the whole of title 72 refers to that subject. This bill only relates to a certain section of that title.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If the operation of the law be suspended as proposed by the Senator from Ohio, will it withdraw from the discoverers the protection which the Government has heretofore guaranteed to them?

Mr. SAULSBURY. It will withdraw none of it. It simply gives them exemption from their own obligation for five years.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then upon a piece of territory which some citizen of the United States has happened to discover where guano exists, the Government by some other statute has got to afford him protection. What does the Senator from Delaware understand to be the measure of that protection or in what way is it to be given?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will read the whole of title 72.

SEC. 5570. Whenever any citizen of the United States discovers a deposit of guano on any island, rock, or key, not within the lawful jurisdiction of any other government, and not occupied by the citizens of any other government, and takes peaceable possession thereof, and occupies the same, such island, rock, or key may, at the discretion of the President, be considered as appertaining to the United States.

SEC. 5571. The discoverer shall, as soon as practicable, give notice, verified by affidavit, to the Department of State of such discovery, occupation, and possession, describing the island, rock, or key, and the latitude and longitude thereof, as near as may be, and showing that such possession was taken in the name of the United States; and shall furnish satisfactory evidence to the State Department that such island, rock, or key was not, at the time of the discovery thereof, or of the taking possession and occupation thereof by the claimants, in the possession or occupation of any other government or of the citizens of any other government, before the same shall be considered as appertaining to the United States.

SEC. 5572. If the discoverer dies before perfecting proof of discovery or fully complying with the provisions of the preceding section, his widow, heir, executor, or administrator shall be entitled to the benefits of such discovery, upon complying with the provisions of this title; but nothing herein shall be held to impair any rights of discovery or any assignment by a discoverer heretofore recognized by the United States.

SEC. 5573. The discoverer, or his assigns, being citizens of the United States, may be allowed, at the pleasure of Congress, the exclusive right of occupying such island, rocks, or keys for the purpose of obtaining guano, and of selling and delivering the same to citizens of the United States, to be used therein, and may be allowed to charge and receive for every ton thereof delivered alongside a vessel, in proper tubs, within reach of ship's tackle, a sum not exceeding $8 per ton for the best quality, or $4 for every ton taken while in its native place of deposit.

SEC. 5574. No guano shall be taken from any such island, rock, or key, except for the use of the citizens of the United States or of persons resident therein. The discoverer, or his widow, heir, executor, administrator, or assigns, shall enter into bond, in such penalty and with such sureties as may be required by the President, to deliver the guano to citizens of the United States, for the purpose of being used therein, and to none others, and at the price prescribed, and to provide all necessary facilities for that purpose within a time to be fixed in the bond; and any breach of the provisions thereof shall be deemed a forfeiture of all rights accruing under and by virtue of this title. This section shall, however, be suspended in relation to all persons who have complied with the provisions of this title for five years from and after the 14th day of July, 1872.

SEC. 5575. The introduction of guano from such islands, rocks, or keys shall be regulated as in the coasting-trade between different parts of the United States, and the same laws shall govern the vessels concerned therein.

SEC. 5576. All acts done, and offenses or crimes committed, on any such island, rock, or key, by persons who may land thereon, or in the waters adjacent thereto, shall be deemed committed on the high seas, on board a merchant-ship or vessel belonging to the United States, and shall be punished according to the laws of the United States relating to such ships or vessels and offenses on the high seas, which laws for the purpose aforesaid are extended over such islands, rocks, and keys.

SEC. 5577. The President is authorized, at his discretion, to employ the land and naval forces of the United States to protect the rights of the discoverer or of his widow, heir, executor, administrator, or assigns.

SEC. 5578. Nothing in this title contained shall be construed as obliging the United States to retain possession of the islands, rocks, or keys after the guano shall have been removed from the same.

Mr. McPHERSON. Then if I understand aright from the reading of that law the Government is by this bill relieved from no responsibility to protect either the discoverer or his heirs upon the filing with the proper officer of the Government of the fact of his discovery. All that the Government or the people of this country were to receive in exchange for that protection was guano at the price fixed by the statute. If I understand the Senator from Delaware aright he says that for ten years continuously they have been relieved from the operation of that section. Therefore neither the Government nor the people of this country have received any benefit for the protection the Government affords. Hence I think it is a clear case that there should be no longer any suspension of the operation of a law which requires the Government under any conditions which may arise to give protection from which no results whatever are received of a beneficial character.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina that if he has any idea that by the suspension of this law he will benefit the owners of deposits of phosphates in South Carolina, he is very much mistaken, for this guano is not of the same nature and will not come into competition with the South Carolina rock, or the guano made out of South Carolina rock. As I understand, it is a distinct species of guano found in the Caribbean Sea or somewhere in the southern waters, and this suspension is simply to deprive the farming interest of this country of any advantage which might accrue to them from having access to those fertilizers. I am therefore opposed to any further suspension of the operations of the act.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am inclined to think that if Senators, the Senator from New Jersey especially, would take the trouble to understand this bill they would not oppose it.

In 1856 the Government of the United States first undertook to protect the voyages of discovery made by our merchants to the islands and little rocky cells off the coast of South America. Our merchants, like merchants from all parts of the world, were seeking guano wherever they could find it. This law was passed in 1856, twenty-seven or twenty-eight years ago, encouraging our merchants to go and find these deposits of guano wherever they could, and promising them if they did make such discoveries on land to which no other nation had a claim, on barren, uninhabited places to which no nation of the world claimed a right of title or possession, they might go and occupy them, and take the guano there, load it on American vessels, and bring it to this country.

That has been the law from that time to this. Under it large investments have been made. I am told that in Baltimore, where the business is mainly conducted, large investments have been made in this commerce. In the law there was a restriction that all this guano should be brought to the United States and sold to citizens of the United States, under severe penalties. It was found afterward that there was not a market for all the guano in this country. This prohibition actually denied to our own citizens the right to take their property to a place where they could find a market for it. This guano did not command a price that would justify its being brought here and sold, and thereupon Congress suspended from time to time the operation of this prohibitory clause, and allowed our merchants who had discovered this guano to bring it here to mix it with other guano and with other natural manures, such as the phosphates of South Carolina, and export the product abroad. In this way a very valuable commerce has sprung up, confined, I think, mainly to Charleston and Baltimore; at least it is so stated to me. In this way a profitable commerce has been carried on without injuring a mortal man in the United States. This guano is mixed with our own natural phosphates and taken to Germany, which, being an old country, requires artificial manures, and consumes in a great measure the larger proportion of the guano thus found on the Pacific coast.

Congress has twice suspended the operation of the section which prohibits this guano being exported, and this is the third suspension as I understand. The time expired, I believe, last summer. A bill, if I am correctly informed, passed the Senate last session without objection making this suspension, but it failed for want of time in the other House, and it is now brought up again mainly upon the petition of Baltimore merchants. I have seen a very strong letter from Mr. Whyte, once Senator from Maryland, who said it was very important, that this commerce was going on, and that its interruption would be a serious detriment to the commerce of Baltimore, and urging the passage of this bill so that this commerce which had been going on for ten years might be carried on with profit and safety free from the restriction of the section referred to in this bill.

That is all there is of the case. I did not suppose there would be any controversy about it.

Mr. McPHERSON. Why does not the Senator ask for the repeal of the whole law, including the protective features? He states in his speech that a very great trade has been built up without any injury either to this Government or to any of its people. Suppose that the protection accorded in the first section of the act were demanded by the parties owning the guano, there would be some injury to the Government under its promise to protect, without there being any corresponding benefit to the people by securing to them the guano.

Mr. SHERMAN. God forbid that we should withdraw any protection from any man engaged in American commerce on the high seas. This provision of section 5577 of the Revised Statutes authorizes the President to protect these people in the enjoyment of their rights. Remember they are American citizens, must be American citizens, and the protection of the United States is extended to American citizens engaged in lawful commerce on islands in the ocean not claimed by any other government in the world. Why should not the Government of the United States protect American citizens in that foreign commerce? Even in the absence of all law it would be the duty of the President of the United States, where the commerce was lawful, to protect it. The President now is bound to protect American citizens engaged in foreign commerce with any civilized or savage nation, and much more so to protect American citizens engaged in commerce in robbing these barren islands of the only treasure they possess.

Why, sir, the principles of the law are plain and simple. This law was passed years and years ago to protect commerce, to induce our people to go off over the high seas and get this valuable manure and bring it here, and then when there was not a market here the restrictive clauses of the law have been from time to time suspended. I am told that this guano is nearly all brought to two ports and there mixed with other material, mainly our natural phosphates, and then sent largely to Germany and to the old countries, where the soil has been exhausted by the tillage of two thousand years. Now for us to break down this little commerce, it appears to me, is only in harmony with what seems to have been the policy of the Government of the United States for twenty-five years, to break down all our commerce with all the nations of the world.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I think that the ordinary complaint of the planters and farmers of the United States that all legislation of Congress, how much soever in the first it may tend to their benefit, terminates in their injury and wrong, is receiving from day to day assurance of verity. I have been surprised myself when I read in the papers and hear from planters and farmers the constant complaint that Congress is ruled by lawyers, that they do not have representatives to take interest in their matters. I have been surprised, I say, to find from day to day some provision of law enacted to the direct injury of the planting and farming population of the United States; and this is a remarkable instance of it. I will not stop now to say how adroitly my free-trade friend from Carolina works the provisions of this bill in a roundabout way to protect his phosphate deposits there instead of coming directly to the protectionists and imposing a duty upon rival phosphates. He is ingenious, shrewd, quiet; his argument is strongly for protection of the industries in his State. That is just what I believe in doing; but he attacks it from away off, in remote, unknown seas, goes out of this country away from home, and protects his phosphates by attacking industries in the Pacific Ocean, and avoids the responsibility of his being a protectionist for the phosphates of Carolina. I refer to the Senators from both Carolinas. They are for protecting their phosphates in a roundabout way, not in the direct way that other protectionists protect their industries.

Mr. BUTLER. I have not opened my mouth about this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I know it; but it was to draw an expression of opinion from the gentleman that I was making these suggestions. I shall be successful before I am through.

Mr. BUTLER. I think I shall disappoint the Senator from Michigan, as I did the other day.

Mr. CONGER. It has always seemed a curiosity to me that the Senator from South Carolina who last spoke throws the whole responsibility of these tremendous contests upon his colleague, and he may do so now, while claiming the credit at home of protecting such important industries of his people. It is possible I may not succeed in getting such an expression of opinion from the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator is certainly laboring under a delusion entirely. He either comes into the Senate and does not know what has been said, or he is putting up a man of straw to knock him down. I have not opened my mouth about phosphates, and care very little about them.

Mr. CONGER. I said I desired to hear the opinion of the Senator in regard to the phosphates in his State at some time.

Mr. BUTLER. When the proper time comes I shall give my opinion, but I do not believe that I will gratify the Senator just now.

Mr. CONGER. The Senator rose himself. I did not invite him to rise.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply rose to correct the Senator.

Mr. CONGER. I supposed he was coming into the fight.

Some years ago American citizens discovered, in distant islands of the Pacific Ocean and upon islands not occupied or claimed by any country or any inhabitant, valuable deposits of guano. The people of the United States and Congress representing that people desired to preserve some of those deposits, of a very valuable and the most valuable fertilizing material perhaps ever discovered, for our own planters, for our own farmers, and they passed a law pledging the faith of this Government that if our citizens would discover those islands they would protect them, the law says, with the Army and the Navy and the whole power of the Government, making them for the time being American islands, American property, with the laws of America extended over them. They offered that protection to persons engaged in that commerce; and now I ask the attention of the Senator from Ohio. They said to all persons who would discover such islands and bring them under the provisions of this law that they might bring the guano from the islands to the United States free of duty, without any charge. For that purpose those guanos were put on the free-list. That encouraged commerce. What does the gentleman say now? He desires this guano to be brought to the United States if it can be; and I can not see how repealing the provision that requires it to be brought to the United States will encourage its coming here, any more than to be brought to the United States to be re-exported from here to the farmers and producers of Germany, as if we had no worn-out lands demanding these fertilizers for our own use.

Sir, there are millions of acres of lands on the Atlantic coast, North and South, whose production would be doubled every year by the use of a cheap fertilizing mineral or deposit of this kind. It was thought by farmers and planters that this law would cause occasional discoveries of guano, and bring the deposits found upon islands discovered by our citizens necessarily to the United States; and for a time that was the case. We had guano more plenty in the United States after the first discovery of these islands and conveying the material here than we ever had before; but unfortunately the operation of the law was suspended first for five years, and then for five years more, until in point of fact we have now received no benefit from this law, until in point of fact we only protect the islands; we extend our laws over them and make it the duty of our naval vessels to visit them from year to year, and the agriculturists of the United States get no benefit whatever. Now, why repeal a law requiring those to whom we have granted these peculiar favors to bring those deposits to the United States for the benefit of our own people? Sir, one can travel down the coast line of railway from here to Florida and see thousands and thousands of acres as desolate as if the blast of death had come over them, which need but a cheap fertilizer to make them bloom like the rose, to make them productive. There are thousands of acres of cotton-land one can see even in passing along the railroad which are deserted to-day because fertilizers like guano are not brought into this country and can not be obtained cheap enough to be used in producing the cotton. Every man knows it who travels in that region, especially those who live there.

But, sir, it is not only used along this coast; the product is sent to all the Middle States and to the Western States; for there is no fertility of soil that will warrant continued production upon the same piece of land year after year without restoring the fertilization which has been taken away with the crop. I speak in behalf of the planter and of the farmer, and I demand that for five years at least we shall have under the provisions of this law the introduction and importation of the produce of these islands for the benefit of the planters and farmers of the United States. I am opposed to its repeal. It has been a dead letter on our statute-book almost from the beginning till now, except that it has imposed continual obligations on the Government without one corresponding benefit to our people.

Mr. BUTLER. I would simply state for the information of the Senator that we have not a pound of guano in South Carolina except that imported or manufactured there; nothing but the phosphate rock found there, called the land and marine phosphates. So I do not see what this bill has to do with the phosphate interest of South Carolina, except perhaps to give the manufacturers of phosphate rock some additional ingredients with which to improve it. That is about the only interest it seems to me we have in it. There is not a pound of guano found on the coast of South Carolina or anywhere within its limits.

Mr. CONGER. The discovery of phosphate in South Carolina and some of the Gulf States is comparatively recent. The conversion of it to a powdered state for a fertilizer is still more recent. The deposit may be of great value to the agriculture of the country. I hope it will be hereafter. Up to this time the rock has been quarried and used to make riprap. You can find it at New Inlet; you can find it along the coast. I saw this rock (which might be ground and converted into a fertilizer of some considerable value) deposited as riprap to prevent the encroachment of the ocean into the river.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire where the Senator saw that?

Mr. CONGER. At New Inlet, on the Cape Fear River, the same kind of shell-rock.

Mr. BUTLER. We have some pretty enterprising men down there who are paying pretty high prices per ton for it.

Mr. CONGER. Brought from up the river, from the plantation of a Mr. French. I am acquainted in that part of the country; I want the gentleman to understand I know men by name.

Mr. BUTLER. I am glad to know the Senator is acquainted.

Mr. CONGER. I have examined it myself.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think the Senator is giving a very striking manifestation of his knowledge of phosphate rock, if he will pardon me for saying so.

Mr. CONGER. Now, sir, another point. There is no comparison in the odor or smell, no likeness between the ground rock to which the Senator alludes, the phosphate rock of the South, and guano; and yet the Senator says that in Carolina there is no guano, and that it is this ground phosphate rock; and yet let him go along the warehouses of the ports in his State and he will know that there is guano in store and along the railroads, where it is transported into the interior.

Mr. BUTLER. That is after it is manufactured.

Mr. CONGER. No; it is the guano itself. I am astonished at the assertion that no guano from the islands of the ocean is brought to Carolina to be used by the planters there.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say that.

Mr. CONGER. Well, I understood the Senator to say, and I think the RECORD will bear me out in understanding him to say, that there was no guano used in Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no. The Senator is under a very decided misapprehension as to what I said. I will simply repeat what I said, that there are no guano deposits in South Carolina. There are phosphates of rock that are manufactured and converted into what are known as commercial fertilizers, but there are no guano deposits in South Carolina. That was all I said.

Mr. CONGER. Can it be possible that the gentleman should find it necessary to inform us that the deposits of birds in tropical regions are not found in Carolina? Why did he not tell us that there was no Vesuvius in Carolina?

Mr. BUTLER. I was not informing the Senate; I was informing the Senator from Michigan, who is in a state of ignorance about it.

Mr. CONGER. Why did he not inform us that Lady Franklin Bay is not in Carolina? I know that it is generally supposed that everything is in Carolina by presumption, but who ever dreamed that there were guano deposits in Carolina, and why should the gentleman assert that there are none? That is presuming too much upon the ignorance even of myself, to say nothing of honorable members of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. I was presuming entirely upon that when I made the statement.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman says he was presuming upon my ignorance, but he should not have offended the good sense of all Senators here by rising with such dignity and solemnity and saying that there are no guano islands in Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not say that, either.

Mr. CONGER. Denying a proposition that no Senator, and no doorkeeper, and no page upon the floor, and no person in the galleries around us but what knew as well as the Senator from Carolina that there were no guano islands in Carolina. With all its grand accumulation of wealth, and glory, and honor, and representation, there are no guano islands in Carolina. The Senator tells me that he rose up in his place and made the striking remark that there were no guano islands in Carolina.

Mr. BUTLER. Very striking, Mr. President; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. CONGER. After disposing of that little by-play I come to the subject again. The material point is that this law was passed imposing great obligations upon our Government, as the debates at that time will show, reaching to a stretch of constitutional power which our constitutional lawyers then met in the best way they could by passing this law, intended to benefit the farmer and the planter of the United States, protecting those who discovered the islands, to accomplish that purpose permitting the guano from these far-off islands to come into the United States free of duty and the vessels engaged in the trade to have all the benefits of the laws protecting our coasting trade, as you will see by the provisions of the section of the Revised Statutes. It has been suspended time and again, I do not know what for heretofore, but now it is to be suspended that our friends from South Carolina may make coffer-dams in the beds of rivers and blast out rock, and if they ever find anybody enterprising enough to erect a mill, to grind it up into powder for my constituents in Michigan.

The bill ought not to pass. The people of this country ought to have some benefit of the law. The fertilizer should be brought here to give to our people the right to use it.

I make the remarks that I have made here more for the purpose of satisfying the planters of Carolina and the farmers of Michigan that at least there is one person here who will look to their interest a little in the repeal of these laws, and enable them to procure with somewhat greater facility and cheapness the best fertilizer known in the world. Let those who have different views upon it express them and repeal this beneficial law or suspend it, if they desire.

Mr. RANSOM. Mr. President, I dislike to detain the Senate for even a moment on this question. If the Senator from Michigan had done me the honor to listen to what I said he would have seen that his criticisms upon me or my friend from South Carolina, either, would not have been quite just.

I objected to the passage of the bill a week ago when the Senator from Ohio called it up, so that I might look into it and see if the interests of the farmers of the country were prejudiced thereby. As I said this morning, upon examining this measure I thought I saw in it no injury to those interests, and I felt it to be my duty to withdraw the objection which I had expressed the other day. My experience with the Senator from Michigan has taught me great prudence. As a late Senator from Kentucky once said to one of my colleagues that "the Senator from Vermont was about the last Senator with whom he would court a controversy," I may truly say that the Senator from Michigan is the last Senator with whom I would invite a colloquy in the Senate at any time. I may venture to say, however, it really seemed to me like a dream of the Senator when he alluded to the adroit and rather devious way in which the Senator from North Carolina was presenting his proposition. Afterward he seemed to be alluding to the Senators from South Carolina and not to myself. The Senator himself, usually so direct and accurate, appeared not to be very confident of his position and was evidently "varying from the pole."

But be that as it may, an investigation of this matter so far as I have been able to make it has satisfied me, as I think it will satisfy the Senate, that this prohibition will affect prejudicially the guano which is taken from the islands belonging to citizens of the United States without doing one particle of good to any farmer in our country. If I am wrong about it, I hope some Senator who is better informed will correct me, or that some person who hears this debate will correct me that I may make it right.

I do not know of any guano belonging to American citizens upon the islands discovered by them which is not of a phosphatic character. I do not know of any ammoniated guano that is brought to this country from any American possession. I am informed that nearly all the ammonia which is used in what has been termed commercial fertilizers in this country is obtained from Peruvian guano or from blood at the slaughter-houses around the great cities, and the hair, fish, and other material found in this country or imported from abroad. I am not aware of any island owned by American citizens from which what I will call ammonia-guano is exported anywhere.

My friend from South Carolina and the Senator from Ohio suggested that these guanos which were taken from our islands and brought here were essential elements in the manufacture of our home-made guanos. That may be so to a very limited extent, but my very decided impression is that those guanos are almost universally of a phosphatic character, and will not sell in this country in consequence of the competition with the phosphatic rock around Charleston for a price that will remunerate for the digging and transporting of the same. That is my belief. There have been perhaps a few cargoes of guano occasionally brought to Baltimore, to Norfolk, and to Wilmington from those islands with some trace of ammonia, but as a general rule the experiment has failed and the importation has been abandoned.

Let me say to my friend from Michigan, and I use that word in earnest, when he supposed that I was dreaming of protection even to a Carolina interest he was greatly mistaken. The principal reason that induced me to favor the measure brought forward by the Senator from Ohio was that I knew from my own experience that acid phosphates were brought here from England and sold at a competing price, and actually reduced the cost of American production. The phosphatic rock is transported from Charleston, carried to England, ground, dissolved by the application of sulphuric acid, is brought back here, and then sold at a price that compels the American manufacturer to lower his rates. There is not a manufacturer of guano in this country who can dispute that fact.

I know from the clock that if this discussion goes on we shall not have time to pass the bill this morning. I simply desire to say that as I understand it this prohibition will do no good to the American farmer, but will simply destroy the interest of the American owners of the islands. With the information just given us by the Senator from Michigan, which is in part correct and part erroneous, I hope that the phosphatic deposits which constitute the great source of the mineral fertilizers will be found in North Carolina, in South Carolina, and the other Southern States in quantities sufficient to supply for hundreds of years perhaps the whole world.

I regret to say to my friend that he is mistaken in one part of his statement just made. He did find phosphate rock in the embankments and the sea-walls around New Inlet at the mouth of the Cape Fear, but if he had inquired he would have been told that the phosphatic percentage in those rocks was too small to make their reduction and their transportation profitable. He would have found that very near the city of Wilmington Mr. French, of whom he speaks, an intelligent and energetic citizen of our State, is making lime from that rock on a very large scale. And had he pursued his inquiries he would have learned that there had been other discoveries of phosphate deposits in that part of North Carolina which promised great results.

But, Mr. President, I can not see and the Senate will not see the justice or the propriety of compelling our citizens to import phosphatic guanos to Charleston when Charleston last year exported over two hundred thousand tons of phosphates to Europe.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CONGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

OFFICIAL GAZETTE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Printing be, and the same is hereby, instructed to inquire into the economy and feasibility of the publication of an "Official Gazette of the United States," to contain the advertisements for proposals for contracts, the general orders and announcements by the heads of the Executive Departments, the more important appointments, and such other matter as is now published by the different branches of Government as advertisements or in special sheets; and that the expense of the present methods of giving such information to the public be given in detail.

NATIONAL BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the bill (S. 1155) to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations be made the special order for Wednesday of next week at 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to making the special order suggested by the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair repeat the request?

Mr. HAWLEY. I did not understand what the proposition was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware will please restate the exact object of his request.

Mr. BAYARD. The bill which I desire to make a special order, at the suggestion of certain Senators around me who propose to debate it, is a bill to provide for the issue of circulating notes to national banking associations. It is one of a good deal of public interest, and I think it is well to have it fixed, if we may, for discussion at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to making the bill the special order for the hour and day named by the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. ALLISON. And to be continued until disposed of? Is that the idea of the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would become necessarily the unfinished business.

Mr. ALLISON. It may be ousted by some other bill. I think it ought to be disposed of, however.

Mr. BAYARD. There will be no bill in the way, I think. The time is a week from to-morrow.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the special order will be so noted.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the second amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes, and had agreed to the first amendment of the Senate to the said bill with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 116) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees and other employés of the House of Representatives shall begin; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEFICIENCIES.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the table the appropriation bill from the House of Representatives in order that I may move a concurrence in the House amendment. It will take but a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Is there objection to considering the proposition suggested by the Senator from Iowa at this time? The Chair hears none. The Chief Clerk will report the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House concur in the second amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3949) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes, and concur in the first amendment of the Senate to the said bill, with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment add:

"Provided, That the whole sum appropriated by this paragraph shall not exceed $20,000."

Mr. ALLISON. This amendment suggested by the House makes more clear and definite what was intended by the Senate; therefore I move a concurrence in the House amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. CONGER, in section 3, line 6, after the word "act," to strike out the words "when the person testifying is dead;" so as to make the clause read:

Shall be admitted in evidence in all trials under this act so far as the subject-matter thereof is competent evidence.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, the reasons assigned by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] yesterday against the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] are sufficient to my mind, and I shall not take up the time of the Senate in discussing that amendment. It simply undertakes to reverse all the rules of evidence known upon that particular idea to the courts and to the law of the country. That has been, I think, sufficiently answered already.

The bill before the Senate in its general aspect is a very important bill, and involves possibly some of the most delicate and important questions that a bill could present to the Senate—questions which I think should a long time since have been settled by a proceeding like the one that is now contemplated in this bill. The chief difficulty I imagine that exists at this day in reference to the adjustment of these land claims arises from the fact that a judicial tribunal, strictly speaking, was not intrusted with their settlement from the start, not only in the particular area of country embraced by this bill, but also in that which was embraced in California, which took in land grants of this character, and which were attempted to be disposed of by the acts of 1851 and 1853.

The litigation that the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo brought to our country and to our courts has been, I think, the most remarkable that has ever been witnessed in any country, and it should have been concluded many years since. It is now thirty years since the first important case found its way from the land commission in California to the courts there on appeal from that commission and to the Supreme Court of the United States, and from that time almost continuously up to the present day cases in great number, involving an immense deal of property, arising under the treaty have come to the courts, and they have been determined with a singular uniformity upon the main proposition that is involved in this bill.

If you go back to the first important case that came up involving the construction of the treaty and of the rights and duties and obligations of the United States arising under the treaty in reference to private land claims, you will find that the law has been laid down with great clearness, with great strictness, and has been adhered to as laid down in that case with a singular uniformity, with as little variation as it is possible for courts to vary upon such important questions as were involved in the case. I allude to the historic case of Frémont, which was known as the Mariposa grant in California, which was referred to by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. I beg leave to refer to it a little more at large in order to get at the vein, that in my mind runs through the entire system of land grants coming to us under the treaty with Mexico. I read from that case as reported in 17 Howard, page 556:

This brief statement—

Says the judge delivering the opinion—

This brief statement of the facts in these cases shows that the parties had acquired no right, legal or equitable, to these lands under the Spanish Government. The instruments under which they claimed were evidently not intended as donations of the land, as a matter of favor to the individual, or as a reward for services rendered to the public. They were intended to promote the settlement of the Territories and to advance its prosperity. But up to the time when Spain ceded them, the parties had done nothing to accomplish the object or to carry out the policy of the government. They had evidently no claim, therefore, upon the justice or conscience of the Spanish Government. It had not granted them the land, and they had done nothing which, in equity, bound that government to make them a title. And when Spain ceded the Territories to the United States, it held these lands as public domain as fully and amply as if those concessions or authorities had never been given; and the United States received the title in the same full and ample manner; neither the legal nor equitable right to them, as public domain, had been impaired by any act of the Spanish authority, nor had any right been conveyed to or vested in the claimants.

* * * * * * *

There can be no question as to the power of the governor of California to make the grant; and it appears to have been made according to the regular forms and usages of the Mexican law. It has conditions attached to it, but these are conditions subsequent. And the first point to be decided is whether the grant vested in Alvarado any present and immediate interest; and, if it did, then, secondly, whether anything done or omitted to be done by him during the existence of the Mexican Government in California forfeited the interest he had acquired and revested it in the government?

* * * * * * *

It is argued that the description is so vague and uncertain that nothing passed by the grant, and that he had no vested interest until the land was surveyed and the part intended to be granted severed by lines or known boundaries from the public domain. But this objection cannot be maintained. It is true—

This is the point to which I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who by his argument made the impression upon my mind that if there was any semblance of a claim, or any mere promise of a claim, or anything looking toward a claim, or staggering toward a claim, the Government of the United States was bound to protect that under the treaty with Mexico. Now, say the court—

It is true that if any other person within the limits where the quantity granted to Alvarado was to be located had afterward obtained a grant from the Government by specific boundaries before Alvarado had made his survey, the title of the latter grantee could not be impaired by any subsequent survey of Alvarado. As between the individual claimants from the Government the title of a party who had obtained a grant for the specific land would be a superior and a better one. For by the general grant to Alvarado the Government did not bind itself to make no other grant within the territory described until he had made his survey. But as between him and the Government he had a vested interest in the quantity of land mentioned in the grant. The right to so much land, to be afterward laid off by official authority, in the territory described passed from the Government to him by the execution of the instrument granting it. (Frémont vs. United States, 17 Howard, 556-558.)

The Government, says the court, did not consent that Alvarado should have an indefinite and an uncertain claim, to be located and fixed so far as he and a second claimant were concerned at his pleasure, but as between him and the Government he had such a claim; that before he segregated it from the public domain, before he had it marked by proper boundaries, all that country lying between the mountain and the river upon the one and the other side was not subject to his choice; that the Government did not compel itself and bind itself to refrain from selling public land simply because there was an indefinite and an uncertain and an unlocated claim somewhere upon that particular domain.

While it is true that under the treaty the United States simply took the position of the Mexican Government in reference to these claims, yet she took no more than that position. The idea that seems to exist in the minds of some Senators that a mere promise or a mere effort, if you please, to make out a claim is such a title as the Government must respect, has never been sustained in any of the cases from that of Frémont down to the one hundred and fifth volume of the United States Reports, and claims have come to the Supreme Court from the tribunals out there involving millions and millions, and countless millions almost.

As I said before, there is no deviation from this ruling by the Supreme Court in the Frémont case, but it has been followed up. I shall weary the Senate only by a reference to one or two of the chief cases.

Very soon afterward, in 22 Howard, came the case of Teschmaker, and that was a claim by the bye, for sixteen square leagues. The commission ruled against the claim, the court in California reversed the ruling, and the Supreme Court of the United States reversed that ruling and remanded the case. In deciding that the court says—I read the syllabus:

Where none of the preliminary steps required by the act of 1824 and regulations of 1828.

As stated by the Senator from Delaware, there ran clear through these entire grants, and from the foundation of them, the law of 1824 and the regulations of 1828 made under those laws.

Mr. BAYARD. The law of 1823.

Mr. GARLAND. But the law of 1824 was simply amendatory of the act of 1823, carrying it out, and it is called the act of 1824, I notice, in all these cases, with the regulations of 1828 made under them.

Where none of the preliminary steps required by the act of 1824 and regulations of 1828 have been observed or shown, as there required, previous to the grant, and no record of the title, as also there required, and but slight evidence of possession, either as to value or permanency, the proof of the genuineness of the official signatures to the grant is not sufficient. Evidence, under the circumstances of grants in California, should be given so as to make the antedating of the grant irreconcilable with the weight of the proof; otherwise, there can be no protection against imposition and fraud.

The record of the title must be shown or its absence accounted for to the satisfaction of the court. (United States vs. Teschmaker et al., 22 Howard, 392.)

That is but a continuation of the doctrine as laid down in the Frémont case. There came pretty soon afterward in 23 Howard the case of United States vs. Rose et al., in which the court say:

We agree that every species of title that originated in the rightful exercise of legitimate authority, and existed under the safeguard of Mexican laws at the date of the acquisition of California by the United States, is protected by the treaty of cession. The change of the government does not alter the relations of the inhabitants in this particular. This court is charged with the duty, in the last resort, to recognize the validity of all such claims. But it is the duty of the court to distingish between rights acquired under the laws and usages of Mexico and claims depending upon the mere pleasure of those who were in power—between the vested estate and the hope or expectation of favor or bounty. The license of the governor to the applicant to make a temporary occupation until he could inform himself, so as to act considerately or intelligently, we think, can not be treated as conferring a property in the land. (23 Howard, 272, 273.)

So it is not true that the mere efforts at a title, the mere promise of a title, or the mere expectation of a title, to use the language of the court, is such a right as the Government of the United States under this treaty could protect.

Following immediately afterwards is the Osio case in the same volume in which the same doctrine is enunciated. In passing I may say that out of the case of Rose came the celebrated claim of General Sutter, who followed it from time to time through the courts, before the commission, and before Congress until finally the old man died and left his claim still, so far as the merits of it are concerned, undetermined. But these particular portions of it as ruled upon by the Supreme Court are ignored under the treaty as amounting to nothing.

Following on down through the cases that the Senator from Delaware read, the Carpenter and the Montgomery cases in 13 Wallace, the Rodrigues case in 1 Wallace, and the historic case of McGarrahan, to which I will make a more extended allusion after a while, this has been the doctrine as announced first by the Supreme Court. Therefore, closing up at last in the ninety-fifth volume of United States Reports, in what they determined to be juridical possession under one of these claims, there is no gap left upon which a difference could be found, in my judgment, so as to make out a claim under this bill as it contemplates it should be made out to meet with the requirements of these well-adjudicated cases.

In the case of Van Reynegan, in the ninety-fifth volume, the court says:

The grant is not set forth in the record; but we must presume that it was in the ordinary form of grants made by former governors of California, under the Mexican colonization law of 1824, as under no other law were those governors empowered to make grants of the public domain.

This opinion was delivered by Judge Field, who passed also upon many of these cases in the district court in California and in the supreme court of the State of California, where they came legitimately before him.

Those grants were sometimes of tracts designated by well-defined boundaries, sometimes of a specified quantity of land lying within extreme boundaries embracing a greater amount, and sometimes of places by name where these were well known and thus capable of ready identification. All of them were made subject to the approval of the assembly of the department; and, until they received such approval, the estate granted was liable to be defeated.

That was the doctrine enunciated in the Teschmaker case that I read from 22 Howard.

And, when the approval was obtained, there was another proceeding to be taken, which was essential to the complete investiture of title, and that was, a formal delivery of possession of the property by a magistrate of the vicinage, called, in the language of the country, the delivery of juridical possession. This proceeding involved the establishment of the boundaries of the tract, when there was any uncertainty repecting them. If these were designated in the grant, it required their ascertainment and identification; if they were not thus designated, it required the measurement of the quantity granted and its segregation from the public domain. The regulations prescribed by law for the guidance of the magistrate in these matters made it his duty to preserve a record of the various steps taken in the proceeding, to have the same attested by the assisting witnesses, and to deliver an authentic copy to the grantee.

Ordinarily the boundaries thus established would be accepted as conclusive by our Government. Unless there is something in the decree of confirmation otherwise limiting the extent or the form of the tract, they should control the officers of the United States in making their surveys. (95 United States Reports, 34, 35.)

Now at last the court comes to a definition of what is meant by juridical possession, which was stated the other day by the Senator from Delaware. When a claim is of that character it is a complete and a consummated claim. As a matter of course this bill does not attempt to deal with claims of that sort. Whoever may have a claim of that character can stand upon his claim and bid defiance to any assailers. It is not intended to deal with claims of that character, that are complete, that are perfected, but it is these inchoate, incomplete titles in which something else is yet to be done. That is the purport of the bill, and that is as far as it pretends to go.

Then going from a complete or perfect grant, if we look at Miller vs. Dale (92 United States Reports, 473), we shall find a definition of a floating grant as distinguished, and upon the consummation of which the Government does not wait in disposing of the public domain; and in passing on this the Supreme Court go back to Frémont's case (17 Howard), and Henshaw's case (18 Wallace).

I made an allusion a few moments ago to the McGarrahan case. If there is one thing in the world which has occurred in this country to show the necessity of a proceeding of the character proposed by the bill it is the history of the case of McGarrahan. That case has been five times before the Supreme Court of the United States, three times in the name of Gomez, the original claimant, under whom McGarrahan claims, and twice in the name of McGarrahan himself. It is still pending before Congress, and upon a mere question at last whether the conditions subsequent have been complied with in order to identify his claim to the Panoche Grande in California. It is now thirty-odd years since the claim first made its appearance in the judicial tribunals or the quasi-judicial tribunals of the country, and it has been hanging entirely upon that one point. It is not for me to pass any judgment, and I am not attempting to do so, upon the claim, but I simply say that the long, the tedious, and the wearisome proceedings attending that case are sufficient to justify the calling in at last of the eye-glasses of a court to scrutinize these claims and try them by strict and unbending rules of evidence and the unbending laws of the country pertaining to grants of this character. Twice that case came to the Supreme Court upon a mere muddle, if I may use the expression, as to the regularity of the proceedings in perfecting the appeal to the district court of California, and still McGarrahan is before Congress asking for relief here.

Commissions have been tried. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] the other day gave very good reasons why a commission would not answer this purpose. The Supreme Court in the case of Rodrigues, cited the other day by the Senator from Delaware, showed that a commission would not do to try these cases. So far as the surveyor-general is concerned the litigation that has come here from New Mexico with the statement made by the Senator from Oregon the other day is sufficient to show that such proceedings will not do to dispose of these grants. When a surveyor-general reports any one of these cases, being simply a mere agent to collect the testimony and to certify it to Congress, Congress having to pass upon it, there is a finality of it when it is so passed upon. In the one hundred and third volume of the United States Reports the case of Adams vs. Norris was decided, and that decision precludes all question afterward. But why bring them before Congress, as these claims have been resting here, the McGarrahan claim and the Sutter claim and a hundred others that could be named, when really it is the object and desire of the country, it seems to me, to get them out of Congress and send them somewhere else?

Our formerly respected colleague in this body Judge Davis of Illinois rendered the decision of the Supreme Court in Tameling vs. The United States (93 United States Reports, 661), where it was held that patents were quitclaims merely, and confirmations by Congress on the report of the surveyor-general were final.

This bill proposes, as the Supreme Court has decided repeatedly in reference to the California grants, that no title emanating from the Government shall be anything more than a mere quitclaim. She does not undertake to defend and to warrant the title, but she merely makes a quitclaim, as has been decided repeatedly was the operation of a deed or patent under the California grants on the cases tried coming through the commission in California.

If there is any use in this country for a court, if there is any such part of the Government that is necessary, let me ask what more important questions and what more necessary questions than considering treaties, considering grants of land, could be submitted to a court, and what higher purpose is there of a court in the country than to pass upon such questions as these? Here are the laws of nations, the relative rights and duties and obligations springing out of this treaty and the land laws of the country from its earliest history to the present day, and all the various commissions that have been organized for the unsettled lands of Louisiana, of Missouri, and of Arkansas, which have got to come up and be considered parallel with this matter.

How much better can a right be secured or guaranteed than through the ordeal of a judicial tribunal where you can compel the attendance of witnesses, where you can have the benefit of cross-examination, and subject witnesses to the test of all the rules and laws of testimony and of the duty of proceeding in courts proper, with the right of appeal guaranteed amply, as this bill does?

I can not see that there can be one particle of objection to the bill. Of course it is not a perfect bill, as it could not be, especially after delaying so long a time as this to prepare and to frame and to pass such a bill as this should be. If we are to go on without a settlement of these land claims, unless something of this sort is resorted to, we are to go on so far as we can now calculate to an indefinite period of time, longer even than we have been going on since the acquisition of this great territory; because in point of fact, as I understand, the real settlement of these matters, the real adjustment of them has not yet been touched.

Mr. BAYARD. And the necessity for a decision is increasing every day.

Mr. GARLAND. As suggested by the Senator from Delaware the necessity of a decision of them is increasing every day. We want Congress to be relieved of this kind of labor. It is not legislative labor in fact, but it is the purest and the most essential of judicial labor.

Although the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] was voted down, still I wish to make allusion to that. So far as I can see, running through these entire cases there has been but one claim propounded that was over eleven leagues, the limit mentioned in the bill. Running back through the decisions relating to all these grants, to the acts of 1823 and 1824, as described in one case, the act of 1824 and the rules and regulations of 1828, as described in another, it is singular that they all point to the eleven leagues. But, as suggested by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] yesterday, if any one has a greater claim than that, he can propound that to Congress and let Congress in its conscience and sense of equity do what it thinks best.

Something was said the other day in reference to the third clause of section 12, the mining feature. That has become a very important matter, and I think that the bill upon that point is eminently proper. Some Senator, I have forgotten who, objected the other day to it. I hold the one hundred and seventh volume of the United States Reports in my hand, and here is the case of McLaughlin vs. The United States. The court in deciding that case says:

> This being the first case of the kind in this court, a class of cases which may possibly be indefinitely multiplied, it is to be regretted that it was not more fully presented in the circuit court. Many interesting questions might arise in this class of cases not proper to be considered in this case. For instance, the nature and extent of mineral found in the land granted or patented which will bring it within the designation of mineral land in the various acts of Congress, in which it is excepted out of grants to railroad companies, and forbidden to be sold or pre-empted as ordinary or agricultural lands are.
> Suppose that when such land has been conveyed by the Government, it is afterward discovered that it contains valuable deposits of the precious metals, unknown to the patentee or to the officers of the Government at the time of the conveyance, will such subsequent discovery enable the Government to sustain a suit to set aside the patent or the grant?

This is a very important matter, the patent being given ordinarily under the existing laws, and it is afterward discovered that the tract contains valuable minerals. "Will such subsequent discovery," says the court, "enable the Government to sustain a suit to set aside the patent or the grant?"

> If so, what are the rights of innocent purchasers from the grantee, and what limitations exist upon the exercise of the Government's right? We can answer none of these questions here, and can only order that the decree below be affirmed.

This bill, whether this decision was before those who framed it or not, seems to provide for the contingency that the court suggests and the query propounded by the court upon that point. I think the bill is eminently proper and wise and meets here the very difficulty pointed out by the court, which necessarily would if left open be a very serious matter to the Government and possibly to innocent purchasers as stated.

I wish now to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to one or two points in the bill somewhat specifically. In section 2, from line 35 down to line 40, after providing for appeals, the bill reads:

> Which supreme court shall retry the cause, as well the issues or questions of facts as of law, and may hear testimony in addition to that given in the court below, and may amend the record of the proceedings below as truth and justice may require.

I am not satisfied with that provision in the bill, although I favor the bill in the main, and I wish the Senator from Delaware, at some time before we finish the consideration of the measure, would explain the necessity of it. We know that the Supreme Court is an appellate court, as a rule, and in cases of appeal it does nothing but examine the record to see whether any error of law has been committed. I mean now as to the law of a case proper; but there should be a very good reason for letting them retry a case, it seems to me, and burdening them in that way by trying a case de novo in that court. I would much prefer, from my knowledge of the proceedings of that court and of litigation generally, that the court should be held simply to be an appellate court to, dispose of questions of law arising in the record.

Mr. BAYARD. Would it be convenient for the Senator for me to reply now?

Mr. GARLAND. Perfectly convenient, if the Senator will do so.

Mr. BAYARD. Perhaps this is as good a time as any other to make such a reply as I am best able to do.

In the first place, the Senator is aware of the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. Of course the testimony is taken there, and taken there first; so that all the means of obtaining testimony, the machinery for it, under the rules of the court already exist. It is true that as an appellate court usually testimony is not taken in the court above; it relies upon the error of the instructions of the court below, upon the action of the court below or upon the testimony as it is contained in the record sent up. At the same time, in admiralty proceedings the Senator is aware that the circuit court and the Supreme Court of the United States sitting in appeal do retry the case to the extent of taking new testimony. That is a matter of the practice of that court. Why they should make the admiralty proceedings an exception to their common practice I will not state.

I remember that when this objection was urged by a Senator, I believe then from New York, at the time this bill was discussed last, in 1881, the reply was made by Judge Davis, then a Senator from Illinois, that it was frequently the case in the Supreme Court that they took additional testimony.

In the present case I suppose it was from that abundance of caution which the experience of the trial of this class of cases has shown to be necessary. In point of truth, forgery of title, forgery of handwriting, of depositions, has become a fine art in these titles of Spanish and Mexican origin. That is the language used by the land commission, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which he speaks of this modern art growing in its dexterity for the manufacture of ancient titles. Oftentimes the fraud that might be successful in one court or for a limited period is capable of detection and exposure by the transfer to a new tribunal with a little longer period.

One of the cases to which the Senator has referred (and I will not name it, for I desire to do no prejudice), a case from the district court of California, was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the discovery of the collusion and fraud of a district attorney of the United States in procuring the confirmation of a title by the district court on appeal from the California land commission in which he himself was a party half in interest. That is but one illustration of the class of cases we are to meet growing out of the unsettled and the vague and the naturally fraudulent results of the California and Mexican acquisition.

The Senator will remember how, many years ago, Mr. Stanton, afterward the Secretary of War, was sent out as a special agent of the United States Government to California to examine into the exact condition of the so-called archives of the Mexican Government, and the condition of land titles as there registered under their very loose form. He came back, and I well remember the class of legislation he suggested, and it found its way under his recommendation on the statute-books, creating special remedies to meet the peculiar class of crimes committed under their loose form of recording land titles and the like. The frauds in those titles were almost infinite in number and infinite in variety.

From the growth of such a soil as that, and with the dangers which we have seen flowing from such a source, it is a wise precaution, I submit to my friend from Arkansas, and one that for no light reason should be abandoned, that up to the very finality of decision there should be the means of the most full and plenary proof, the means of detecting these ingenious frauds, and the means of giving the court having jurisdiction to try also the jurisdiction to take new testimony to meet the case. I submit to the Senator that the provision in question was to my knowledge carefully debated and considered by gentlemen in the committee who I know possess his especial confidence; and they believed that it was not unusual, or that it was not a matter without precedent and useful precedent, to allow the Supreme Court to take new testimony and retry the case upon new facts as well as upon the law.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. President, I had noticed the provision in this bill whenever it came before the Senate, and I never before heard the particular reasons given and I had not in my mind really worked them out. It is such an innovation upon the existing law and the rule as distinguished from law that I desired very much to have an explanation of it. The parallel as to the matter of admiralty would not hold. It is not worth while to enter into a discussion with the Senator from Delaware upon that to show the peculiar reasons appertaining to admiralty proceedings why certain things should not be done. The reasoning applicable to admiralty cases can not be applied to a proceeding of this character; but when the Senator speaks of the imposition by false testimony and frauds of other descriptions perpetrated in connection with Mexican and Spanish land grants, he strikes something that I am somewhat familiar with by the reading of these cases. In the case of Castillero, which is reported in 2 Black, I think—I have not got it here—which takes up two-thirds of the volume, the Supreme Court is greatly troubled all the time by false testimony. So in one of the cases in 22 or 23 Howard that I read from a few moments ago. As a guarantee against all this, as a protection, I will make no objection to the provision, but it is something that did not strike me favorably on the mere reading of it. Still, it having been reported so often by this committee based on the idea suggested by the Senator from Delaware to protect against false swearing and false proceedings of every character attached to these claims, I am willing to let it go.

Now, I wish to call the Senator's attention to another matter, as to the limitation in this bill of three years. Did it occur to the committee, or has it occurred to the Senator from Delaware, that it would be well to put in the ordinary reservation of the rights of married women, minors, &c.? I think that should be put in, the ordinary exception to statutes of limitation. I do not wish to offer it as an amendment, but I suggest it to the Senator from Delaware, unless good reasons to the contrary have presented themselves to the committee, that a saving clause of that character should be put in to this limitation. I agree with him and with the committee that a limitation should be fixed, and three years would be sufficient to work up these claims, because within this length of time no person, unless it be a married woman or a minor or some one beyond sea, could be taken unaware, could be said not to have notice of this proceeding.

So while I am perfectly willing that the three years' limitation should be placed in the bill, I think the Senator himself will agree to have the usual exception, unless some very good reasons have been given to the committee of which I have not the benefit.

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose, as a matter of fact, that the claims having been so ancient, as the obligation of the United States dates back to 1848 in regard to these Territories and thirty-six years having passed, the statute of limitations ought to have been, as the Senator well says, adopted long ago. Much of the trouble in this case, a great deal of the trouble now existing is that the lands have grown to great value, and therefore the litigation over them is stimulated. Therefore, to put the limitation now at three years was thought to be a very liberal time. I can say, however, that if there are the rights of minors or persons under legal disability I do not know that there is any reason why the usual exception which accompanies most statutes of limitation should not be put in the bill.

Mr. GARLAND. I think it would be better to put it in, to make a good, safe bill, and I suggest it to the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. From the general character of the grants it may be that there are no minors to be affected.

Mr. GARLAND. Now a few words in regard to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], and I shall have said all that I care to submit to the Senate. This is an amendment, I think, of some importance and some value to the bill, offered by the Senator from Missouri.

That the Attorney-General of the United States, for the purpose of correcting the boundaries of any survey where said boundaries are incorrect, is hereby empowered to authorize the use of the name of the United States as plaintiff, and to order suits in all cases where he becomes satisfied that false and fraudulent surveys have been made, so as to embrace lands by said fraudulent surveys which do not fairly and honestly belong to the tract or tracts of land covered by the grant; and this rule shall apply to all grants where the tract has been enlarged by false and fraudulent surveys. And it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to order suits for the forfeiture of such grants, or their correction, so as to make them embrace only the lands properly covered by said grants, in all cases where the tracts of land covered by the grants have been enlarged by such fraudulent surveys.

I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri to make that general, whether these grants have been enlarged by fraudulent surveys or enlarged by fraud of any sort, so that there is a larger claim than there should be, it should be corrected by proper proceedings. It should be, as the law says, reformed and brought down to the proper dimensions, so that if there are claimants to the other portion of it they can assert their claims; or, if not, it should fall back into the public domain, where it legitimately belongs. In some of these cases, as in the Sutter claim, there were half a dozen different claimants seeking to identify the property.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask my friend why should not such a provision as this be put in a general public law? Why should it be confined to the Territories named?

Mr. GARLAND. I admit that.

Mr. BAYARD. Therefore it had better be the subject of a separate act.

Mr. GARLAND. I admit that; but I was speaking to the case in hand, the proposition before us. If the amendment is to go in at all, I think the Senator from Missouri had better modify it in the way I have stated.

I have said all that I care to say upon this bill and the different amendments suggested to it. I think the bill wise, and one that should be passed. It is high time we should put this matter in some definite shape to get rid of it by a judicial inquiry, and not by dealing with commissions and before Congress. We should relieve Congress of this burden which does not legitimately belong to it. If any claims under the seventh clause of the twelfth section of the bill should overlap and go beyond eleven leagues, that would be a matter which Congress would have discretion to act upon and according to its best judgment to deal with. I think the bill embraces everything else that is right and proper, and is about as good a bill as we are likely to get, and I hope it will meet the approbation of the Senate.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I want to say a word in reply to some remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], and I do not propose to discuss the bill any further. It is very evident that unless there is some radical change in the indifference of the Senate to this bill, which has been discussed for several days, it is to go through as it was reported by the committee, without reference to its merits.

The Senator from Arkansas, to whom I always listen with great pleasure, asserts what every lawyer knows to be a fact, that the people in the Territory acquired by the United States from Mexico under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and under the Gadsden purchase have the same rights, by international law and the provisions of those treaties, under this Government that they had under the Government of Mexico. Their property rights and titles are in fact the same, and any enactment by Congress which takes away from them one scintilla of their proprietary interest or title is an absolute violation not only of international law, but of the plain provisions of the treaties.

This being conceded by all lawyers to be the fact, what do we find in this bill? The scheme of the bill, if I may so speak, the legislative scheme, is to put all these questions as to title and as to these grants before the Federal courts for adjudication and settlement.

The Senator from Delaware may be right in his construction of the colonization act of 1824 of Mexico or I may be right. I may concede that he is right, but different constructions have been put upon that law in regard to the limitation to eleven square leagues of land. Why, I ask—and I have heard no answer to it, and I have listened to the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Arkansas and I have never heard any answer to the question—why is that inquiry taken away from this judicial tribunal? Why is not the question left open for adjudication in the Federal courts as to what was the real meaning of the colonization act of 1824? This committee undertake to say by this clause that the Federal courts shall not pass on the meaning of that law. They put upon us an iron rule, that never in any case shall any claimant, no matter how he claims, under a grant from the King of Spain or under the colonization act of Mexico of 1824, take more than eleven square leagues of land? Is not that a judicial question? Is not the construction and meaning of the Mexican act of 1824 a question for the courts? All these are judicial questions, which are left to the courts, the Senator says, and yet this bill cuts off this identical question, says that not more than eleven square leagues shall be granted, and we are told that is perfectly right and proper. If the Senator from Delaware were not the author of the bill, the father of it, I should be inclined to say that the whole bill is a fraud. What right has this committee now to step in and hermetically seal the lips of the court on the meaning of the act of Congress of Mexico of 1824, and yet say to the country and to Congress, "We want the judicial determination of all the questions at issue?" The Supreme Court of the United States, from Peters's Reports down to Wallace's Reports, has decided that by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo these people are entitled to that land, with the same rights they held as Mexican citizens.

Now as to the mining clause. I had some connection once with a case in which I was called upon to examine one of these Spanish grants, and I became somewhat familiar with the legislation and decisions on the subject. We have in this bill one of the most remarkable provisions which I have seen in any legislation before Congress. The bill provides in the third clause of section 12:

Third. No allowance or confirmation of any claim shall confer any right or title to any gold, silver, or quicksilver mines or minerals of the same, unless the grant claimed effected the donation or sale of such mines or minerals to the grantee, or unless such grantee has become otherwise entitled thereto in law or in equity; but all such mines and minerals shall remain the property of the United States, with the right of working the same, which fact shall be stated in any patents issued under this act.

I undertake to say that that is an innovation upon the practice of the Government of the United States in issuing patents for land within our jurisdiction. The unvaried practice of the United States has been that when a patent is issued to a grantee it covers everything upon the surface and under the surface. It did so in the Galena lead mines; it did so in the mines in my own State of Missouri; it has always been so. And over and above that I say that was not the law of Mexico, and this Congress has no right to enact and put upon the statute-book any enactment which takes away one particle of the mining rights of any citizen upon this ceded territory.

What was the law of Mexico in regard to mines and minerals? Under the custom of the grants from the Crown of Spain all mines, all mining privileges, particularly gold and silver and precious metals, were reserved to the king.

SECTION 1

I read from the mining laws of Spain—

SECTION 1. The mines are the property of my royal crown, as well by their nature and origin as by their reunion, declared by the fourth law of the thirteenth title of the sixth book of the new compilation (of laws and statutes).

SEC. 2. Without separating them from my royal patrimony, I grant them to my subjects in property and possession, in such manner that they may sell, exchange (pass by will, either in the way of inheritance or legacy), or in any other manner dispose of all their property in them, upon the terms on which they themselves possess it, and to persons legally capable of acquiring it.

SEC. 3. Be it undexstood that this grant is made upon two conditions: First, that they (my subjects) shall pay to my royal treasury the proportion of metal reserved thereto; and, secondly, that they shall carry on their operations in the mine subject to the provisions of these ordinances, on failure of which, at any time, the mines of persons so making default shall be considered as forfeited, and may be granted to any person who shall denounce them accordingly.

That was the old Spanish law and is now the Mexican law. Section 14 of the laws of Mexico provides:

SEC. 14. Any one may discover and denounce a vein, not only on common land, but also on the property of any individual, provided he pays for the extent of surface above the same, and the damage which immediately ensues therefrom, according to the valuation of surveyors on both sides, and arbitration in case of disagreement; the same is to be understood with regard to denouncing convenient places for erecting establishments, and also waters for moving the machines employed for the reduction of ores, commonly called reducing establishments (haciendas), provided in each case that no more of the water be used than is necessary for such purposes.

That is the law of Mexico. That was the law at the time of the negotiation of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. What does the bill say? This bill gives the title to all the mines on any land, after the patent issues, to the Government of the United States forever.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator desires, I suppose, to get the whole of the law. I would refer him to the Mexican act of the 8th of November, 1846; he will find it at page 634 of Rockwell's Spanish and Mexican Law, title mines and mining:

SEC. 31. The confederation reserves to itself the mines discovered and to be discovered in the public lands, and which were not known at the time the lands may have been entered.

I take that to be a refutation, full and complete, of the Senator's position.

Mr. VEST. I do not understand that to be the law of Mexico. I do not understand it to have been the old Spanish law. The Senator says that was an act of two years before the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

Mr. BAYARD. Two years before the treaty.

Mr. VEST. At any rate, whether the Senator be right or myself, one thing is very certain, that if there was a reservation of the mines of the gold or silver in lands, the grants from Mexico or from Spain did not reserve the surface of the ground. I take it the Senator from Delaware will not dispute the Mexican law to be that any citizen could denounce a mine on public lands, if he pleased, or on the land of individuals. I ask the Senator from Delaware if that is not the Mexican law?

Mr. BAYARD. The Mexican law in regard to mining and our own differ. They had a regular system of mining laws. Whether they extended or not to the territory embraced by this bill, I can not answer. When the bill was under discussion before, it was asked why not combine with this special act provisions respecting the mines, and the answer was that it was better for us to make that the subject of a separate general regulation, not to mingle the question of the land grants with the question of the mineral grants except to reserve them to the United States so that they might be treated according to the general law on this subject. It is clear that the Spanish grant did not convey minerals. Under the Spanish law and under the Mexican law it did not convey the minerals, but on the contrary by express provision the ownership of minerals was expressly reserved in all cases.

Mr. VEST. In the case of Frémont vs. The United States (17 Howard, page 565) the court said:

In relation to that part of the argument which disputes his right upon the ground that his grant embraces mines of gold or silver it is sufficient to say that, under the mining laws of Spain, the discovery of a mine of gold or silver did not destroy the title of the individual to the land granted. The only question before the court is the validity of the title.

That was a Spanish grant; but under this act proposed now to be enacted what is the result of the legislation? All the surface of the grant is reserved to the United States for the purpose of working the minerals upon it. Where is the limitation of this right? Twenty-five thousand years from now any citizen can enter on that land, put somebody else to work that mine, and under my patent I can not say a word. I presume there are cases in which grants of land under the old Spanish Government have remained in the family, not twenty-five thousand years, but they have remained there for centuries. There is no limitation upon this right, none whatever. I say that that is not the Mexican law, nor was it the Spanish law. In neither case was this the practice.

But, Mr. President, it is useless to discuss this question. I simply desired to say what I thought in regard to these two clauses. I expect to vote against the bill in its present condition.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to make a very few remarks on the bill. The questions raised in the bill are matters which have long, in my judgment, been settled in the legislation of the country. In the case of the acquisition of Florida these questions all arose and received very full consideration. The Supreme Court in 1840, in the case of The United States vs. Wiggins, decided in regard to a treaty entirely similar in all respects to that of Guadalupe Hidalgo with Mexico in respect to public lands—

That the perfect titles made by Spain before the 24th of January, 1818, within the ceded territory are "intrinsically valid and exempt from the provisions of the eighth article is the established doctrine of this court, and that they need no sanction from the legislative or judicial departments of this country." (The United States vs. Wiggins, 14 Peters, page 351.)

That was an affirmation that wherever the grant was a completed grant, wherever the parties were in possession, the court had judicial cognizance, and the treaty being the supreme law, the right of the parties was established, so conclusively established, that the Supreme Court used the following language in 1833 in the case of The United States vs. Percheman:

A cession of territory is never understood to be a cession of the property belonging to its inhabitants. The king cedes that only which belonged to him. Lands he had previously granted were not his to cede. Neither party could so understand the cession; neither party could consider itself as attempting a wrong to individuals condemned by the practice of the whole civilized world. The cession of a territory by its name from one sovereign to another, conveying the compound idea of surrendering at the same time the lands and the people who inhabit them, would be necessarily understood to pass the sovereignty only, and not to interfere with private property. (United States vs. Percheman, 7 Peters, page 87.)

In regard to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, proposing that commissioners should be appointed, the court long ago declared that the judicial department of the Government was the only department which could finally decide upon the private rights, upon the grants, the possession of which was already complete. The defective point in many of the grants was that the land had not been separated from the public domain before the treaty, and that act of separation under the Spanish law was decided by the Supreme Court to be necessary, and all the grants in the Territory, which is now the subject of this bill, before becoming perfect grants required separation from the public domain and survey by the public authority. The court say upon this subject:

It would seem from the title of the act and from this declaratory section that the object for which these commissioners were appointed was the ascertainment of these claims and titles. That they constituted a board of inquiry, not a court exercising judicial powers and deciding finally on titles. By the act "for the establishment of a territorial government in Florida," previously passed at the same session, superior courts had been established in East and West Florida, whose jurisdiction extended to the trial of civil causes between individuals. These commissioners seem to have been appointed for the special purpose of procuring promptly for Congress that information which was required for the immediate operations of the land office. In pursuance of this idea the second section directs that all the proceedings of the commissioners, the claims admitted, with those rejected, and the reason of their admission and rejection, be recorded in a well bound book and forwarded to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be submitted to Congress. To this desire for immediate information we must ascribe the short duration of the board. Their session for East Florida was to terminate on the last of June in the succeeding year; but any claims not filed previous to the 31st of May in that year to be void and of none effect.

These provisions show the solicitude of Congress to obtain, with the utmost celerity, that information which ought to be preliminary to the sale of the public lands. The provision that claims not filed with the commissioners previous to the 30th of June, 1823, should be void can mean only that they should be held so by the commissioners and not allowed by them. Their power should not extend to claims filed afterward. It is impossible to suppose that Congress intended to forfeit real titles not exhibited to their commissioners within so short a period. (Ibid., page 90.)

We have therefore a complete series of adjudications upon this question that wherever the possession was complete, wherever the parties were in possession, for the language of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, as of all preceding treaties, was "ratified and confirmed," they needed no confirmation. The grants made by the Spanish Government were by the treaty ratified and confirmed, and that language has been construed by the Supreme Court in all these cases to refer to completed grants, leaving them subject to the judicial power of the country, both as between the United States and the grantees, and as between private individuals the court held that the law of nations as well as the treaty protected individuals in all their rights of property, and it was only in respect to the severance of the land from the public domain in inchoate grants that the political power was required to act by legislation. By all these treaties the United States bound itself to take the place of the government making the cession, and to confirm and complete these inchoate grants where the conditions of the grant had been performed by the grantee in good faith.

It is in respect to such grants alone that the power of the Government, after a period of nearly forty years, is now sought to be examined.

In regard to that provision of this bill which limits the judicial power in its application to inchoate or incomplete titles to eleven square leagues, I think that is a reasonable reservation, not, as the distinguished Senator from Missouri claims, a violation of the treaty, for it does not declare that there may not be by Congress a confirmation of a greater grant if imperative public reasons or reasons of justice so require, but that grants from the public lands of areas great enough to constitute States should not be committed to the positive rules which ought to govern and must govern courts of law, that the sovereign legislative power should reserve to itself the right to decide upon the appropriation of vast bodies of public land; that the possession of such vast areas of land by individuals is so inimical to the character of this Government, and so unfriendly to the general welfare in withholding them from actual settlement and cultivation, that the power of accomplishing this result should not pass beyond the control of the legislative power. I am opposed to any legislation which shall remove the public lands from the opportunity of actual settlement and cultivation by the people of the United States under the homestead laws.

I think, sir, that the reservation of the power of confirmation of a greater body than eleven square leagues is a proper and safe provision in this bill and it meets my entire approval.

So far as the amendment of the Senator from Michigan is concerned which proposes to limit the location of this scrip to the State or Territory in which it was originally made, I think that is eminently proper. I am opposed, if it can be avoided, to issuing scrip, and I desire to express my opinion here that the practice of issuing great quantities of land-scrip to be located at the discretion of the owner on the public land of the country, or to be held in reserve and by some collusion with the clerks of the Land Office to be located upon particular and valuable tracts of land as they come into market, will become, as it has in the past, a great public evil, and that the Government had better pay the money out of the Treasury as indemnity and reserve the land for actual settlement and the use of the people of the country than to allow this land-scrip to be floated and located, often fraudulently, upon the valuable portions of the public domain before the people of the locality had notice of it. I approve, therefore, and shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Michigan which proposes to limit the location of this scrip to the Territory of the grant, the Territory in which the grant lies, and not beyond it. And the most serious objection I have to the bill is that it provides for the issue and location of this scrip. I am in favor of approving and confirming rights acquired by the locations of land-scrip on the public domain when it has been made in good faith and without collusion with any of the authorities in the land offices of the Government; but I am opposed to creating new opportunities of wrong by the further issue of land-scrip.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to make a single suggestion to the Senator from Florida, and that is that in the case of the Territory of Utah there is no land subject to private entry and therefore there would be no land in that Territory on which the proposed scrip could be located. I am not sufficiently informed to say whether that is the case in the other Territories, but I am apprehensive that it is. I do speak by authority when I say that in the Territory of Utah there is no amount of that kind of land.

Mr. CALL. Then I think there had better be an indemnity in money provided. If it be impossible to do justice, if an indemnity must be provided, it had better be an indemnity in money than have this scrip floated upon land worth perhaps $5, $10, or $20 per acre, and perhaps a great deal more than that in some cases. This scrip may be held and has been held for years unlocated, awaiting the increased value of land by the settlement of the country, and is then located on all the lands which are in process of settlement, and high prices, beyond the means of the actual settlers to pay, demanded for it. I am opposed to all legislation which may have this result or to any extent aid in accomplishing it.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not agree with the Senator, but I will not occupy his time to state my reasons.

Mr. CALL. I shall be glad to hear the Senator's suggestions, but it seems clear to me that when the Government sells the land of another and receives money for it they are bound in good faith only to pay the money received for it. They can not be under any obligation to pay more for the land than it was at the time worth. They can not be under obligation to give the grantee the opportunity of selecting more valuable lands in place of those sold, or to allow him to wait until the people have settled in large numbers in some section and then locate large bodies of the land which they have made valuable. The Supreme Court in the case of Smith vs. The United States says:

> As the United States have put themselves in the place of Spain, we must view this selection thus made as if Louisiana had never been ceded to them. But neither in this nor the record of any of the cases which have been before us have we seen any evidence of any law of Spain, local regulation, law, or usage which makes a private survey operate to sever any land from the royal domain. On the contrary, all the surveys which have been exhibited in the cases decided were made by the surveyor-general of the province, his deputies, by the special order of the governor or intendant, or those who represented them. No government gives any validity to private surveys of its warrants, or orders of survey; and we have no reason to think that Spain was a solitary exception, even as to the general domain, by grants in the ordinary mode for a specific quantity to be located in one place. A fortiori, where a grant, sui generis, might by its terms be so split up as to cover every saline, mineral, and water-power site in the whole territory. Of all others, the survey of such a grant ought to be made by an authorized officer. If the grant was a lawful authority for such selections, its execution by survey ought to be so supervised that the selections should be made in a reasonable time, quantity of land, and number of spots selected.
> We can not believe that Spain would have ever consented to the exercise of such a right by an individual over all the most valuable portions of her domain when she did not permit the appropriation of her ordinary lands to be so made; still less that a claim of this description would have been perfected into a complete title had she remained in possession of Louisiana, or that it ought so to have been. The claim was unreasonable in its nature, excluding the government from all control over locations made on a sweeping grant, which by small subdivisions might be a monopoly of every valuable spot in both provinces. Such a grant, with such privileges, has no equity in it as against the Government of Spain or the United States standing in their place. There appears no law, usage, or custom to authorize it, and it is incompatible with those rights which every government reserves to itself of directing by its own officers the surveys of its lands, either on specific grants or orders of survey for vacant lands.

The policy indicated in these observations of the court has the approval of my judgment, and I doubt very much the wisdom of confirming grants of eleven leagues of land where it is susceptible of cultivation.

It is upon this principle that this bill proceeds in reserving the right of confirmation of a sweeping grant. I think eleven leagues is a sweeping grant, and if over that amount, its confirmation should certainly be reserved to the sovereign political and legislative power of the country. This proposition is sustained by the reasoning of the court, which is wise, by the facts in our experience, by our knowledge of the grave evils of giving vast bodies of the public domain under these ancient and shadowy grants. An eminent man, who had the reputation of being a learned and honest judge of the superior court of the United States for the Territory of Nevada, is reported to have said that these large grants were surrounded by "chevaux-de-frise of frauds and perjuries."

The evil was encountered in the early history of the State of Florida in the case of the grant to the Duke of Alagon, and a very famous litigation arose. At the time of the treaty there was a very considerable part of the 30,000,000 acres then supposed to be contained in the two Floridas granted to an eminent person in Spain, known as the Alagon grant, and intended to come within the provisions of that treaty. It was long the subject of litigation, and finally decided by the Supreme Court upon the proposition that under the laws of Spain an absolute severance of the public domain from the grant was necessary to constitute a completed grant, and that a grant not in possession and a grant the conditions of which had not been in that respect complied with had no standing in the courts of the country and no obligation under the treaty.

Beyond these objections I see in this bill nothing whatever but a compliance with the established law in the treaties which have preceded that of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which are the same in all their substantial provisions with the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and which have been adjudicated time and again; and in subjecting these grants to the extent of eleven leagues to the judicial power of the country, the bill does no more than our Constitution and laws do in giving each of the Departments their own specific powers, and to the judicial power the application of the law to the protection of individual right to the extent to which it is limited.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is in section 3, line 6, after the word "act," to strike out "when the person testifying is dead."

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONGER. In line 17 of section 9, after the word "respectively," I move to insert the words "in which each claim shall exist."

The object of the amendment is, if scrip—which I think very objectionable—is to be issued, to make it certain that it shall only be used in the State or Territory in which the claim is located.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Oregon stated a few moments since that there were no offered lands in the Territory of Utah, one of the Territories covered by the provisions of this bill. I think it probable that that is equally true of all the Territories specified in the bill. The consequence is that there will be no indemnity practically under this provision at all, but we shall provide for the issuance of a large amount of scrip, the holders of which will then besiege Congress, as we know from similar cases which have occurred heretofore, for indemnity of various kinds. I should hope that the Senate would not enter in advance upon this delicate and difficult and dangerous question. Plainly, I think this section ought to be stricken out of the bill in toto.

It will be abundant time for Congress to say what remedy these people shall have after we have ascertained in some authentic way that they are entitled to some; but to put this power in the hands of the court to make it to the interest of the claimant to get up a juggle about boundaries to get indemnity scrip, which can not possibly be worth less than five or six times the value of the land that was granted, is simply to open the door to a fraud of the greatest magnitude. Therefore I shall move to strike out this entire section. If this bill passes we shall have plenty to do hereafter in repairing the damage it will do, and it will not hurt anything to have this particular subject especially left to be dealt with when we know all the facts of the case.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him if this entire section is stricken out, is there anything remaining in the bill which will secure to the persons to whom the Government has issued patents for lands sold possession and title to the lands, or will they not be left to be evicted after the grant is confirmed? The Senator will notice in the body of the ninth section, which he proposes to strike out, a provision that the claimant whose grant is confirmed shall release to the occupant the tracts which have been sold by the Government; otherwise he might bring ejectment, probably.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well; that is another objection I have to this bill. It proposes without information to say that if any one holding a grant has been illegally dispossessed of any portion of it he shall be content with the spoliation that has been committed upon him and shall within twelve months relinquish his claim to the man who has despoiled him.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator please turn to some section of the bill which provides that?

Mr. PLUMB. Section 9 is the one which reads that way to my limited comprehension. This deals with two very difficult questions. It is assumed in the first place that the United States Government has sold lands which belonged to the grantees of Mexico, and which by the treaty we were obligated solemnly to confirm to their possession and to their right. We propose, then, to legalize, as I said, that spoliation. In addition to that, and what is perhaps worse—certainly it will be worse in its financial consequences and in its consequences to the public domain—we propose to put it in the power of the claimants themselves to get up a controversy about the question of their grants, whereby and as the result of which they will get scrip which they can locate upon lands vastly more valuable than the lands covered by their grants.

Mr. President, it will be time enough for Congress to deal with that question when we have some facts and the result of adjudication to be had under this bill if it is to become a law, and not to enter upon that system in advance of giving the court a power which, as I said, is not only dangerous on its face but dangerous in view of that which we know has heretofore transpired in cases substantially similar. I therefore move to strike out section 9.

Then, Mr. President, if that shall be done it will be time for somebody to move that the court passing upon this question shall make a report of every particular case decided by it, and as to whether in any case tried and decided any grantee of the Government of Mexico has been dispossessed of any part of his proper and legal holding, and, if so, to what extent, and whether that occurred by reason of some trespass or otherwise which has been encouraged and permitted under the authority of the United States represented by its patent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Kansas to amend will remain suspended until the motion pending to perfect the section has been disposed of.

Mr. BAYARD. I was about to ask what would be the parliamentary order. The Senator from Michigan offered an amendment to the section, and the Senator from Kansas moves to strike out the entire section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan is first in order, and all motions tending to perfect the section will be disposed of before the question can be taken on the motion of the Senator from Kansas to strike out.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, Mr. President, I think perhaps both these propositions can be intelligently discussed together.

Mr. CONGER. If the Senator will allow me, I rose to withdraw my motion, being in favor of the other proposition, if after inquiring of the Chair I should learn that it will be in order to offer my amendment in case this motion fails.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course the motion of the Senator from Michigan would be in order after a motion to strike out simply should be put and lost.

Mr. CONGER. Then, if the Senator from Delaware will allow me, I will withdraw the amendment I offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to amend made by the Senator from Michigan is withdrawn. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. BAYARD. That motion is to strike out section 9 of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to be heard on that question. I do not think in the course of this discussion any proposition has been made or will be that will show the necessity for such a bill as this as much as the motion of the Senator from Kansas and the argument made in support of it. What does this section provide?

> That if in any case it shall so happen that the lands decreed to any claimant under the provisions of this act shall have been sold or granted by the United States.

Why, Mr. President, if the United States have made great errors in their grants heretofore, if they have given men principalities of land in these Territories not knowing what they were granting and giving, this bill is intended to put an end to such occurrences. How comes it that the Congress of the United States have confirmed grants amounting to nearly two million acres in one case to a single claimant? Simply because there was no machinery of law provided for testing the amount of land granted, much less the title. The whole system of the California commission, as I showed the other day by citing the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, has been to "make confusion worse confounded" in respect of the whole of this territory so rapidly growing into value and importance. This is the first time that the Congress of the United States have taken the right step for the adjudication of questions of law and of fact connected with this important Territory. They have satisfied themselves heretofore with allowing a mere officer of inquiry, a surveyor-general, to call before him the best testimony he could get or that which he thought or believed or said was the best he could get to ascertain almost fabulous tracts of lands, and then upon his report to confirm them by a vote of the Senate which, as we see in regard to this present bill, has scarcely contained the half part of a quorum at any period during the discussion except perhaps when a vote was to be had.

Now it is proposed to take regular, orderly, fair, judicial proceeding for the purpose of ascertaining the rights of any claimant, great or small, and giving him the rights that any citizen of the United States could have for the purpose of ascertaining his rights of property under this treaty with Mexico; and it carefully provides that if these mistakes have been made, and we know they have been made, he shall have a remedy. I read the other day from a case in the Supreme Court the statement by the court that owing to the loose system of description in the Mexican diseños and what passed by the name of maps drawn by rude herdsmen they had been compelled to follow maps, to follow the description, to follow the judgment of the commission which had become final for want of an appeal, and to adjudge the same land and the same title to three different parties, knowing the fact that it was a three-headed judgment granted under the laws of the country and which this bill is intended hereafter to prevent, but which the Senator from Kansas would, it seems, object to its preventing.

When the United States shall have by its law, followed and obeyed by its citizen, given his land to another, and by judgment of their own courts show that he was entitled to so many acres of land, can it be that there is to be no relief; that having by reason of the imperfection of the machinery of its own to ascertain justice given the land of A to B, admitting that it was the land of A, there is to be no remedy, and that B is not to be compensated by the Government whose laws he has obeyed and whose instructions he has followed for the lands whereof he has been evicted by the action of the Government itself? Is he to have no relief? Justice, equity, decency, respect for the opinion of mankind, call for a remedy in such a case as that, and that is precisely the remedy which the ninth section provides, that as the mistakes growing out of these imperfect descriptions, these illimitable boundaries, these vague outlines, shall have worked injustice, there shall be, so far as the Government may carefully do, an equivalent provided. If the land of one man has, under color of a judgment of a court or of any tribunal provided by the law, been taken from him, an equivalent shall be supplied from the national domain by language carefully guarded.

Why, Mr. President, it is not peculiar to this case with Mexico more than to every acquisition. The treaty with France that gave us Louisiana, the treaty with Spain that gave us Florida, every such treaty provides that where owing to irregular mismeasurements and vagueness of description a man has failed to receive that which the courts and the law have awarded him he shall have an equivalent given to him for that of which he has been inadvertently and unjustly deprived. This section provides that common act of justice. This law will go far to make such acts of injustice in the future difficult, if not impossible; and if in the vague definition of boundaries over these rude and half-civilized countries mistakes as to lines of survey and boundary should exist, the man who fairly followed the law and accepted its judgment and decree shall not lose the value of his property, although he may lose the property itself. It can not be given to two, and where one is in by the judgment of the law of the land and the other is yet entitled to an equivalent, he shall have it in the shape provided for by this section.

Now, what is the section? It is a section carefully guarded to provide against results which have heretofore come from giving equivalents too loosely. I have heard in the Chamber here the case of the heirs of Thomas B. Valentine cited as one under which great oppression to the community was worked. In April, 1872, an act for the relief of Thomas B. Valentine was passed, by which that party or his heirs was permitted to take an appeal from the final decision and decree of the circuit court to the Supreme Court of the United States:

> And a decree under the provisions of this act, in favor of said claim, shall not affect any adverse right or title to the lands described in said decree; but in lieu thereof, the claimant, or his legal representatives, may select, and shall be allowed, patents for an equal quantity of the unoccupied and unappropriated public lands of the United States, not mineral, and in tracts not less than the subdivisions provided for in the United States land laws, and, if unsurveyed when taken, to conform, when surveyed, to the general system of United States land surveys; and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall be authorized to issue scrip, in legal subdivisions, to the said Valentine, or his legal representatives, in accordance with the provisions of this act.

I understand that under that language and the condition of our general land laws what is termed a general float in the shape of land scrip was granted to this party, and he or his assigns located their patents upon any land unoccupied and unappropriated, and the consequence was that this scrip, as I understand, was taken around and became a source of black-mailing upon people in possession all over the country. With such an act as the Valentine act before us and the consequences of that act of which the committee had been informed, the unexpected uses or rather abuses which had taken place under it, the committee sought carefully to prevent the recurrence of any such thing. Therefore they said that when any claimant should find that the land decreed to him had been sold or granted theretofore by the United States, he should apply to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and upon filing a release to the Government of the right and title to the lands so sold or granted to the United States, should receive "scrip for an equal amount of acres so released, in quantities not exceeding six hundred and forty acres each, which scrip shall be assignable in such form as may be prescribed by said Secretary, and shall be receivable, acre for acre, in payment for any public lands"—not generally—"in either of said Territories or States respectively that may be subject to private entry at the minimum price."

What lands are subject to private entry? Only those that have been offered for sale publicly by the Executive and withdrawn. Those, and those alone, are the subject of private entry. Here, then, is a carefully guarded provision for a rightful claimant, adjudged to be a rightful claimant by law and after due hearing, to receive an equivalent at the rate stated, acre for acre, of the lands subject to private entry at the minimum price.

I am glad the amendment of the Senator from Michigan was withdrawn, because I think upon reflection he will see that as the land so to be entered by private entry must be within these Territories and the two States mentioned there is a restriction which makes it additionally safe to pass the bill. But as to the proposition that when the Government by its own tribunal has adjudged its citizen to be a just claimant upon it for a body of land, it shall therefore have sold and parted with and granted away that land, there shall not be a compensation, it would be a defect in morality, a defect in justice that no law of the United States relating to this subject has ever before failed in to my knowledge.

I hope, Mr. President, that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas may be rejected.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss this bill further than to endeavor, if I can, to be relieved of a difficulty I have in my mind in regard to the seventh subdivision of section 12. The general purpose of the bill is unquestionably right. It is to prevent great frauds in the segregation of the public domain under claims by claimants securing a larger amount than the claims call for. That is the general object; but if the Senator will notice the seventh subdivision, it says:

> Seventh. No confirmation shall in any case be made or patent issued for a greater quantity than eleven square leagues of land to or in the right of any one original grantee or claimant, or in the right of any one original grant to two or more persons jointly, nor for a greater quantity than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim.

It will be seen, therefore, that it makes no difference what may be the equity of a party in possession, he can not under any state of case get more than eleven leagues. Suppose, for example, that a citizen of Spain or of Mexico files his petition in due form of law, asking for eleven leagues, setting forth his condition, the number of his family, and his occupation, as required by their laws, accompanied by two assisting witnesses, and a survey is ordered, and the survey is actually made, and he is placed in the actual possession of his land by virtue of that survey. It then becomes the duty of the governor to send out a commissioner to issue the final concession or grant. That is done in the form of two papers, which are duplicates of each other, one the protocol which is filed in the land office to evidence the fact that that land has been segregated from the public domain, the other the testimonio we give to the party as the evidence of his title. That is his grant, and this is done before a notary public in the presence of the commissioner and assisting witnesses.

Now, suppose all that has been done, suppose the man has filed his petition, has been put in the actual possession, the survey has been actually made, and for some cause the governor has failed to send a commissioner to issue the final concession or grant. That man, according to this bill, may have been in possession, he and his heirs, for one hundred years, actually claiming to the out-boundary, and there may not be any fraudulent excess or an excess so great as to presume fraud, but an actual excess such as is common in all the great grants made in that Spanish country. Suppose that on the eleven-league grant there is an excess of 10 per cent. and he and those claiming under him have had that land for years, as many of them have for two hundred years—if there is an excess under this bill, that excess, although the Government of Mexico when the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was made, except the naked, legal title, had no equity whatever, and all the equities are in the claimant—yet because the protocol and the testimonio have not been issued the party is deprived of all that surplus, whatever it may be, over and above the eleven leagues. I think that would be more than has ever been done in any country where the same system of surveying has been practiced as in Mexico.

Take the State of Texas, for example, where we had forty-six hundred and sixty acre grants. There are few of them that have not an excess. Patents have been issued for that land, and the excess often appears as high as 10, 15, and 20 per cent. There was no fraud about it. The land was less valuable at the time those surveys were made than anything else. The State has never yet claimed or pretended to set aside the excess, although the State may, where there is an important excess, through its proper district attorney file a petition to have it set aside on the ground of fraud.

While I agree with the general proposition of this bill and believe it to be right, there ought to be a guard for those who have been in the possession of their land where the failure of the final formalities has been without their fault, where the final papers had not been issued, and where the excess is but a fair and reasonable excess according to the theory of surveying at that time. I believe there ought to be in this bill some provision made to keep those parties who are honestly there in the possession of their land without having part of it taken from them. It does not strike me that that would be right.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I do not differ at all with the purpose the committee had in view in reporting this bill, nor do I design by this amendment to be understood as saying that if anybody has had actually taken from him by the authority of the Government of the United States any of the lands granted to him by the Government of Mexico he should not have indemnity. What I do say is that it is unwise to place the power of fixing this indemnity in the hands of a court; that it should be reserved to Congress to deal with the question hereafter when all the facts can be laid before it.

Mr. President, it would be possible—I do not say it would be probable—to make a location of a grant by collusion in such a way as to cover lands granted by the United States heretofore, and obtain by that act scrip greatly more valuable than the land covered by the grant. I appeal now to that which every one on this floor who has had to deal with these questions heretofore knows, and that is that every single act granting scrip, whether upon the authority of the Supreme Court or the authority of Congress, has resulted finally in frauds upon the public.

Either this scrip is good for something or it is good for nothing. If it is good for nothing, then where is the measure of justice which the Senator from Delaware proposes? I say that I do not believe there is an acre of offered land within the Territories covered by this bill, and if that be true, then these people would take nothing by their scrip. What would result? The obligation of the United States would be outstanding in behalf of these people, who would then appeal and justly to Congress to legislate in such a way as to give that scrip value, and thus we should be confronted with the final determination of that question in these Halls.

This question of whether the party shall have indemnity for lands taken out of his grant or not is also a question that ought to be left to be settled after the facts are all known. If the Government shall award to the grantee of Mexico lands covered by patents on the part of the Federal Government, then the question as to which shall prevail will be a question which Congress will decide and which should not be settled by the courts, because in this case there is no method of determining whether the grant obtained by the United States was obtained by fraud or not. It may have been collusive, and yet it is protected by this bill, the only limitation being that the land shall have been sold or granted by the United States; and as I said we are entering on dangerous ground here, we are opening this adjudication to the greatest possible inducement that can exist to get up collusive locations of grants in order that they may be compensated by scrip which will be located upon public lands of the United States largely greater in value than the land claimed under the grant from Mexico.

For that reason I think this section should be stricken out, that if we are to do justice to these people we at least ought to do it by a provision which will not do injustice to the Government of the United States and will not encourage fraud.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I desire to say that no obligation of the Government which will be created by this bill will be greater than the obligation that now rests upon the Government, an obligation arising under a treaty between two sovereign powers, an obligation upon the part of the United States to confirm to all the claimants under these Spanish and Mexican grants their claims as and when they may be established in a manner provided by law.

In regard to claims which were perfected claims, to which the claimants had a legal title under the laws of Spain or Mexico, the United States could not have granted away the title; the title was beyond the power of the United States to grant. In regard to these imperfect claims, the legal title to which passed to the United States under the treaty of cession, the United States might dispose of the legal title in spite of the equities of the private claimants, and may have done so. All that this bill undertakes to provide in that respect is that in case it shall be found when any of these claims shall be presented to the tribunals provided by this bill that the United States has granted away the legal title to any portion of any claims which may be established under all the safeguards provided by this bill, scrip shall be issued to the claimants in lieu of the land so granted, which scrip may be located on land subject to private entry.

I took occasion to say heretofore that there was no ground for the fears which have been expressed in regard to the practical operation of this section. As I then stated, no lands are subject to private entry except those which have been offered at public sale. It has not been the policy of the United States for the last quarter of a century to offer land at public sale, and the lands which are now subject to private entry are inconsiderable tracts, isolated from each other, scattered around over the States and Territories of the United States. Any scrip that may be issued under section 9 of this bill can never have a value to exceed a dollar and a quarter an acre. Why? Because any citizen of the United States may go to-morrow or as soon as the necessary steps can be taken and buy every acre of land subject to private entry in the United States at a dollar and a quarter an acre.

There are three classes of lands in the United States subject to entry under the general laws, lands subject to private entry, lands subject to entry under the pre-emption, homestead, and other general land laws of the United States, the minimum price of which is a dollar and a quarter an acre, and lands the minimum price of which is two dollars and a half an acre. The first are offered lands, known as lands subject to private entry; the second are the great body of public lands of the United States subject to entry under the land laws of the United States; and the last class are lands which lie within the limits of railroad grants, the price of which was increased when the odd sections were withdrawn from sale.

I consider this provision very inadequate compensation to those claimants who may have lost their land because the United States has granted it to others notwithstanding their equitable right. It is so inadequate, that in my judgment these claimants would never accept it if they had any other alternative. Congress, however, has never offered any other compensation for those lands which have been granted away, and the probability is that, inasmuch as they can not sue the United States under any existing law, and no other remedy is provided for them, they will accept this provision offered to them, and will take this scrip to be located on land subject to private entry. In as far as concerns restricting these entries to lands subject to private entry within each State and Territory in which the lands are situated for which the scrip is issued, I would strike out that reference to the States and Territories and give the holders of the scrip an opportunity to locate it anywhere where that class of lands can be found within the United States. As I said before, the scrip can never be worth more than a dollar and a quarter an acre, because every acre of that class of land can be entered at any time by any citizen in any quantity at a dollar and a quarter an acre. I hope, therefore, the motion will not prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. CALL. I merely wish to say in reply to what has fallen from the Senator from Oregon that within my knowledge scrip has been held for the purpose of being located on valuable military reservations which have been turned over to the Government, and lands worth hundreds of dollars an acre, and in some cases as much as a thousand dollars an acre, have been taken up under the Valentine scrip, and it is systematically held in that way for the purpose of appropriating valuable reservations of the Government which come into the market before the fact is known that they are subject to disposition by the Interior Department. I think it is a very valuable privilege.

Mr. DOLPH. I supposed that that matter was thoroughly understood. Valentine scrip is a very different kind of scrip. Valentine scrip may be laid on land subject to entry under the laws of the United States, on any land subject to entry under the provisions of the general land laws of the United States, and the value of that scrip arises from the fact that if a man wishes to enter a quarter-section of land, and does not wish to live upon it or cultivate it or comply with the other provisions of the general land laws of the United States, he may take some of this scrip and locate it on the land and secure his title at once without wating for the necessary time to intervene which is required in securing title to lands under the general land laws, and that whether he is qualified as a settler to take a claim under the laws of the United States or not. But the scrip contemplated by this bill is not like the Valentine scrip. It can be located under the provisions of the bill only on a certain class of lands, offered lands, lands subject to private entry, lands of which the Senator could buy every acre of the United States at a dollar and a quarter an acre, and can buy it at that price until the laws of the United States in that regard are changed. Therefore the fears which have been expressed in regard to the operation of this bill and the value of the scrip are groundless, because this scrip can never have a value greater than the price of the lands as they are now held by the United States.

It was suggested also that a great evil had grown out of the issue of this Valentine scrip, that it might be laid upon claims where other parties had valid rights. I undertake to say that there never was any scrip issued by the United States that could be located upon land where another person had a vested valid right, where the other parties had duly filed upon the lands under any existing law of the United States. That is a mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], to strike out the ninth section of the bill.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONGER. Now I renew the amendment which I withdrew. I move to amend the bill, in line 17 of section 9, by inserting after the word "respectively" the words "in which each claim shall exist." The remarks of the Senator from Delaware, saying that that is now the meaning of the bill, make it proper to remove any doubt there may be about it by expressly confining the location to each Territory or each State in which the claim itself exists.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. SAWYER (when his name was called). I am paired for the day with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CALL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Florida] is detained from the Senate by illness.

The result was announced—yeas 8, nays 37; as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 24) authorizing the printing of 2,500 extra copies of the report of the health officer of the District of Columbia; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion until the next amendment may be stated, which I offered as a substitute for the bill under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 5, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk began the reading of the Journal, when

Mr. BELFORD said: I ask unanimous consent that the reading of so much of the Journal of the proceedings of yesterday as relates to the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The remainder of the Journal was then read, and as read it was approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KASSON, for three days, on account of a public engagement in Brooklyn; and

To Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, for one week, to attend to pressing business.

MUTILATED AND LIGHT-WEIGHT COIN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a letter from B. G. Underwood, with petition of officers of banks and bankers, asking for relief in the matter of mutilated and light-weight gold and silver coin; also transmitting a report of the Treasurer of the United States, dated January 11, 1884, and of the Director of the Mint, dated January 24, 1884, to whom had been referred for remark the letter and petition mentioned; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF CHEROKEE FUND.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting report of Commissioner of Indian Affairs in relation to the action of the Cherokee national authorities in the distribution of $300,000 appropriated in the sundry civil act of March 3, 1883, to be paid into the treasury of the Cherokee Nation out of the fund under appraisement for Cherokee lands west of the Arkansas River; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MILITIA FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an abstract of the militia forces of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTERS FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will submit to the House the request for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the positions of stenographers of committees of this House be, and they are hereby, declared vacant; and hereafter, upon the request of a committee, the Speaker shall employ a reporter or reporters to report such proceedings as the committee may deem necessary, at a compensation to be fixed by the Committee on Accounts, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a point of order. It is utterly impossible for us here who occupy seats in the rear of the Hall to understand what is going on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the justice of the complaint of the gentleman, and appeals to members on the floor and in the rear of the seats to cease conversation and preserve order, so that public business may be intelligently transacted. The Chair thinks a great part of the confusion is occasioned by conversation in the rear of the seats, which prevents gentlemen on the back seats from hearing what transpires. [After a pause.] Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I think it had better go to a committee.

Mr. CALKINS. Is it proposed to consider the resolution now?

The SPEAKER. That is the request of the gentleman.

Mr. CALKINS. I think it had better go to a committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it not a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not offer it as a privileged report, and therefore the Chair was not called on to rule on that point. It will go to the Committee on Accounts if there be no objection, and if reported back by that committee will then be privileged.

The resolution was accordingly referred to the Committee on Accounts.

TARIFF ON FOREIGN WORKS OF ART.

Mr. BELMONT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if in his opinion it be not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to this House the correspondence concerning the representations made to this Government in relation to the existing tariff discriminations against the works of foreign artists, together with such other information on the subject as may be of record in the Department of State.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FLORIDA SPANISH CLAIMS.

Mr. BISBEE. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution of inquiry for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas by the ninth article of the treaty with Spain, under which the territory of Florida was acquired, the United States stipulated and agreed as follows, to wit: "To cause satisfaction to be made for the injuries, if any, which by process of law shall be established to have been suffered by the Spanish officers and individual Spanish inhabitants by the late operations of the American army in Florida;" and

Whereas afterward, under an act of Congress entitled "An act to carry into effect the ninth article of the treaty concluded between the United States and Spain the 22d day of February, 1819," and in compliance with the authority conferred by said act, the judges of the supreme courts at Saint Augustine and Pensacola, Fla., received and adjusted the claims presented to them for said injuries, and in all cases decided by said judges in favor of the said claimants, the decisions, together with the evidence on which they were founded, were, as required by the said act of Congress, reported to the Secretary of the Treasury, who was by said act authorized to pay the amounts so reported due upon being satisfied that the same were just and equitable and within the provisions of the said treaty; and

Whereas in such decisions and reports so as aforesaid made to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount found due each claimant on account of injuries to his property was stated, and also the amount due on account of interest accrued from the date of the injury to the date of said decision and report was separately stated; and

Whereas it is alleged by the several claimants that the Secretary of the Treasury has declined to pay any of the said several amounts or sums of money reported due by the said judges on account of interest accrued as aforesaid; and

Whereas it is asserted and claimed by the said claimants that it was and is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the said act of Congress passed to execute the ninth section of said treaty, to pay to them the said several sums of money found to be due them by the said judges, including all sums of money found due on said interest account as well as all such sums as were found due for the value of property injured or destroyed: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, requested to report to this House the aggregate amounts found and reported to be due the said claimants by the said judges, stating separately the amounts found due as principal and the amounts found due on account of interest. Also to report to the House the aggregate amount that has been paid on account of said claims, and the amount claimed to be due by the said claimants on account of interest as aforesaid, as shown by the decisions, judgments, and reports of the said judges to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the reasons, if any, under existing law, why the said claims for interest reported due by said judges can not be paid.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I object to the present consideration of the resolution. I think it had better go to a committee.

Mr. BISBEE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the objection. If he would hear an explanation for a moment, I am sure he would do so.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] willing to withhold the objection while a brief explanation is made?

Mr. BLANCHARD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. BISBEE] can make his explanation, subject to the right of objection.

Mr. BISBEE. The only object of the resolution—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BISBEE. Then I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

There being no objection, the resolution was introduced, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. McCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 116) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees and other employés of the House of Representatives shall begin.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 74) to enable the State of Colorado to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands, and to secure to the State of Colorado the benefit of the act of July 2, 1862, entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts;"

A bill (S. 379) for the relief of Mrs. J. P. Williams;

A bill (S. 380) for the relief of James Bridger or his legal representatives;

A bill (S. 431) for the relief of Sallie A. Spence;

A bill (S. 537) for the relief of J. A. Henry and others;

A bill (S. 677) for the relief of the estates of James Vance and William Vance;

A bill (S. 975) for the relief of T. J. Boyles, administrator of the estate of Marcus Radich, deceased; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 21) for the relief of the Kansas City, Fort Scott and Gulf Railroad Company.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. WELLER. I ask the gentleman demanding the regular order to give way for a moment——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded by several gentlemen.

Mr. WELLER. Then I ask unanimous consent——

The SPEAKER. That can not be done when the regular order is insisted upon. The regular order is demanded for the purpose of putting an end to these requests for unanimous consent.

IMPROVEMENT OF HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. YOUNG. I rise to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, having in charge, by order of the House, the investigation of the manner in which the work on Hot Springs Creek, on the Government reservation at Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, is being conducted, and as to whether or not the money appropriated for its prosecution is being properly expended, and as to the general management of the Government property at that place, having further considered the matter, beg leave to report:

That they are now of opinion that an efficient and economical discharge of that duty will require a subcommittee of their number to visit Hot Springs and make a personal inspection of the work and to examine such witnesses as may be able to testify in relation to any of the matters the committee is directed to investigate.

The committee find that they can arrive at no satisfactory conclusion without the testimony of many witnesses who reside at Hot Springs, and to bring them here would involve a much larger expense than we are willing to recommend.

The committee therefore see no alternative but to send a subcommittee of their number to Hot Springs, as above indicated, or for a special committee to be appointed to take charge of the entire matter.

We think the sum of $1,500 would be sufficient to meet all the expense that need be incurred in pursuing either course indicated. The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the accompanying resolution:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That a subcommittee of five members from the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be directed to proceed to the town of Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, and make such investigation in respect to the work now being done upon Hot Springs Creek, on the Government reservation at that place, and in respect to such other matters as they have been heretofore directed by resolution of the House to investigate, and to report the result thereof as early as practical; that for the purpose of paying the expenses thereof the sum of $1,500 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House, the same to be expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms under the direction of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that this is a privileged report.

Mr. YOUNG. The committee was directed to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Then it is privileged. The question is upon the adoption of the resolution reported by the committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Is it in order to move to refer this report to the Committee on Accounts?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I think it had better go there and be considered in connection with other expenditures of similar character.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] moves to refer the report just read to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I would have no objection to that action myself; but the work which we have been directed to investigate is now at a standstill. If it is delayed longer much damage may result to the interests of the Government. If the investigation is to be made at all it ought to be made at once. The delegation from the State of Arkansas are unanimous in their desire that this report and resolution shall be adopted and the result of the investigation reported to the House.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. YOUNG] a question. Is not the work at Hot Springs being done according to plans and specifications which are before the committee; and has not the committee received reports from duly authorized Government agents having charge of the work, so as to enable the committee to see fully what is being done and what is needed to be done, without going to the expense of sending a Congressional committee to the ground to investigate?

Mr. YOUNG. That is the very thing we are directed to ascertain, whether or not it is being done in accordance with the plans and specifications and whether or not the money appropriated for that purpose is being properly expended. We have had before us the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, and he desires that the matter shall be inquired into, and I think it just to his Department that it should be done.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The sum recommended by this committee for this trip to the Hot Springs, it seems to me, is not at all adequate when you take into consideration the amount which is required to defray the funeral expenses of members of Congress, as shown by the bills rendered to the Committee on Accounts. It strikes me, Mr. Speaker, there is a great difference in the recommendation of this committee beforehand and the reports of the Committee on Accounts after these trips have been made. I merely throw this out as a suggestion. I believe it will result in nothing more than a junketing trip. And, sir, I do not believe that the American people are in the humor to encourage anything of this sort, and as one member of Congress upon this floor I enter my solemn protest against it. It will not result in any investigation which will amount to anything, while it will cost more than $1,500, as we well know, when we consider for a moment that it takes from three to eight thousand dollars to bury a deceased member of this House. The Committee on Accounts is well aware of this fact, and, as the Committee on Accounts have already considered very carefully such subjects, I have thought it better to refer this matter to that committee, in order that they may report upon it and recommend how much ought to be expended for this junketing trip.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, it would be unjust to the committee I represent in submitting this report if I were to allow any insinuation such as the gentleman from Kentucky has seen proper to indulge in to pass without notice. I do not think there are any members of this committee who propose a junketing trip at the expense of the House. If the gentleman has that idea of public legislation I am quite sure it was not shared in by any member of the committee which recommended the making of this report. So far as I am concerned, and so far as they are concerned, and I am authorized to speak for all of them, none of us desire to go. It is a matter in which we have no personal interest whatever, and to meet my own views and my own business engagements I ought to remain here. It is simply a matter of duty to discharge in a proper and becoming manner what we have been directed by the House to do. We have had the matter under advisement for more than a week; we have examined all the testimony to which we could get access in Washington city, and we have come to the conclusion, unanimously on the part of the whole committee, that we could not do justice to ourselves in presenting any report to this House on the testimony which we have already received.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. YOUNG. I will yield to the gentleman from Arkansas for a question.

Mr. DUNN. I desire simply to correct one statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee, and that is, that the delegation from Arkansas are unanimous in favor of this investigation. While I have no reason to question the correctness of the conclusion of that committee which recommended it, I wish to relieve myself of any responsibility. I have not been consulted about it, I do not know anything about it, and I have no information on the subject on which to base an opinion as to whether this investigation should be made or not. I simply do not desire to be put on record as advising it; I do not question the correctness of its judgment.

Mr. YOUNG. I made the statement on the authority of some of the gentleman's colleagues. I supposed every one had been consulted. It is a matter of no consequence to me. The gentleman who represents that district desires it, and I learn from other members of the delegation they were all of the same opinion. I now ask for the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Before the previous question is put I hope the gentleman will allow me to say that I have no objection to an investigation, not in the least, but I desire to say——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I do not yield, but call for the previous question.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to say a word in reply to what the gentleman has said.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. YOUNG. I have no objection to any explanation the gentleman desires to make in justice to himself.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I have no objection to the investigation if it will amount to anything, but I remember distinctly the position taken by your side of the House in the Forty-fourth Congress——

Mr. YOUNG. I do not yield for any such harangue as that.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I supposed the gentleman yielded.

Mr. YOUNG. I thought the gentleman desired to make a personal explanation.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am on the floor.

Mr. YOUNG. But I do not yield for any such discussion.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The gentleman can not take me off the floor in that way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee says he yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky to allow him to make a personal explanation, but not for an argument.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. The House in the Forty-fourth Congress, controlled by that side of the House, proposed to save forty millions of money by cutting down expenditures. Does this look like saving, when committees are sent out on junketing trips?

Mr. YOUNG. That is not a personal explanation. I insist upon the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 116, noes 2.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, and Mr. YOUNG were appointed tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 174, noes 5.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLER. I ask the gentleman to yield——

DISEASES AMONG ANIMALS, ETC.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his Department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious and communicable diseases among them, and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose. The salary of the chief of said bureau shall be $3,000 per annum; and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious diseases. The compensation of said agents shall be at the rate of $10 per diem, with all necessary expenses, while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other infectious or contagious disease is declared to exist, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious or infectious disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease: Provided, That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

SEC. 4. That whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

SEC. 5. That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious or communicable disease, along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live-stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall from time to time establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigations may require.

SEC. 6. That to prevent the exportation from any port of the United States to any port in a foreign country of live-stock affected with any infectious or contagious disease, and especially pleuro-pneumonia, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to take such steps and adopt such measures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as he may deem necessary.

SEC. 7. That no railroad company within the United States whose road forms any part of a line of road from one State or Territory to another, or from a State into the District of Columbia, or the owners or masters of any steam or sailing or other vessel or boat, shall receive for transportation or transport from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live-stock affected with any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia; nor shall any person, company, or corporation deliver for such transportation to any railroad company, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious or infectious disease; nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot or transport in private conveyance from one State or Territory to another, or from any State into the District of Columbia, any live-stock, knowing them to be affected with any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to notify, in writing, the proper officials or agents of any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company doing business in or through any infected locality, and by publication in such newspapers as he may select, of the existence of said contagion; and any person or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of, or person having control over, such cattle or other live-stock within such infected district who shall knowingly violate the provisions of section 7 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

SEC. 9. That whenever any infectious or contagious disease affecting domestic animals, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, shall be brought into or shall break out in the District of Columbia, it shall be the duty of the Commissioners of said District to take measures to suppress the same promptly and to prevent the same from spreading; and for this purpose the said Commissioners are hereby empowered to order and require that any premises, farm, or farms where such disease exists, or has existed, be put in quarantine; to order all or any animals coming into the District to be detained at any place or places for the purpose of inspection and examination; to prescribe regulations for and to require the destruction of animals affected with infectious or contagious disease, and for the proper disposition of their hides and carcasses; to prescribe regulations for disinfection, and such other regulations as they may deem necessary to prevent infection or contagion being communicated, and shall report to the Commissioner of Agriculture whatever they may do in pursuance of the provisions of this section.

SEC. 10. That it shall be the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint; and the same shall be heard before any district or circuit court of the United States or Territorial court holden within the district in which the violation of this act has been committed, or the person or corporation resides or carries on or has his or its place of business.

SEC. 11. That the sum of $250,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

SEC. 12. That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall report annually to Congress, at the commencement of each session, a list of the names of all persons employed, an itemized statement of all expenditures under this act, and full particulars of the means adopted and carried into effect for the suppression of contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom were referred bill H. R. 876 and numerous other bills, resolutions, and petitions upon the subject of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious or infectious diseases of live-stock, respectfully submit to the House the following report:

The committee unanimously recommend the prompt consideration and passage, by the House of Representatives, of the substitute for bill H. R. 876 herewith reported.

The committee have had this subject under constant consideration and investigation for several weeks. They have personally examined experienced and scientific veterinary surgeons, stock-raisers, and large farmers familiar with the characteristics, symptoms, and treatment of the disease of pleuro-pneumonia, and have laboriously and carefully examined all the written and printed information submitted or referred to the committee bearing upon this subject.

In explanation of the bill submitted by the committee, they state, briefly, that sections 1 and 2 provide for the creation of a bureau of animal industry in the Department of Agriculture, with ample authority and necessary force to collect information and to prescribe rules and regulations for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious diseases.

Sections 3 and 4 provide the plans and methods for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, and the terms and conditions upon which the earnest and interested co-operation of the States is invited, and the penalty of quarantine by the President in case of their neglect or refusal to act.

Sections 5 and 6 provide for the exportation of live-stock from the United States upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time prescribe, with the view of removing the present restrictions imposed by foreign governments upon this important trade, and to prevent more stringent enactments by them in the near future, now imminent, unless prompt measures are taken to secure proper investigation and inspection of such cargoes, with such official certificates of condition as will not be questioned by any foreign government.

In the judgment of your committee this can be accomplished only through the Secretary of the Treasury, he having control of the customs department of the Government, without such a radical change of jurisdiction as would be neither desirable nor effective at this time.

The British Government, itself having suffered so severely from the same cause, has expressed great astonishment that the Government of the United States has not seen fit to take any measure whatever looking toward a restriction of this destructive plague; and now, from its recent action, it seems quite possible that unless measures of some sort are taken by the General Government at this session of Congress, that government will totally prohibit the landing of our animals on its shores. Notice of motions to this effect have already been made in both houses of Parliament.

The French Government recently published an edict prohibiting the importation of any of our pork products into France. This shuts us out of a trade which had already reached $19,000,000 annually, and was increasing at the rate of about $5,000,000 yearly. It is believed that if a veterinary division coul be established under some Department of the Government, with power to restrict the transportation of diseased animals, and those coming from and passing through infected districts, much might be done toward remedying the evil objected to by the French Government, and the trade partially, if not entirely, restored to its former footing.

Germany, from the same cause, has already placed a restriction upon the importation of these products, and there are indications that other countries whose trade, perhaps, in themselves is not of very great value, but which, in the aggregate, amounts to a very handsome sum, may follow the lead of France and Germany.

Sections 7 and 8 provide that the transportation from one State to another of any live-stock affected by any contagious or infectious disease, and especially the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, shall be a misdemeanor, punishable by fine or imprisonment.

The committee deem it an essential condition in any attempt to prevent the spread of this disease that the removal from one State to another of diseased animals should be declared a misdemeanor under the law, and punishable according to the aggravation of the offense. They have no doubt of its constitutionality, or of the propriety and present necessity of its enactment.

Section 9 confers upon the commissioners of the District of Columbia ample power and authority to prevent the introduction, or, if found to exist within the limits thereof, to provide rules and regulations for its speedy and effectual extirpation.

Section 10 makes it the duty of the several United States district attorneys to prosecute all violations of this act which shall be brought to their notice or knowledge by any person making the complaint.

Section 11 provides for the appropriation of $250,000 to carry into effect the provisions of this bill. Various sums have been submitted to the committee as necessary for this purpose, but after a careful consideration of all the arguments presented the committee believe that the sum named is ample for the present emergency.

Section 12 makes it the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to report annually to Congress, at the commencement of each session, an itemized statement of all persons employed and expenditures made under this act.

In support of the general provisions and purposes of the bill submitted, and the necessity for prompt legislation, the committee respectfully request the attention of the House to the following extracts from certain memorials and resolutions referred by order of the House to the committee:

A memorial from a committee appointed "at a national convention of the live-stock breeders of the United States, representing twenty-two of the principal stock-growing States and Territories, held in the city of Chicago, November 16, 1883," presented to the House on the 15th day of January, 1884, and printed in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Wednesday, January 16, 1884, at pages 450 and 451.

A resolution from the National Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, dated Washington, D. C., November 28, 1883, as follows:

"Resolved, That this National Grange memorialize Congress to adopt some measures to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia and other infectious diseases of cattle, and to make such appropriation as may be necessary to carry those measures into effect."

The following preamble and resolution from the General Assembly of the State of New York, dated January 8, 1884:

"Whereas the subject of the existence in the United States of the contagious diseases of cattle, known as the lung-plague or contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and the necessity and practicability of its being suppressed, has during several recent sessions of Congress been presented for the consideration of both Houses without any effective action being taken, although earnest appeals have been made not only by individual members, but by legislative bodies, by agricultural associations, and by representatives of the dairy and grazing interest in many of the States; and

"Whereas it has been conclusively shown by the report of the commissioners appointed under the authority of Congress to consider the matter, and known as the Treasury Cattle Commission, that the disease in question is entirely of foreign origin; that its existence in any country threatens the supply of beef and milk to the inhabitants; that the neglect to extirpate in time has brought great calamity in some countries, while in others, in which proper and timely measures have been taken, it has been wholly driven out and kept out, and that, under the circumstances existing, the work can be effectually accomplished in the United States only by means of an organization unlimited by State lines, and such as Congress alone can authorize and establish, which shall exist for the purpose of harmonizing and unifying the action of the several States involved, and shall for that purpose be furnished with funds from the national Treasury, to be expended for an object which is national in its character and importance: Therefore,

"Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Senators of this State in Congress be instructed, and the Representatives of this State be requested, to use their best efforts to secure the enactment of a law to carry into effect the recommendations made by the Treasury Cattle Commission in its report transmitted to Congress in February, 1882, for the extinction of the lung-plague and to provide means therefor, or to secure such other legislation as may speedily and effectually accomplish the result."

The following resolution from the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, held in the capitol building, Topeka, Kans., January 10, 1884:

"Resolved, That our members in Congress be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to favor such legislation as may be necessary to determine and clearly define the territory in the United States now infected with the disease among cattle known as pleuro-pneumonia, and to circumscribe and stamp out this much dreaded disease in this country by the purchase, if necessary, at the expense of the Government, and slaughter of all animals infected with the disease or known to have been exposed thereto."

Also the following joint memorial from the Legislature of Montana concerning pleuro-pneumonia in cattle:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the council and house of representatives composing the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, most respectfully represent:

That one of the chief industries of this Territory is the growing of neat cattle for export and sale, and many of our citizens have large sums of money invested in that business. We hear with alarm that contagious pleuro-pneumonia is prevalent among cattle in the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, and the District of Columbia, and that it is a disease exceedingly difficult to cure, if it is not wholly incurable;

That the raising of neat cattle for export and sale on the pasture lands of the Western States and Territories is yearly growing in importance, and that herds of cattle kept entirely for milking and dairy purposes are not uncommon with those who are engaged in these industries; a laudable spirit of improvement is manifest, and every year a large number of thoroughbred cattle are brought from the older States to the grazing ranges of the West;

That the great transcontinental lines of railways and their network of branches are rapidly penetrating to all the valleys and grazing ranges of the West;

That there is imminent danger of the importation of diseased cattle into these grazing ranges, while the possibility of spreading the direful contagion all over the United States and Territories, by the indiscriminate use of cattle-cars that may have been used in the transportation of diseased cattle and thereby become infected, is deemed a serious cause of alarm;

That the system of breeding and rearing cattle on the great grazing ranges of the far West is such that if the contagion is once inoculated into the herds in these ranges, it would be a matter of utter impossibility to take any precautionary measures to check the ravages of the disease, and it would, of a necessity, have to be allowed to run its devastating course until it had swept the country from the Rio Grande to the British line, and every hillside and valley, every spring and water course, all the shady groves and natural places of resort for cattle would be contaminated by the carcasses of animals that had fallen by the disease, where, from the very nature of the surroundings, circumstances, and conditions, they must lie unburned, to spread the germs of contagion until nature shall counteract their effect. The efforts thus far put forth by the States where it exists for its suppression have proven wholly ineffectual, and the prevalence and spread of the disease is damaging our export trade in live cattle to the amount of many millions of dollars annually. In our judgment the disease is so widespread, so virulent, and so damaging to the cattle-growing interests as to become a matter of national importance well deserving your immediate action.

We, your memorialists, therefore respectfully request the passage of some measure by your honorable body which will tend to effectually eradicate this fearful disease; and if no better or surer method is offered, we would beg leave to suggest the purchase by the Government of all cattle affected by the disease and their immediate destruction.

Trusting that you will appreciate the vital importance of this matter to the business of cattle-growing, we, your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

ALEXANDER E. MAYHEW,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GRANVILLE STUART,
President of the Council.

Also the following resolutions from the Stock-Breeders' Association of Minnesota, held at the Board of Trade rooms, Minneapolis, December 19, 1883, indorsing the action of the national convention of live-stock breeders of the United States, held at Chicago, and to which reference has been made:

"Resolved, That we heartily indorse the foregoing resolutions, and that we ask our Senators and Representatives at Washington to use all honorable means, when the matter is brought up for consideration, to secure such legislation for the protection of our cattle and meat products as the Secretary of the Treasury and the above committee deem expedient.

"Resolved, That we especially urge upon your consideration the enactment of some measure that will effectually prevent the shipment of calves or other stock from infected districts into other districts now clear of the disease, and recommend that the penalty for the violation of such enactment be made commensurate with the magnitude of the danger to which the cattle interests of the country are exposed by such shipments."

Also, similar resolutions from the Improved Live-Stock Association of the State of Iowa.

In conclusion, the committee submit the following statement, prepared by Dr. D. C. Salmon, veterinary surgeon of the Department of Agriculture, and submitted to the committee as the latest official information upon the existence, extent, and the present and prospective dangers to be apprehended from the spread of pleuro-pneumonia:

EXTENT OF PLEURO-PNEUMONIA, AND THE IMPORTANCE OF NATIONAL ACTION IN REGARD TO THE CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS.

The extent of territory infected with contagious pleuro-pneumonia of cattle and the number of animals actually suffering from this disease are insignificant in comparison with the annual direct and indirect losses traceable to it and the danger to which our immense live-stock industry is continually subjected. In Connecticut two herds were infected during the past summer, in which twelve animals were exposed and seven contracted the disease. In one of these herds the affected animal was destroyed, and at last accounts no others had contracted the disease; in the other herd four animals had died, or had been killed, and two with very extensively diseased lungs remained in quarantine. Both of these were Jerseys, and the owner refused to have them destroyed. What has been done with them or what will be I am unable to say, as the State authorities seem powerless to proceed beyond quarantine, and this seems to have been by no means secure.

In the State of New York, although the disease is almost entirely confined to the western end of Long Island, to Staten Island, and New York city, these localities are quite extensively infected; and as there are more than 2,000 stables, some of which contain several hundred cows, and many of which contain from fifty to one hundred, it is the most dangerous district in the country at this time. Recent reports are to the effect that the disease is extending through the river counties and exists in herds located from fifty to sixty miles north of New York city. How many cattle are affected in these counties I am unable to say, but the existence of the disease here is really of much greater importance to the country at large than the number of diseased animals would lead one to suppose, because it is a district where many thoroughbred cattle are raised and from which they are shipped to all parts of the United States.

New Jersey was recently supposed to be nearly free from pleuro-pneumonia, but the fact that a number of cases occurred without the knowledge of the State authorities, that a still larger number of herds were lately known to be infected in Union and Essex Counties, and that a very extensive outbreak in Hunterdon County was recently traced by means of sick cattle shipped to the New York market and discovered by the inspector employed by the United States Department of Agriculture, who is stationed at Jersey City, leads to the suspicion that a thorough inspection of the State might bring to light still other cases. The Hunterdon County outbreak was one of the most extensive that has recently occurred. It was supposed to have originated from a car-load of cows brought from Pennsylvania; but where these were infected is not known. Seven herds, at last accounts, were in quarantine, and as all were large herds, containing from forty to seventy cattle, a large number of animals were exposed. Inoculation was extensively practiced to check the fatality; but in spite of this, reliable authority places the loss at over fifty head.

In Pennsylvania there has recently been another very extensive outbreak, which was the result of taking a car-load of fourteen cows from the Calvert stock-yards in Baltimore to Chester County. Most of these cows were taken into large dairying herds, which they thoroughly infected. In each of these cases the Baltimore cows were the first to sicken, and a large proportion of the native cattle were soon affected with the same disease. These herds were visited the 3d of October by the veterinarian of the Department of Agriculture, in company with the State authorities, who killed eight of the animals in his presence in order to satisfy him as to the nature of the disease. The cases were typical cases of pleuro-pneumonia, and all those appearances were present which were recently accepted by the international veterinary congress held at Brussels as characteristic of contagious pleuro-pneumonia. In most cases a whole lung was hepatized; the inflammation was of different ages, showing the progressive character of the disease; the interlobular tissue was greatly distended with the exudation and the pleurisy was intense. According to an official report, dated October 30, the number of animals known to have been exposed was one hundred and four, and the number of sick ones that had been killed or had died was forty-six. A semi-official report of the present month places the number destroyed at seventy. It is now believed that the disease has been entirely overcome, and that the State of Pennsylvania is free from it.

In Maryland and the District of Columbia there are many infected herds in which a comparatively large number of animals annually contract the disease. By direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture a reliable inspector was sent to Baltimore late in October to learn the condition of the stables there as regards this disease. Nineteen stables, containing three hundred and ninety-eight animals, were examined. In twelve of these the infection was admitted; one had lost more than two hundred animals within three years; others had lost heavily for years; twelve sick animals were found; eighteen recent deaths were admitted; and three sick cows had just been sold or exchanged. This number of stables comprises but a small part of those in the vicinity of Baltimore, but it is believed that the number is sufficient to demonstrate the presence and dangerous character of the disease. We have no information of pleuro-pneumonia in the country districts of Maryland at any great distance from the cities. One or more herds near the District of Columbia have recently lost a number of cows, and at latest accounts had some sick. Within the District, without making any regular inspection, three infected herds have been found where from three to six animals are admitted to have been lost within the year.

In Virginia there are stables from which animals have recently been lost with symptoms of this disease, but none of these could be secured for examination, and therefore we can not be positive in regard to the nature of the disease.

Reasons for believing it contagious.

The first great reason for believing this to be contagious pleuro-pneumonia is the fact that nowhere in the country outside of the comparatively small strip of territory stretching from Connecticut to Virginia and east of the Alleghany Mountains have any cases been found which bear any close resemblance to the disease under consideration. If this disease were the result of climatic causes, or if it were produced by improper food and care, then we should certainly find it distributed over the whole country, or at least in all of those parts of it where similar conditions exist. It can not be originated by the manner of stabling and feeding cows near our Eastern cities, for substantially the same conditions exist at Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, and other Western cities, and no veterinarian has been able to find any similar cases of disease there, although special inspection has been made by competent persons.

The disease is not confined to stable cows, however, nor to those seasons of the year when acute lung diseases can be accounted for by the inclemency of the weather. The outbreak referred to in Connecticut occurred in the summer, in a country district, and where the cattle were running upon nice pasture fields. The extensive outbreaks in New Jersey and Pennsylvania also happened in summer, and were in the best farming districts of these States.

In this connection attention is called to the fact that in the State of Pennsylvania about ninety herds have been infected since March, 1879, and that notwithstanding the appointment of special agents in every part of the State, and the investigation of all cattle diseases wherever found, there was no disease resembling pleuro-pneumonia discovered except in eight of the sixty-seven counties of that State. The remaining fifty-nine counties have been free from any suspicion of this plague. What is even more significant is the fact that these counties are not distributed over various parts of the State, but that they join each other and are all in the southeastern corner of the State, where there is the greatest danger of infection by cattle brought from Philadelphia and Baltimore. With seventeen of these herds the infection was traced to cattle from Baltimore or other points in Maryland; with twenty-one it was traced to Philadelphia; with ten it was traced to cattle from herds in Pennsylvania known to be diseased.

The most favorable conditions of life were not sufficient to protect the cattle where this disease was introduced. I have already mentioned that a number of the outbreaks referred to occurred during the summer, and that the animals were running upon irreproachable pasture fields. Many of the affected cows were young and in fine condition. In Connecticut a Jersey bull, less than two years old, and two steers fit for beef were among the victims.

Again, the disease as we see it here does not occur in isolated herds a single case at a time, as does non-infectious lung diseases, but when it enters a herd a majority of the cattle are affected sooner or later. Some of the herds in Brooklyn and Baltimore have been losing cows from this plague for years, and one near the latter city, where but about fifty cows were kept at a time, has lost between 200 and 300 cows within three years.

These instances, all recent, are referred to, not as all the evidence bearing on this point, but simply as examples of what has been occurring for years past; and it is believed that they can not be explained on any other hypothesis than the contagiousness of the disease.

Danger greater than extent of infected territory and number of diseased animals would indicate.

Glancing over the territory which I have stated to be infected—and it must be confessed that it is not extensive, a single farm with perhaps five animals in Connecticut, about four counties in New York, as many in New Jersey, two or three counties in Maryland, and possibly a few stables in Delaware and Virginia. In most of the infected herds there are but one or two sick animals at a time, and frequently there are none; for where the disease has existed for a certain time the susceptible animals die off and only those which possess a certain immunity from it remain. As about 20 per cent. of all the animals exposed are able to resist the contagion indefinitely, a herd of comparatively insusceptible cattle is in time acquired, and the time necessary for this is shortened both in Baltimore and Brooklyn by the practice of inoculation. But these stables and grounds remain infected, and a large portion of the new cows brought into them contract the disease, unless they are previously protected by inoculation. The practice of inoculation does not destroy the infection; on the other hand it keeps it up, but it enables dairymen to keep their cows in infected stables without great loss, when without it more than half of the new cows brought into them would surely die.

Another fact of great importance brought out by the experiments of the French pleuro-pneumonia commission is that about 30 per cent. of the animals exposed to this disease show no symptoms of it beyond a slight cough. Such animals are probably as dangerous to others as those which have it in a more severe form, and yet they can be transported to various parts of the country without exciting the least suspicion. The animal which is supposed to have caused the outbreak in Connecticut was probably in this condition, as a careful examination of her lungs did not enable the veterinarians to detect any evidences of the disease; and yet pleuro-pneumonia existed in the stable from which she came, and her admission into the new herd was followed by the seven cases that have been mentioned. Similar instances are referred to again and again by the veterinarians of every country where the disease exists.

These infected districts, though small, are then a real danger to the whole country, because all the way from Connecticut to Virginia there is a large and increasing number of herds of thoroughbred cattle, which are frequently shipped to the West, and some of which have from time to time been infected with this disease. Fortunately the owners of thoroughbred cattle have generally had too much regard for their reputation to ship cattle when there was any disease in their herds, and the common cattle have not been sent to a sufficient distance to do much harm. But with the increased price of cattle a large number are being shipped from the East toward the West, and the danger of carrying the disease is consequently increasing. If the car-load of cattle shipped from Baltimore to Chester County, Pennsylvania, had gone to the ranges of the West they might have done irreparable harm. Again, the thoroughbred Jersey cow which went from an infected stable in New Jersey might as readily have been shipped to the West; and I have been informed that if the Connecticut outbreak had occurred a few months later one or more of the herds would have been sent, according to contract, to a Western State.

Now, while it is true that pleuro-pneumonia has existed in the East for forty years without having been carried to the West, it must be admitted, from what has occurred so many times in Pennsylvania and Connecticut, that there has been danger of this, and that this danger is increasing with the larger number of cattle now being shipped in that direction. No doubt this danger has been exaggerated, but the fact that there is danger, and that the disease, once carried to the Western herding-grounds, would probably be beyond our control, if we can judge from the experience of Australia and South Africa, is sufficient to show the importance of grappling with it while it can be so easily handled. The rapidity with which a disease spreads on these ranges when once introduced is illustrated by an occurrence of last summer in Southwestern Texas. A drove of cattle brought a communicable disease to that section which the Army surgeons believed to be contagious pleuro-pneumonia; but before any careful examinations could be made several hundred cattle had died and a large territory was infected. Fortunately investigations showed that this was not pleuro-pneumonia, but a disease which does not outlast a single season of the year. If it had proved to be pleuro-pneumonia, would it not have been a national calamity? With a large territory already infected, with no money and no power to control the disease, and occurring in summer months, before the State and national legislative bodies would convene, it is difficult to see how any effective measures could have been adopted.

The inefficiency of State action.

Though a number of attempts have been made by the States now infected to rid themselves of pleuro-pneumonia, these have generally or always failed because for various reasons the work was not thoroughly done. We saw the State authorities of Connecticut unable to exterminate the disease a few months ago when but a single herd contained sick animals. The stables of Brooklyn were never under complete supervision, and some could not be entered by the inspector even when the State of New York was most active in its endeavors at extirpation; and though the authorities of New Jersey have been engaged at the same task for five years, the State has probably never during that time been entirely free from pleuro-pneumonia. In Maryland the assertion has been made again and again that there were no cases of this disease in the State, and yet during any part of this time a thorough inspection could not have failed to reveal a considerable number. At best the attempts of the States have been spasmodic, and while one State was earnestly striving to accomplish something a neighboring one would allow the shipment of diseased cattle, and thus counteract the influence of the former. As a rule, therefore, State action has never been thorough, and the lack of unity of action between the States has prevented any lasting benefit, even when much has been accomplished.

Advantages of the work being directed by the United States Government.

A national direction of the work for the extermination of pleuro-pneumonia would overcome at once the discouraging features which have done so much to prevent the efforts of the individual States from being effective. With inspections in every infected State the shipment of diseased cattle would soon cease, new outbreaks would thus be prevented, and the danger which has so long menaced the great cattle interests of the country would be removed. The work would be more thorough and energetic, because those engaged in it would not be directly or indirectly dependent upon the good-will of the interested cattle-owners for their positions, and the plea of inability to pay for the diseased cattle which ought to be slaughtered would also be overcome. These have been the principal obstacles to the success of State action, and practically they are so great as to make it next to impossible for the States alone to free themselves from this plague.

The presence of pleuro-pneumonia costs annually more than would be necessary for its destruction.

Owing to the presence of pleuro-pneumonia in the United States, every steer shipped to Great Britain must be slaughtered within a certain time on the wharf where he is landed. This restriction upon the export cattle trade is said by competent authorities to make the price of our steers average $10 less than similar animals shipped from Canada. With over 100,000 beeves going abroad every year, this makes a loss of $1,000,000 annually, or enough to clear our country of the disease. Besides this there are the continual losses which are going on in the infected districts and the disturbed condition of trade from the many false alarms in regard to the spread of this disease, the entire annual losses being estimated by good authorities as high as $3,000,000.

Importance of investigating other diseases.

The proposition of establishing a permanent bureau for investigating the communicable diseases of animals is a matter of the greatest importance. While we have no more disease than other countries in proportion to the number of our animals, the enormous development of our live-stock industry has made the question of contagious diseases one of peculiar interest to us. The cause of these plagues, which has been an impenetrable mystery during all the past ages of the world, is being revealed by the science of to-day, and the infinitely small organisms which are able to produce such terrible havoc in our flocks and herds are at last being brought under subjection themselves, and their study has revealed much of the greatest value to us in our warfare against them. A country with so much at stake, with millions of dollars annually swept away by this class of maladies, can not afford to be idle. Other nations which have much less capital invested in animals than we have see the necessity for this work and are making provision for it; and it is to the credit of our country that we were one of the first to enter this field, and that results have been accomplished which will bear comparison with the investigations of any other country. But while much has been done, while millions of dollars have already been saved to our farmers by the facts thus far discovered, we have only made a beginning in the great work that is before us. Some of the most important diseases affecting our animals are still mysteries to us, and though they are distributed over large territories and decimate the live-stock, we are ignorant of their cause; we do not know how they are kept up from year to year; we have no means of combating them, and the idea of freeing ourselves from their ravages has scarcely dawned upon us.

A striking example of the necessity of such work is seen in the recent investigations of Texas cattle-fever. This disease has been advancing and infecting new territory for a century, and until the last year or two we knew nothing about it, and our best-informed veterinarians and stockmen did not suppose that it was found in one-fifth of the territory which has actually been overrun. These were points which it was necessary to understand before either legislative bodies or individuals could adopt intelligent measures for preventing the annual losses which have been most discouraging to the cattle industry in large sections of the country. And with every disease there are equally important points still to be investigated.

The laboratory and experiment station which have been fitted up during the past summer under the direction of the Commissioner of Agriculture for investigating contagious diseases make it possible to attempt the solution of questions which were formerly beyond our reach. The laboratory contains the most improved apparatus for such investigations, much of which was constructed according to new designs especially for this work, and it is safe to say that the facilities here are now equal to those possessed by investigators of similar diseases in any country, and in some respects they greatly surpass them.

In conclusion, I would say there is not a department of original research or of agricultural investigation in regard to which there is more pressing need for development than this, and none which promises to effect a greater saving. Our losses are now heavy, but they must increase as our animal population increases, as new diseases are introduced, and fresh areas are infected. But it is not alone a question of dollars; the investigation of animal contagio must throw new light on those human plagues which in our country alone sweep a quarter of a million of human lives out of existence each year. Some of these animal diseases are communicable to man, and have a greater influence over our health and lives than is generally supposed, and any means of controlling them cannot fail to have an important influence on human health as well.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, members of the House who have listened attentively to the reading of the report will scarcely need to hear any suggestions that I have to make in support of this bill. The Committee on Agriculture very fully appreciate the burden laid upon them by the House in the preparation of a bill to meet the exigencies of this cattle question. At the very threshold we are met by the difficulty of harmonizing the power which exclusively belongs to the Federal Government and the powers which belong to the States over private property within their borders.

The committee in the preparation of this bill have been guided by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which will be found in 5 Otto, page 465, Railroad Company against Husen. Without consuming the time of the House by reading any portion of this opinion, I will say it defines very clearly the powers which belong exclusively to the State as to the rights of quarantine, police regulations, and the destruction of private property within its borders, and the exclusive power belonging to the Federal Government to control interstate commerce.

This bill in its entirety assumes that the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia not only exists, but exists to an alarming extent east of the Alleghany Mountains, confined, as the report shows, at this time to parts of five States. That it is contagious and infectious, there can be no doubt at this day. That question has been too well settled to admit even of discussion. It has been determined by the experience in European countries and by the experience of this country that it is a virulent and violent disease, and that when it gets a foothold among the grazing herds in any section it requires years and millions of money to control it.

Holland and England and Australia have spent millions of dollars in their efforts to control this disease. In the judgment of your committee, the first step necessary in our country is to prevent the transportation of cattle affected with pleuro-pneumonia from one district or locality to another. That can be done only by invoking the Federal power.

In this bill we provide that no railroad company, steamboat corporation or company, or private person shall transport from one State to another cattle known to be affected with this disease. And, to bring the question of knowledge and of notice directly to the transportation company, we provide that a written notice shall be served by the Commissioner of Agriculture upon all such transportation companies within the infected district; so that under this bill, before any transportation company can be held liable, the disease must be located by the Department of Agriculture, and notice served on the transportation companies within the infected district.

When this bill was under consideration before in the House some objection was made to this power. If the provision of the bill in this regard can be strengthened or improved or in any way made better I will be very glad to receive a suggestion from any member of an amendment to that effect. But unless you can prevent the spread of this disease from the localities where it exists any bill that you can pass upon this subject will not be worth the paper upon which it is printed. The experience not only of this country but of all European countries proves conclusively that you must draw a cordon of fire around this disease before you can ever extirpate it; you must hem it in by quarantine and police regulations; you must prevent the transportation of cattle affected by this disease from one farm to another, which we admit can be done in our system of Government only by the State authorities. The transportation of such diseased cattle from one State to another is within the power of the Federal Government alone.

But the mere preventing the transportation of cattle affected by this disease will not extirpate it; it will not stamp it out. Other means are necessary for this purpose. This bill provides that after the inspection by the Federal authorities, after the location of the disease, after the notification to the State authorities, it shall be the duty of the Federal Government, in co-operation with the State authorities, to use all the means within its power to eradicate the disease, by quarantine, by local police regulations, and by the destruction of such private property as may be necessary for that purpose. That means the destruction of the animals that may be diseased and of such stables or barns as it may be thought expedient to destroy.

In the execution of a similar law in the State of Massachusetts there have been instances when it was deemed proper to destroy a barn. After the barn had been under quarantine and police regulations for more than a year it was decided by the highest veterinary surgeons of that day they could not rid the barn of the disease, and that the only way to extirpate the disease was to destroy the barn by fire. So virulent is the disease at times that all the means of disinfection known to science will not destroy it.

The most difficult point that has been submitted to the Committee on Agriculture to decide in connection with this bill has been the means by which co-operation of the State could be secured in the enforcement of this law. If, as some gentlemen perhaps will contend during this discussion and as delegations which have appeared before us have urged, the Federal Government alone should take this matter in hand, then you will prevent all efforts on the part of the State authorities to control this disease.

If the Federal Government is to go into the State of New Jersey, which State has already a law upon this subject, and makes an annual appropriation to carry it into effect, or into the State of West Virginia, or into Maryland, and say to either one of those States that we propose to take this matter in hand, you will paralyze all State efforts; the State will make no further appropriations; it will not appoint a force of officers to carry out any law, because by our legislation we will repeal all those State laws.

We have heard delegations from all the cattle interests of the country and representatives from every State where this disease exists. The Committee on Agriculture believe that the proposition submitted by them to the House is the best that can be devised for this purpose. That is, that the Commissioner of Agriculture, with the force placed at his command, shall, by proper investigation and inspection, locate this disease, notify the State authorities of the fact that it exists, and then invite the co-operation of the State. And from that point until the disease is exterminated it is proposed that the State and the Federal Governments shall each bear one-half of the expense of the destruction of private property necessary for this purpose.

By that means we secure not only the earnest but the interested co-operation of the State in the execution of this law. We secure what is better than that, the co-operation of the State authorities for the execution of the law within the limits of the State, because when we reach that point the power of the Federal Government ceases without the authority of the State. It is true that the Federal authority can go into a State and purchase in the market all the cattle in the State and destroy them after they are purchased. But the Federal Government can not go into the State of Maryland or New Jersey, for instance, and condemn private property; nor can it, under the decision of the Supreme Court to which I have referred, even put that property in quarantine or place it under police regulations. That power belongs exclusively to the State.

I am satisfied, from the information that we have upon this subject, that there is not a single State where the disease exists to-day that will not heartily and cordially co-operate with the Federal Government in the extinguishment of this disease, paying one-half of the expense of so doing, because the States are now making efforts to do it alone. Certainly they will not object to the Federal Government paying one-half of the expense.

Mr. GIBSON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. Suppose that after the Commissioner of Agriculture has notified the State authorities that such a disease exists in that State, the State authorities shall hold that the disease does not exist there. Under the operation of your bill what will be the effect upon the State?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. The gentleman has rather anticipated my argument. I will come to that point in a few moments. With the information we have on this subject I do not believe that there will ever be any disagreement between the State authorities and the Federal Government as to the existence of the disease. The scientists who have appeared before this committee, the veterinary surgeons of eminence in the United States, the practical stockmen of the country who have experience in the treatment of this disease, are all so well agreed as to its symptoms, that any question of difference can hardly arise. But if under the operation of this bill the disease is located by the Federal authorities and the State authorities take issue with them, and the difference can not be settled, it will be very easy to determine the action of the Federal Government under the provisions of this bill. When the report is made by the Commissioner of Agriculture to the President of the United States the discretion is left with him to say, upon all the evidence presented to him, whether the disease exists in that State or not, and whether the State authorities refused either to co-operate with the Federal Government or to adopt measures of their own to suppress it; and if he believes that the disease exists, and is dangerous to the animal industries of the country, he has authority under the provisions of this bill to declare that State or that portion of a State in quarantine, and prevent the exportation of cattle from that locality.

Mr. GIBSON. Erect a Chinese wall around the State.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. Yes, sir; I would erect a Chinese wall around it; I would erect it high enough and broad enough to hem the disease in where it is and prevent States where it now exists from spreading it over the vast plains of the West. And I would make that wall a wall of fire if it were necessary, to prevent this disease from spreading west of the Alleghany Mountains. The States where it does exist have temporized with this question long enough. The demand for the passage of this bill comes at this time from the great cattle-growing regions of the Northwest. Delegations were before our committee from all the States of the Northwest, as well as from Montana and Dakota, pleading with us here for two weeks to report to the House some bill to prevent this disease reaching across the Alleghanies and getting into the herds of the cattle-breeding districts of the country. If the gentleman had paid attention to the reading of the report he would have become satisfied of the magnitude of this evil and the necessity for the passage of the bill.

The bill makes it a misdemeanor for any railroad or other corporation or any private person to transport cattle known to have this disease; and why should we not declare it a misdemeanor for any man having in his possession diseased cattle to ship them from one locality to another, or put them upon the market, so that individuals in any community in the United States may have such cattle imposed upon them, to spread the disease, which, as we know, exists to-day in the District of Columbia, where cattle infected with it are being slaughtered every week for the consumption of the inhabitants of this city?

I have no extravagant notions about the existence of this disease in the District of Columbia or in the localities in the five States named. I do not believe all the stories I have heard about the matter, but I do believe the reports of Dr. Salmon, veterinary surgeon of the Agricultural Department, and the reports of other men eminent in their profession. I am as well satisfied as I am of any proposition that I ever investigated in my life not only that the disease exists in the vicinity of Washington, but there is not a member of this House who has not eaten in this city within the last three months beef from cattle infected more or less with the disease. Such meat is placed upon the market here every week.

After the location of this disease by the Commissioner of Agriculture and the notice to the President, the bill gives him power in his discretion, in the event I have named, to declare a State or a portion of a State in quarantine, and to prevent the exportation of cattle from that section.

Gentlemen have said to me that this is a dangerous power to be placed in the hands of the President. Why is it any more dangerous than the power which was placed in his hands to declare in quarantine any State or part of a State inflicted with contagious yellow fever or similar diseases, as was provided in the bill which passed this House in the Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth Congresses? "But," says one, "that was for the protection of human life." Dr. Salmon in closing his report says:

> But it is not alone a question of dollars; the investigation of animal contagia must throw new light on those human plagues which in our country alone sweep a quarter of a million of human lives out of existence each year. Some of these animal diseases are communicable to man, and have a greater influence over our health and lives than is generally supposed, and any means of controlling them can not fail to have an important influence on human health as well.

Mr. BELFORD. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I will.

Mr. BELFORD. I have recently read a book, issued by the Government, I believe, touching the question of cattle disease; and I learn from this book that the disease is imported into this country through the thoroughbred stock, and that this bill is the product of the combined genius of the cattle kings of the great West who own Texas steers, with broad horns, that can run so fast that a telescope can not reach them. [Laughter.] Now, can it be that under this bill these men who own the common Texas herds are authorized to kill and destroy the men who own the thoroughbreds—the Jerseys, the Durhams, and the like? For they predicate their whole case upon this one idea—that if there be any disease, it is brought into this country by the importation of absolutely thoroughbred cattle.

I am going to vote for this bill, and I think it is well enough for us to go slow and determine the question whether this is not for the benefit absolutely of a few great cattle kings against some other men in this nation who have means enough to improve the common stock. Now the question is, how many cattle in this country have died from pleuro-pneumonia?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. In what time?

Mr. BELFORD. That is the question which I wish the gentleman to answer.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. In what time?

Mr. REAGAN. I hope he will answer the question of the gentleman and not the preamble.

Mr. BELFORD. I will take one year or ten years.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the gentleman will answer so much as inquires whether the owners of broad-horns intend to kill off the men who own the Jerseys and short-horns? [Laughter.]

Mr. BELFORD. I wish to say in reply to the gentleman from Texas——

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not yield.

Mr. BELFORD. One moment.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not yield further. I have yielded to the gentleman for a question and not for a speech.

Mr. BELFORD. I will move to extend your time. I wish to say I was in fear that the men who were running this bill through would go to work and kill off the thoroughbreds on the theory that the thoroughbred cattle imported this disease into this country. If that be the theory, I think we should have courage and manliness enough to stand up and at least slowly and deliberately investigate this question.

Mr. COX, of New York. Why do you vote for the bill?

Mr. BELFORD. I have not voted yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I am glad the gentleman from Colorado has had the opportunity to make his speech. If he had waited a little while I would have given him all the time he wanted and he could have made it more deliberately.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will lay before this House before this discussion is over all the statistical information in the possession of the Committee on Agriculture as to the existence and extent of this disease and the number of animals slaughtered within the last five years which the veterinary surgeons were assured were affected by this disease. I have the tables here and will present them at the proper time.

So far as any question between the thoroughbreds and the long-horns of Texas are concerned I never heard of it before. I take it for granted that all the cattle interests of the country are equally concerned to prevent the spread of this dreadful disease. I would not like to introduce a bill into this House to destroy the long-horn interests of Texas, because that would include my distinguished friend who is in front of me as well as my distinguished friend on my right; and certainly if I should bring in a bill to destroy the thoroughbreds of the country, the gentleman from Colorado would be among the very first affected by it. [Laughter and applause.] There is no question between the men of Texas and the importers in regard to this bill at all. The fact is that the disease exists here and is located in a narrow strip of country east of the Alleghany Mountains. It is undeniable that the disease was imported into this country from Europe. It is another undeniable fact that it has been transported from one locality in the country to another for the last fifteen years. It is also true that it is time the Congress of the United States was taking some steps toward adopting some measure to prevent its spread farther west.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose to reserve the balance of my time until I have heard any objections which may be urged, and then will use whatever may remain of my hour in answering them.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to get a hearing in this House on any question which seems at first blush to be detached from the ordinary duties of a member of Congress; but we are attacked by a common enemy, something beyond the power of man, individually, to deal with; something municipalities can not cope with; something that even States, as has been demonstrated for a number of years, have been unable to eradicate; and so the people throughout the length and breadth of the great West that is now threatened with a plague which existed long before the Christian era and scourged the herds of the Old World—the people generally come here and ask, as the only power in the land to give them assistance and protection, the aid of the Federal Congress to do what can not be done by individuals, municipalities, or States. It is high time Congress was doing something; and were it not that it is impossible almost to get the attention of the Federal Congress for anything pertaining to the industries of the country outside of the usual appropriation bills and requests of men coming here seeking something for their individual selves, it would be possible to get a hearing and action at once. But, sir, the men who represent forty millions of cattle in the United States, coming from more than one-half of the States of the Union, have taken up the matter themselves and met in a congress of their own, and have appealed to us to protect them against an enemy which strikes so seriously at their interests.

The men who rule the world eat beef. The good women of our country who are rearing future Congressmen make butter, and healthy children drink milk.

We are all affected by this foreign plague. The cattle of this country number at least forty millions, and they are worth at least one thousand millions of dollars. That is not an extravagant estimate, although it is one-sixteenth of what the whole of the United States and all of its values was rated at twenty years ago.

This disease we have now extending some three hundred miles along our Atlantic seaboard. It is here on the coast, and unless Federal power is invoked for its suppression it is here to stay. It has not gone beyond the Alleghany Mountains. It has not been the custom of this country, even in the improvement of stock, to ship cattle in any quantities from the East to the West. We have been moving, and constantly moving, vast numbers of them from our Western States to the East. But the improvement of our cattle in the West, as a general rule, came principally from the South. I speak advisedly, and I know what I am saying, when I say that the improvement of the cattle of Iowa is principally from Kentucky. We obtained cattle from the blue-grass region, and the short-horn blood of Kentucky, until the county I live in has perhaps fifteen hundred head of pedigreed short-horns, and the district I live in perhaps ten thousand, while the whole State of Iowa has similar numbers of them in every county. We have improved our stock in that direction, and there was no disease in Kentucky cattle when the West drew upon that State.

This movement for the improvement of cattle is taking place all over the West. Our people are giving it careful attention throughout all the Western States. The Territories drew upon Iowa and other Western States when they improved, and got healthy cattle. Our people in that region are now turning their attention largely to the dairy. We make the best butter in the world, because we have the strongest grass from which to make it and the strongest grain. Enterprising men are going all over the world and bringing to our shores improved breeds of cattle. These are landed on our Eastern sea-coast right in the neighborhood where this pleuro-pneumonia or lung disease is existing. Our people are coming here to get Holsteins and Jerseys for the dairy, and we are in imminent danger of having the lung-plague taken to our States, or taken from here and disseminated among the cattle of our Western prairies.

Perhaps the most prominent reason why the Territories (that have 10 per cent. of all of our cattle), without any representation on this floor to vote, have not been contaminated by this lung-plague is because when they want to improve their breed of cattle they come to Iowa and Illinois, where this plague does not exist, and get their improved animals and take them to the West. It will be just as impossible to eradicate this plague from our Territories as it has been to drive it from the Russian steppes, where it has lodged for centuries, or from Australia, where it has ravaged herds since 1858, destroying 40 per cent. of their cattle in 1873, valued at $43,500,000, and, owing to free commons, still rages; or Africa, that was infected by a single animal that was taken there from Holland, and, owing to common pasturage, has no hope of eradication. All the history of the past admonishes us to save our beef-producing sections. We of the West only ask immunity from the cattle disease existing in the East. We are anxious to be taxed to purify Eastern herds, so that we may have a clean route to the seaboard, and a clean bill of health to present to the world when we send our cattle abroad.

We can not be assured, Mr. Chairman, how long we will be exempt unless some check is put on this matter. We suppose that it has not crossed the Alleghany Mountains. We do not know that to be a fact. We do not create it out there; we know that. No kind of climate will produce pleuro-pneumonia, because we have every kind from New Orleans to Saint Paul in the Mississippi Valley. No kind of abuse will produce pleuro-pneumonia, because we have used animals in all kinds of ways and weathers out West, and it has never come through abuse. Now, let us see where it comes from.

England got it—Ireland first in 1839, and she got it from Holland. She was improving her stock and introduced the plague in that manner, and it has been in Ireland ever since, because the men who own the grass in Ireland do not usually own the cattle. Yearlings are moved to a pasture this year, and the men who handle yearlings do not handle two-year-olds, so that next year they must be taken to another pasture. In this manner the stock are moved from year to year, and if they have the disease among them it contaminates those with whom they come in contact. Why, it existed in the steppes of Russia for hundreds of years, and the steppes of Russia have cattle going in common just as the prairies of the West have herds going in common. Wars brought it from the steppes of Russia to Eastern Europe, and commerce from there carried it to Western Europe and the British Islands. England got it in 1842, and since that time, according to the statement of the London Times, Great Britain and her dependencies have lost $500,000,000 of values from this cause. I remember well when I was a boy hearing the people talking about it. Here was farmer after farmer who was ruined by its taking off his cattle, so that many of them were compelled to leave the naked lands and come to the United States. They could not cure it. Sometimes a cow would linger along, and I recollect a saying that was common amongst the people at that time, that a cow could do worse than die. It was said that a cow could do worse than die, just as a politician can do worse than die. And some men, Mr. Chairman, in the height of their glory would do better to die at once when they have outlived their usefulness.

Now, the disease can be eradicated. The northern countries of Europe have had it and they have eradicated it. All the countries bordering north of the Cattegat have had it—Denmark, Norway, and Sweden—and they have all exterminated it.

Massachusetts got it in 1859. Massachusetts took hold and eradicated that disease. The people of that Commonwealth have the faculty of doing anything they do promptly and doing it well. They spent $77,000 through the State commission and stamped out the disease. The people of Massachusetts lost $250,000 in their herds before they got rid of it. The disease never got back there. And why? Because Massachusetts maintained a cattle commission, and they are not on the line of movement of animals. The West supplies New England with beef, and Western cattle are as healthy as the grass and pure air and water they exist on. Few herds for improving purposes have been imported into New England, and that people have learned to be on their guard.

Connecticut has had some of it, has some of it, and will have it. New Jersey has had it, has tried to eradicate it, and failed. And why? Because when New Jersey would go to work and appoint a commission and appropriate and isolate animals and attempt to stamp this disease out a butcher across the river would buy a herd of cattle at a reduced price and would bring it back. New Jersey spent $30,000 in the effort to eradicate the disease and almost gave it up in despair. It did not, however, give it up entirely, for that State is now spending $5,000 a year, wishing to hold the fort till the Federal Government steps in and helps.

I asked a man from Brooklyn who had made an inspection—I asked him, "What do you know personally about Brooklyn?" He said he inspected the stables of Brooklyn two months ago. "How many cows there?" "Five thousand." "How many have been exposed?" "Four thousand." "How many sick now?" "Five hundred." "What do you do with the sick ones?" He answered, "We send them to the butcher." Now, that looks like an outrageous proposition, to send a sick cow to the butcher. But let me tell you the temptation is fearful. All a man may have in the world may be his stock of dairy cows with which he furnishes his village with milk. These men learn to detect the approach of that disease before the most expert veterinarian could detect it, and they send their cows to the butchers.

The system pursued by dairymen is this: They buy a fat cow giving milk, keep her fat, and the moment they see any approach of pleuro-pneumonia they send her to the market. That is what is done now in most of the old countries; that is what is done in New York, done in Brooklyn, and it is done here. I went out the other day to a place within rifle-shot of this Capitol and saw three animals dissected. One had been kept there for experimental purposes. Two others had been bought. One had been bought three days before, having been found on the commons, by a trader for beef. She had acute pleuro-pneumonia. And the men who were successful in eradicating that disease in Massachusetts, the members of the commission of that State, were there. They recognized the disease in a moment. No other disease under the sun will produce such a lung as pleuro-pneumonia will. It is not seen anywhere else. Those men saw it in an instant. I brought part of the diseased lungs on this floor in a bucket on my way to the room of the Agricultural Committee. I wanted gentlemen to know something about it, that they might make an inquiry as to the effect this is to have on us who eat that beef. You can not tell the beef of animals affected by pleuro-pneumonia in the first stages of the disease from any other beef. But I do not want to eat it. The future will disclose what human ills follow it.

We must put ourselves in other people's places always before we judge them. It is difficult for the States to eradicate pleuro-pneumonia. The policy of the States has been to pay a small price. We want to authorize the payment of such a liberal price as will bring the diseased animal from its hiding. We want to have the disease stamped out speedily and effectually. We can keep it here a few years longer; and if we do it is only a question of time when it will go to the West, and it will then work such reformation in our Treasury Department here that the hundreds of millions there will vanish very quickly if you strike this great cattle interest.

Let me mention this as an illustration: You have heard of the soft corn in the West this fall. What has been the effect of it? The travelers could not sell so much because the West could not buy so much. The Eastern manufacturer could not sell so much because we had not the money to pay for it. The result was that the operative in the Eastern factories went out of employment because we had soft corn in the West. Those rich Western States are the great producing and buying States. They make money, and make it fast. And we spend it. It goes East and South. We do not keep it. The class of men in the West who may have soft corn are the men who did not graze their land with cattle. If you strike at the cattle industry we will come to have soft corn all along the line. It is an utter impossibility to maintain the fertility of the richest prairie without keeping cattle on the farm; and if that industry becomes paralyzed and crippled it will take from the resources of the United States enough to turn the balance of trade against us.

I do not want to weary the committee by talking too long. I presume other gentlemen would like to be heard. The bill will be fully discussed in the Committee of the Whole House. The committee have put themselves in possession of the facts that could be reached.

The Cattle Commission appointed by the President asked for a million and a half of dollars to begin this work. It will probably take that amount before they could get through. We propose to appropriate enough money to begin this thing. We have prepared a bill as carefully as we can prepare it. This matter requires one head, one directing mind, just as one man is required to guide the operations and movements of an army.

We do not know how far this disease has gone; we do not know how thoroughly it is intrenched. But we do know that it is here; we do know that there are five hundred diseased cows in the city of Brooklyn. We know that there are 1,500 in New Jersey, for we have heard from them. We know that the disease is in the District of Columbia. We know that diseased cows are brought to this market from the State of Virginia. We know that Baltimore gets cows infected with such disease and spreads it everywhere. We want to quarantine it, isolate it, extirpate it.

Inoculation will only perpetuate the disease. When a subject of this kind is under discussion we are sure to be beset by cranks. Some men tell us that we can extirpate this disease by inoculation. Now it is true that inoculation with cow-pox protects against the ravages of small-pox. But inoculation with pleuro-pneumonia only begets pleuro-pneumonia. The animal is inoculated in a part where the disease will not prove fatal as it will in the lungs. The disease develops pleuro-pneumonia where it is inoculated, but the system resists it better when in that place than in the lungs.

If we depend upon inoculation, and it is the only palliation that has been found, it will only continue and perpetuate pleuro-pneumonia. Every man who has cows on his place, whether by birth or by purchase, must inoculate them. There is, therefore, no hope in anything but isolation and extermination.

Our bill provides that if the State will take hold and co-operate with us we will help it; if it will not, then we will quarantine it and not allow it to send an animal out of the State. We impose severe penalties for so doing. We do not interfere with anybody's ideas of State rights at all. We say to the States, "If you will help us we will pay half the expense; but if you do not and will not, then you shall not bring any of your cattle out of the State, and we will not allow any cattle to go through your State to anywhere else." That is the theory of the bill in a nutshell.

New Jersey and other States scourged with this disease will take hold promptly and endeavor to exterminate it. Then we will look to the quarantine of animals coming from abroad, so as to prevent the disease from coming into the country again. We now quarantine for ninety days. Every animal coming from abroad must remain where it is landed for ninety days. If any are diseased, they must be destroyed where they are landed.

Now, what a loss all this causes to the people of the United States. A great many cattle can be taken to British pastures and sold there for much more money than we can sell them for at home. The owners of those pastures would be glad to get them, but they want a clean bill of health, and I cannot blame them for that.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has spoken twenty minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I believe I will yield the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. HOLMES. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him whether this is the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I would like to ask my colleague a question before he takes his seat, if he will permit me to do so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Believing, as I do, that there are few in this House who are better informed on this subject than himself, I would like to ask him whether the manifestations of this disease are such that imposition can not easily be practiced? Let me explain briefly what I mean. Some members of this House (and I desire to be informed on the subject myself) fear that people might come in with their fancy stock, as the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] says, and failing to market that stock, will claim that it is diseased with pleuro-pneumonia, and get paid for the destruction of such stock. I would like the gentleman to direct his remarks briefly to that point. Does the disease so manifest itself that there may be little or no doubt of its existence? I believe it does.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is no doubt at all. A lung diseased by pleuro-pneumonia is like no other lung; and the disease is like no other disease. The moment a veterinarian puts his eye upon it he can tell it.

Mr. TUCKER. Then what is the use of a great big veterinarian surgeon to find it out?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We want to know where it is.

Mr. TUCKER. You say everybody can tell it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not say that. I say a veterinarian can tell whether or not it is pleuro-pneumonia when he sees it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] if there is any information in the possession of the Committee on Agriculture that will be submitted to the House indicating the States in which this disease now exists or has existed within the last year?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes. If the gentleman will read the RECORD to-morrow morning he will find that information.

Mr. HISCOCK. I did not hear the report read. I would like to ask the further question if information will be laid before the House as to what has been done by those States, either in the direction of legislation or in the direction of appropriation, to control the disease in those States?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Your State, for example, has passed a joint resolution asking us for legislation on this subject and sent representative men here to urge it.

Mr. HISCOCK. Oh, yes; it has asked a great deal of legislation that we here have not thought it necessary to enact.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Your State has spent $60,000 in this direction and has quit; that is what it has done.

Mr. HISCOCK. That may be true with reference to New York, and I suppose pleuro-pneumonia has existed somewhat in New Jersey also, and in some parts of Pennsylvania, and at one time it existed in Massachusetts. I am not aware that it exists there now. What I am desirous to know is whether the States where it has existed have legislated upon this question; whether they have adopted police regulations with reference to it, and whether they are looking after the enforcement of their laws for the extermination of this disease.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My understanding is that the States where pleuro-pneumonia has existed have severally taken hold of the matter with more or less vigor, but they have already discovered that it is impossible to prevent it being brought in from neighboring States; that they need Federal management, Federal supervision, Federal co-operation, which will quarantine a State for the protection of other States. This seems to be the conclusion which has been reached.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the legislation which has been had in those States, respectively, is not contained in any communication which the committee has made to the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am not aware whether we are in possession of the several acts which have been passed by the States. We have been reaching in every direction for information on this subject and have obtained a great deal, but we have not concerned ourselves so much with State legislation as with the existence of the disease.

Mr. HISCOCK. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the States themselves, through their Legislatures, have insisted that with their own power they can not exterminate this disease, and have, therefore, asked the aid of Congress?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir; that is the conclusion that has been reached by intelligent observers in the States that have tried by State law to eradicate the disease.

Mr. HISCOCK. Through their Legislatures? If not through their Legislatures, who have appeared to represent them?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Most of them have, I think, through their Legislatures represented that very thing to us. It is a very well-known fact, from all the circumstances of the case and all the information we can get, that neither New Jersey nor New York could individually take hold and exterminate the disease unless it could quarantine against its introduction from other States.

Mr. HISCOCK. I differ with the gentleman on that question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, there is one thing upon which the gentleman can not differ with me—that those States have not succeeded in taking effectual measures against the disease. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that either of those States has cleaned out the disease?

Mr. HISCOCK. I am not advised how many cases there have been in these different States; I suppose the gentleman is.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was understood by the Chair to have yielded the floor, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who then, as the Chair understood, yielded to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LANHAM. The Chair labored under a misapprehension. I must insist that I had not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas was recognized, but the Chair understood him to yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. LANHAM. Then I desire to correct the Chair.

Mr. WELLER. If the gentleman from Iowa yielded the floor I did not so understand.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Well, I yield it now.

Mr. BELFORD. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] one question.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to make some remarks in opposition to this bill, but for the present I yield to my colleague [Mr. THROCKMORTON] to make a motion that the committee rise, with a view to an adjournment.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I hope the committee will not rise now.

Mr. BELFORD. I hope the gentleman from Texas will allow me to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. THROCKMORTON, there were—ayes 82, noes 81.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, and Mr. THROCKMORTON were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 66, noes 96.

So the motion that the committee rise was not agreed to.

Mr. LANHAM resumed the floor.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman from Texas to yield a moment. Mr. Chairman, I have been informed since the vote was taken, that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] who is now entitled to the floor is unwell, and did not desire to proceed with his remarks this evening. I was not before apprised of that fact. I am perfectly willing, for the accommodation of the gentleman, that the debate be suspended until to-morrow, and I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. LANHAM. I thank the gentleman kindly for his courtesy.

The motion of Mr HATCH, of Missouri, was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COBB reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, had come to no resolution thereon.

MEXICAN SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask by unanimous consent to submit for adoption at this time the following resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That bill (H. R. 3962) "granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war and other wars therein named, and for other purposes," be made the special order in the House as in Committee of the Whole on Thursday, the 14th day of February, 1884, after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of; not to interfere with general appropriation or revenue bills or reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Several members objected.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I ask leave to submit a motion.

Mr. WELLER. I wish to introduce a bill. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. TOWNSHEND's motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ALLISON. I present petitions of sundry citizens of Leon, Iowa; Colorado Springs, Colo.; West Point, Iowa; Huron, Dak.; Barada, Nebr.; Tabor, Iowa; Brooks, Iowa; Eagle Grove, Wright County, Iowa; De Smet, Dak.; and O'Neill, Nebr., favoring an appropriation for education in Alaska. These petitions I find on a common blank, and the parties signing them are requested to send them to me. I suppose that accounts for the number of them. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented preamble and resolutions adopted at a meeting of Shelladay Post, No. 84, Grand Army of the Republic, of Monroe, Iowa, praying that all surviving soldiers and sailors of the late war honorably discharged shall receive a uniform pension of $8 a month for the remainder of their lives; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of citizens of Fayette, Me., praying for an appropriation for education in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GARLAND presented the petition of Joseph McGuckian, praying to be granted a pension for injuries sustained by him while acting as a messenger and watchman in the War Department; which, together with the papers on file in the case, was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SLATER presented a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying for the forfeiture of the land grant of the Oregon Central Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PENDLETON. I present the petition of H. B. Banning Post, No. 198, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio; the petition of the Lytle Post, of the same organization, in Cincinnati; the petition of the Tenth Ohio Volunteer Veteran Association, and the Cincinnati Veteran Association, praying for the passage of a bill granting a land-warrant of one hundred and sixty acres, without condition of settlement, to every officer, soldier, and sailor in the war of the rebellion who has been honorably discharged and to the widows and minors of those who have died without receiving it. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAMAR presented a petition of citizens of Mississippi, praying for the prohibition of the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition from members of Scott Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Blue Springs, Nebr., ex-soldiers of the late war of the rebellion, praying that pensions be granted to the survivors of that war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ANTHONY presented the petition of A. W. Yates, of Bryant's Pond, Me., praying that pensions be granted to the soldiers of the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of letter-carriers of Bloomington, Ill., praying for an increase of pay; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present quite a number of petitions from citizens residing in different parts of the State of Ohio, praying that a land-warrant for one hundred and sixty acres of land be granted to each honorably discharged officer, soldier, or sailor who served in the United States Army and Navy during the war of the rebellion. These petitions are very numerously signed and there is a great number of them. I move that they be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BECK presented a petition of citizens of Kentucky, praying for an appropriation for education in Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONGER presented resolutions of the common council of the city of Houghton, Mich., praying that the lands granted to aid in the construction of the Marquette, Houghton and Ontonagon Railroad be not forfeited; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BLAIR. I present a memorial of some gentleman who signs himself "Workingman." It covers a great variety of subject-matter, doctrine, reproof, and instruction upon the political problems of the times, taxation, anti-monopoly, the condition of the working people, and various other matters full of meat. I think, perhaps, it may as well be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is that an anonymous communication?

Mr. BLAIR. It is anonymous; it is signed "Workingman." I am requested to present it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I raise the point of order whether an anonymous communication is to be received as a petition to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not receive it without unanimous consent.

Mr. BLAIR. It is not addressed to the Senate; it is addressed to me, with the request that I "make these things known to Uncle Sam;" and hardly knowing what to do with the paper I present it. If it is objectionable upon that ground I shall be glad to withdraw it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think a number of us have received similar papers. The Senator can embody it in his remarks some time when he is making a speech.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not care at all to embody it in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The paper can not be received, objection being made.

Mr. FRYE presented the petition of Mrs. Sallie Carroll, executrix and devisee of William T. Carroll, deceased, praying compensation for the value of the timber and wood taken from the tracts of land known as Sligo and the Dobbin farm, and used in the construction of Fort Slocum; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

RRPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to which was referred the bill (S. 1293) providing for distribution to members of Congress of ten charts and other publications of the Hydrographic Office for each session of Congress, have instructed me to report it without amendment and to recommend its passage. I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I think the experience of the Senate for the last few weeks shows that it is not conducive to the public interests that measures should be considered during the time allotted to strictly morning business. I therefore object to the consideration of the bill until after the morning business is concluded.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator from Kansas to withdraw his objection, if he is pleased to do so, at this time. This is a bill which I introduced providing that charts from the Hydrographic Office might be distributed to Senators and Members to meet the requests of their constituents for copies of these charts. I applied to that office and found there was no authority to furnish these charts to persons who desired them without some resolution or act of Congress, and I therefore introduced the bill. Such demands come very frequently for that class of charts, and they can not be furnished except by authority of law. Several gentlemen in the other House have informed me that they have received requests for the same charts, and, though this is a little matter, people are waiting to receive them. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection and let the bill pass now. If it goes on the Calendar it may not be reached for a long time.

Mr. INGALLS. I feel that I can not, in justice to the interests that I believe are involved, withdraw my objection. I have witnessed, and I think every other Senator has, during the past three or four weeks a continual invasion of the rules that has resulted in serious detriment. We have observed on several occasions, where requests of this kind have been made, that the entire morning hour has been consumed in the consideration of measures which we were assured would take but a single moment, whereby "enterprises of great pith and moment" have been "turned awry" and lost "the name of action."

I think, therefore, Mr. President, that I shall insist at this time and hereafter upon the observance of the rule, saying to the Senator that after the conclusion of the morning business I will very cordially cooperate with him in securing action upon the bill.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of A. F. Baugh, administrator of the estate of Ashton Butterworth, praying compensation for the use of a cotton manufactory and machinery, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 36) for the relief of Mrs. Martha Vaughn and Mrs. Louisa Jackman, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Armistead Burwell, deceased, late of Vicksburg, Miss., submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 595) to repay the State of Georgia $27,175.50, money advanced by said State for the defense of her frontiers against the Indians from 1795 to 1818 and not heretofore repaid, to make a favorable report thereon. This is the same bill which was passed by the Senate at the last session, the statement being made that some ancient vouchers had been discovered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] when governor of that State which established the claim of the State.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 445) for the relief of the heirs or legal representatives of Robert J. Baugness, deceased, submitted an adverse report thereon.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the bill may be placed upon the Calendar. The bill has heretofore been reported favorably and passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Manning for relief for timber cut from his land by United States officers, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 571) for the relief of Casimiro Ginesi, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1055) for the relief of Thomas C. Ellison, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SEWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 469) to increase the salaries and pay of the chaplains in the Army, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 372) for the relief of Frances A. Robinson, administratrix of the estate of John M. Robinson, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MILLER, of California, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 791) to amend an act entitled "An act to execute certain treaty stipulations relating to Chinese," approved May 6, 1882, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 520) for the relief of Francis Gilbeau, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 968) for the relief of Fielding Hurst, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1288) for the relief of Nathaniel C. Bateman, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

PROTEUS COURT OF INQUIRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further bills or joint resolutions that order is closed, and "concurrent and other resolutions" are next in order. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered yesterday by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] which went over under the rule.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am requested by a reputable attorney of this city to ask for an order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must first lay before the Senate the resolution that went over from yesterday. It will be read.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. BUTLER was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the record of the proceedings, testimony, and findings of the court of inquiry in relation to the events connected with the loss of the steamer Proteus in the Arctic Ocean.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HILL, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads have leave to sit during the sessions of the Senate.

CIVILIAN ENGINEERS.

Mr. PLUMB submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

SILVER LAKE, LOUISIANA.

Mr. FRYE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to report to the Senate whether or not under the acts of Congress donating swamp lands to the State of Louisiana Silver Lake, in Caddo Parish, in said State, was included, and whether or not under these acts it has been listed to the State as swamp land; together with any other facts in his Department touching the same.

LONGEVITY PAY.

Mr. VOORHEES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to transmit to the Senate copies of the decisions of the Second Comptroller, dated January 3, July 31, and August 16, 1883, on the claims of Gunners James Nash and Samuel Cross under the so-called longevity provisions of the naval appropriation act of August 5, 1882; together with a statement of the number and amounts of the claims allowed by said Comptroller and paid under said provisions and their respective dates of settlement, and whether the same were paid from current appropriations or reported to Congress and paid in pursuance of appropriations therefor.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar the bill reported from the Committee on Printing in regard to hydrographic charts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate now proceeding under the eighth rule, the Senator from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the bill reported from the Committee on Printing this morning be considered. It will be read by title for information.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1293) providing for distribution to members of Congress of ten charts and other publications of the Hydrographic Office, for each session of Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection that the bill be now considered?

Mr. PLUMB. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The first case on the Calendar under the eighth rule will be announced.

The bill (S. 382) for the relief of the city of Glasgow, in the State of Missouri, and of certain citizens thereof, was announced as first in order upon the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that that be passed over. It has been reported adversely and there is no intention of having any action upon it. I shall ask to have it stricken from the Calendar after I have had time to examine the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over, if there be no objection.

DEVISEES OF DANIEL CARROLL.

The bill (S. 196) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the devisees under the will of the late Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, deceased, their heirs or assigns, may prosecute a suit in the Court of Claims, according to the rules of practice and proceedings in that court, against the District of Columbia, to recover such damages, if any, as they have sustained by reason of the change of grade and the regrading of the streets around square No. 736 in the city of Washington.

Mr. HOAR. I think this must be a bill which came up on the last day, or the last but one, of the last Congress. I objected to it then, and after the objection I was spoken to by a gentleman who represented one of these devisees, who stated that it was a case of uncommon hardship by reason of the great injury to the estate of these persons, who were in straitened circumstances, and that my objection would prevent anything being done at the last Congress. So I withdrew the objection, and the bill passed the Senate; but it seemed to me then, and seems to me now, that this matter ought to be dealt with by a general law, and it was only the late period of the session which made me, very reluctantly, consent to the passage of the bill then.

If there be no provision of law by which persons may recover whose real estate is damaged by changes in the highways in the District of Columbia, that is probably because at some time the legislative power has been of opinion that it was not expedient that the public should compensate land-owners under such circumstances. I suppose the fee, the ownership, of the streets is in the United States in this District. Therefore the policy goes on the ground that they have a right to change the grade of their streets for their own purposes without any legal or moral obligations to adjacent proprietors. But if that be not a sound principle (and I suppose the policy in nearly all the States in the Union is otherwise, certainly it is in my own State), then it seems to me the Committee on the District of Columbia ought to frame a general law and not select a particular person who has been damaged and give him this bounty, which is not granted under the general policy of the law to others.

I would ask the Senator from Rhode Island who reported the bill why it is not now practicable to frame and report a general law on the subject, as it is early in the session?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say in answer to the question of the Senator from Massachusetts that this is the same bill which was reported at the last session and objected to by himself, which afterward passed the Senate on his withdrawing his objection.

I will further say in answer to his suggestion about the policy of adopting a general law, that the committee have considered that subject but have not been able to reach a conclusion. There are some circumstances surrounding this case which seem to make it proper for the special action of Congress. The work was done after the taking away of a remedy which the parties would have had if it had been done at the time it was ordered, after the board of audit, which had the right to allow claims of this kind, had been abolished by act of Congress.

The Senator is mistaken in supposing that Congress has ever declared by legislative action or by lack of legislative action any such policy as that they would not allow claims for damages on account of changes of streets by the Government of the United States. Formerly the right to pay these damages rested in the legislative assembly of the District, afterward in the board of public works, and afterward in the board of audit established by Congress. The board of audit was subsequently abolished, in 1874, I think, and after that time no power to pass on claims of this kind resided in any of the District authorities.

This case is one certainly demanding the prompt action of Congress, for the reason that the devisees of Mr. Carroll, consisting of two old ladies, must be very near their last days; they are very aged and in a very infirm condition, and they need the relief which this bill proposes to give them. I certainly hope that the Senator from Massachusetts will not interpose an objection to the passage of this bill. The committee have under consideration the question whether they will present a general bill. If the Senator has any special case in his mind I am sure the committee will be ready to consider it.

Mr. HOAR. I will not interpose an objection, under the peculiar circumstances, against the judgment of the committee, which seems to be unanimous as far as the report goes. I wish to state, however, that a gentleman formerly from my own State presented to me a year or two ago an almost similar case, that of an aged man, who must have been more than 80 years of age, who had lived here some time, and whose very splendid property had been largely diminished by the action of the Government in a similar case.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I have conversed with my friend from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I do not see him in his seat now, but I do not think he will interpose any objection to the consideration of the bill which I reported this morning, which is for the convenience of Senators, and therefore should be passed at once. I will wait, however, until he comes in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The bill is not now in the Senate Chamber, but has been sent for. Does the Senator move to take it up out of its order?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will wait until the Senator from Kansas comes in.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us go on with the Calendar. The Senator from Kansas will be in soon, no doubt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next bill on the Calendar will be read.

WILLIAM H. BECK.

The bill (S. 538) for the relief of William H. Beck, assignee of A. Burwell, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is reported adversely.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DURATION OF PATENTS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. 672) to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes, in relation to patents; which was read.

Mr. MCPHERSON. This bill is likely to involve a very long discussion. It can not be taken up in the morning hour and proper discussion had. I object to its present consideration.

Mr. PLATT. I trust the Senator will withdraw his objection for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey give way to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I yield.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think that this bill ought to excite much discussion. I should suppose there was nothing in this bill which would not meet the approval of all the members of the Senate. I am aware that a bill is coming on the Calendar which will create a good deal of discussion. I think this is an important bill; I have not asked to have it taken up out of its order, but I think it ought to be taken up and considered. If the Senator desires time to examine it, I will agree to take it up to-morrow or some other day. I think, however, Senators, if they will examine this bill, will have no real objection to it, and that it will not excite opposition or discussion beyond an explanation of it. Still, if the Senator desires time to examine it, I will let it go over to-day without prejudice and have it taken up to-morrow morning.

Mr. MCPHERSON. It is a very important matter to undertake such a modification of the patent laws, and therefore I think it very unwise to undertake under a five-minute rule to discuss a question so important as this. Every Senator, it is well known, under the rule is confined to one speech upon a question, whatever points may be raised on the opposite side.

Mr. PLATT. Has the Senator any objection to letting it pass over this morning without prejudice?

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Connecticut will allow me, I desire to suggest to him that he make the bill a special order for any day he may choose that does not conflict with other special orders, to be taken up at 2 o'clock on a day designated.

Mr. PLATT. I will move, then, that the bill be made the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that arrangement. This bill, if it passes over in the morning hour on an objection to its consideration, retains its place on the Calendar and will be probably the next measure that will be considered by the Senate after we have passed through the morning hour. The objection made in the morning hour does not displace the bill in its position upon the Calendar. There is therefore no necessity for this constant effort to make bills special orders at a certain day. Let us proceed regularly with the Calendar. This bill will be reached as soon perhaps, or very soon after the bill under consideration as a special order has been disposed of. I object to making special orders.

Mr. PLATT. I had no desire to make any special order. What I desire is that the bill shall not lose its place upon the Calendar.

Mr. MORGAN. It does not lose its place under this objection.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from New Jersey would give me his attention. There has been some very serious and well-grounded complaint of the operation of the patent laws as working hardship upon some innocent purchasers of patented articles in the agricultural regions. There is a bill later on the Calendar which deals with that question which will bring that matter before the Senate. This bill is simply designed to correct a very clear injustice to inventors in our patent laws, to wit, that if an American inventor gets a foreign patent his patent here expires at the date of the expiration of his foreign patent, no matter what it may be. In some foreign countries a patent has to be frequently renewed. If the invention does not make it worth while for the patentee to have a renewal there he loses his patent here. This bill is simply to remedy that injustice. It is a plain case, about which I believe the entire Patent Committee was agreed. It presents one single point only.

While agreeing with the entire reasonableness of the Senator's suggestion that a matter affecting his people as it does mine should be examined by him, I hope he will be willing to let the bill go over until to-morrow and retain its place on the Calendar, because he will have the same right to make objection to-morrow that he has now, if on examination he thinks it worth while.

Mr. McPHERSON. I have no objection to that. I only objected to the present consideration of the bill because I wanted to examine it more thoroughly.

Mr. HOAR. Then it will stand to-morrow as it does now, and then the Senator or any Senator can object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the rule. The new rule under which we are now acting does not displace the bill. It goes over retaining its place on the Calendar, but except by unanimous consent it can not be resumed to-morrow under the new rule.

Mr. HOAR. The desire is to have unanimous consent that the objection shall not take it out of its place on the Calendar of unobjected cases for to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent of the Senate that this bill be passed over informally, not losing its place on the Calendar. If there be no objection that will be considered to be the unanimous consent of the Senate. The next bill will be called in its order.

M. P. JONES.

The bill (S. 269) for the relief of M. P. Jones was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $24,597.75 to reimburse M. P. Jones for money deposited by him in the United States depository at Portland, Oreg., to complete the United States surveys along the line of the Oregon central military wagon-road in Southeastern Oregon, and to pay the expenses of the clerical work in the office of the United States surveyor-general of Oregon, the money having been deposited under the provisions of an act of Congress approved May 30, 1862, upon the surrender by him to the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the duplicate or triplicate certificates of deposit held by him.

Mr. MAXEY. Let the report be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. DOLPH January 14, 1884:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 269) for the relief of M. P. Jones, report as follows:

That this claim has been repeatedly examined by committees of both Houses of Congress, and has always been reported favorably. It passed the Senate at the second session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and was favorably reported in the House, but was not reached on the Calendar. The Senate Committee on Public Lands, at the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, unanimously recommended the passage of a bill identical with the one under consideration.

The facts are correctly stated in House Report No. 22, Forty-sixth Congress, and for convenience we adopt their statement, which is as follows:

"It appears in this case that M. P. Jones deposited to the credit of the United States in the city of Portland, Oreg., moneys for the survey of public lands in said State as follows:

	For surveys.	For office work.
May 21, 1875	$19,470 00	$530
September 13, 1875	4,896 00	104
Total	24,366 00	634	= $25,000 00
That of this amount the United States have expended as follows	23,963 75	634
Leaving unexpended	402 25	000	= 402 25
Leaving balance due M. P. Jones			24,597 75

"That under this deposit so made the United States made surveys of lands hereinafter described, and the United States surveyor-general for Oregon approved the maps of the same on January 3 and January 11, 1876, respectively, said surveys being as follows, to wit: Of the sixth, seventh, and eighth standard parallels south, and exterior lines of township 35 south, range 26 east; exterior lines of township 36 south, ranges 25 to 31 east; exterior lines of township 37 south, ranges 24 to 28 east; exterior lines of township 38 south, ranges 25 to 28 east; exterior lines of township 29 south, ranges 24 to 28 east; exterior lines of township 35 south, range 31 east; exterior lines of township 32 south, range 40 east; and subdivisional surveys of township 36 south, ranges 25 to 29 east; township 37 south, ranges 24 to 28 east; township 38 south, ranges 24 to 26 east; township 39 south, ranges 23 to 25 east; township 35 south, ranges 26 to 31 east; township 36 south, ranges 25, 30, 31 east; township 37 south, range 24 east; township 38 south, range 24 east; township 39 south, range 26 east; townships 31 and 32 south, range 41 east; township 30 south, ranges 43 and 45 east; township 31 south, ranges 42 and 44 east; township 3[illegible] south, range 39 east.

"That the township plats of surveys so made and so approved were filed with the proper register and receiver at the local United States land office on February 24, 1876.

"That this deposit of $25,000 was not made in accordance with the provisions of any law of the United States, but this amount of $25,000, when deposited by said M. P. Jones, was placed in the United States Treasury to the credit of the fund or appropriation entitled 'Deposits by individuals for the survey of public lands,' under acts and resolutions of Congress providing only for the deposits of money by actual settlers for the surveys of public lands.

"That the total number of acres surveyed by this district [deposit] was 531,782, and of which 237,731 passed to the Oregon central military wagon-road under an act of Congress.

"That the surveys made and paid for by said deposits inured to the benefit of the United States; said surveys were made under the supervision of the United States surveyor-general for Oregon in the same manner as other public-land surveys in said State were made.

"That if these surveys had not been made at that time and paid for with the moneys thus and so deposited by said M. P. Jones, that then the United States at some subsequent time would have surveyed the same townships, and at the same cost, and paid for the same from the appropriations made by Congress from time to time for the survey of the public lands in said State.

"That the grant by Congress to the Oregon central military wagon-road was made in a section of the country to which the public surveys had not been extended, and the terms of the grant require that this road should be completed within five years, and that the lands should be used for the purpose of paying for the construction of said road.

"That if the lands had not been surveyed in the manner they were, then the provisions of the act of Congress could not have been complied with.

"That Congress has refunded deposits of this character in similar cases (United States Statutes, volume 17, page 515), directing the payment to the Saint Paul and Sioux City Railroad Company the sum of $1,370 out of the appropriation of $50,000 for surveys in Minnesota; said $1,370 was deposited October 4, 1859, by said company, and in accordance with said act of Congress was refunded to them on July 12, 1873. (See also volume 18, United States Statutes at Large, page 213, appropriating $10,600 to reimburse the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Company for surveys along the line of that road; money deposited August 20, 1872, and refunded August 20, 1874.)

"That a bill for the repayment of this amount of $25,000 to M. P. Jones (Senate bill No. 150) passed the Senate on the 15th day of June, 1878. (See Senate Journal, second session Forty-fifth Congress, page 716, June 15, 1878.) And which bill was thereafter referred to the Committee on Public Lands of the House, and by it favorably considered, and by it ordered to be favorably reported to the House with a recommendation that it should pass, but which report failed to be made to the House in time to be acted upon during the Forty-fifth Congress.

"That of the amount so deposited by said M. P. Jones ($25,000) the sum of $402.25 remains unexpended, and which unexpended balance has been refunded to said M. P. Jones, leaving still due him the sum of $24,597.75.

"The committee unanimously concur in recommending the passage of the the bill as amended."

After the favorable report of the Senate Committee on Public Lands to the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, before referred to, had been made, a communication from Hon. S. J. Kirkwood, then Secretary of the Interior, inclosing a letter to him from the honorable Commissioner of the General Land Office, was received by the committee, which induced the committee to request the recommitment of the bill for further examination, but no further action of the committee was reported. Said communications relate to the grant of lands to the State of Oregon by the act of Congress referred to in the report hereinbefore set forth.

Assuming that certain lands which had been certified to the State of Oregon, or its grantees, under said act, and which are situated within the present limits of the Klamath Indian reservation, had been improvidently certified, and that at the time the advances were made by said Jones he was interested in said grant, and stating that the owners of the grant had refused to release such lands to the United States, the honorable Secretary of the Interior recommended that, on that account, M. P. Jones and his associates should not be reimbursed for the money advanced by them to the United States until such release should be given.

Your committee, having examined the correspondence and the evidence before the committee relating to said questions, find that the Senate Committee on Public Lands at the third session of the Forty-fifth Congress had the question of the title to the lands covered by the original grant in place to the State under said act which are situated within the Klamath Indian reservation under consideration, and unanimously reported (Report No. 731) as follows:

"After careful examination we report that, in our opinion, the grantees of the State have the title to these lands."

The bulk of the lands supposed by the honorable Secretary of the Interior to have been improvidently certified to the grantees of the State are a portion of the lands the title to which was under examination by said committee.

It further appears that the money deposited by said Jones was not used for the survey of the lands alleged to have been erroneously certified to said grantees, and it now appears to the committee that the greater portion of the money deposited by said Jones was advanced by other parties having an interest in having said surveys made, but who were not interested in the said land grant, and that this claim is being prosecuted for their benefit to the extent of their respective advances.

Your committee, therefore, report that if there be any legal question as to the title of the present owners of said grant to any of the lands surveyed to the State or its grantees, and it is desired by the United States to try that question, the same should be submitted to some tribunal other than Congress.

Your committee, therefore, recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPITOL TERRACES AND STAIRWAYS.

The bill (S. 402) for the completion of the Capitol terraces and the stairways connected therewith, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $777,588.98, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the construction of the terraces along the north, south, and west fronts of the Capitol, and for the two grand stairways at the western front, at the head of Pennsylvania and Maryland avenues; the same to be erected in accordance with the plan already furnished by Frederick Law Olmstead, landscape architect.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, this is a bill in accordance with the plans adopted by Congress in 1874. It is to be regretted, perhaps, that this part of the plan had not been first completed, but there was such a pressure for roads and tracks approaching the Capitol that it was deferred. If Senators will send for Executive Document No. 9 of the present Congress they will find a plat describing the whole plan and the estimated cost.

Mr. INGALLS. How much has been expended already?

Mr. MORRILL. About $50,000. I desire to say that when this plan is completed it will be in harmony with the grounds as they are already laid out. It is to complete the approaches on the west front of the Capitol with more imposing and handsomer stairways, and it is also to substitute a marble terrace in lieu of the present dirt terrace, which looks perhaps weak and incongruous with so large a building as the Capitol.

I will say that when the terrace shall be completed there will be ten additional committee-rooms, equal to the very best, in the basement of the Capitol, half of them perhaps for the House, and half for the Senate. It will also have seventy-four other rooms from 20 to 40 feet long and about 20 feet wide for the storage of documents and of wood, coal, and various things that are necessary to the Capitol, and much in the way elsewhere. Then there will be an underground railway at one end or the other for the admission of coal and documents, without daily crowding and interfering with the entrance of the Senate or of the House for their introduction.

I think any persons who have ever fully examined the matter will concede that it will be a vast improvement to the appearance of the Capitol and a great accommodation and convenience to the practical operations in and around this building.

I ask, as I do not desire to take up time, that I may have, as a part of my remarks, published in the RECORD an interview of the landscape architect, who is confessedly now perhaps superior to any person living on this continent or any other in his peculiar art of landscape architecture. I ask to have the interview which appeared in the Evening Star, or a portion of it, printed in the RECORD, that it may be seen hereafter by those who may choose to investigate the subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont what is the estimated cost of the entire completion of the work under the plan?

Mr. MORRILL. The estimated cost of the entire completion is $777,588.98.

Mr. INGALLS. When will it be done?

Mr. MORRILL. In two years. The whole amount is proposed to be appropriated at once in order that contracts may be made for the materials. Probably not over one-half the sum will be required during the present year.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask the Senator if he has the figures showing what the work has already cost, so far as it has been done?

Mr. MORRILL. So far as this matter is concerned, about $50,000.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Fifty thousand dollars for what has been done?

Mr. MORRILL. On the north and south sides and in front.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I think if we are to vote intelligently upon this subject we should be possessed of all the information which the Senator from Vermont has. The printing of the "interview" in the RECORD will not enlighten the intellect of any Senator who is called upon to vote this morning; and I would, therefore, suggest that if the alleged "interview" contains any information that is pertinent to the subject or would be advantageous, the bill lie over until to-morrow morning in order that we may read it.

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the Senator will not insist on that. I think I have given in substance the information that is contained in the interview, but there are some details of the matter here that I think will be found to be interesting reading to those who desire to see it. The additional space to be gained will be 1,300 feet long by 60 feet wide. It states various other small points. But I think I have given a sufficient amount of information to justify the Senator from Kansas in voting for the bill.

The "interview" referred to by Mr. MORRILL is as follows:

THE CAPITOL BUILDING—PROPOSED IMPROVEMENT OF ITS ARCHITECTURAL CHARACTER.

An explanation of the plan now being carried out—Architectural defects to be cured by the marble terrace—An interview with Mr. Frederick Law Olmsted—The old plan of the grounds modified to meet the requirements of the modern building—A movement wherein Washington city leads the world, &c.

The work on the marble approaches at the northeast corner of the Senate wing and the southeast corner of the House wing of the Capitol has progressed so far that one may form some judgment of the architectural effects which the comprehensive plan of improvement of which these approaches are a part is designed to produce. These approaches have been built in accordance with the design adopted by Congress in 1874, the chief feature of which is a terrace of marble, designed to supersede the present earthwork covering the basement story of the Capitol. The general plan of the grounds surrounding the Capitol has been made to harmonize with the contemplated improvement in the building when completed. The plan also makes allowance for the ultimate completion of the Capitol building itself according to Mr. Walter's designs, which provide for an advance of 30 feet in the central portico. A stairway of graceful design and imposing dimensions is, according to the plan, to take the place of the present shabby and mean-looking steps leading to the main western entrance.

The marble walls of the proposed terrace will vary in height at different points from 10 to 17 feet, as required to conform to the varying surface of the ground in which they rest.

Additional room to be provided.

While this plan is intended chiefly to enhance the architectural character of the building, the terrace will add largely to the basement room of the Capitol. The additional space thus to be gained will be 1,300 feet long by 60 feet wide, divided into rooms opening from a central corridor. Ten of these correspond in form and dimensions with the best of the present committee-rooms, each having two or three windows looking upon the existing courts in the same manner as those of the Architect's office in the basement. These courts are to be made attractive winter gardens. There will be, besides the rooms described, seventy-four rooms, varying from 20 to 44 feet in length and from 16 to 24 feet in breadth, most of which will resemble the present basement committee-rooms. These rooms, it is expected, will be used for the storage of coal, for the keeping of archives, for the temporary deposit of current documents, for extraordinary committee and clerks' rooms when needed, and for other purposes, for which additional room is demanded. The plan of this floor provides for a subway by which coal, ashes, and all goods not desirable to be passed through the upper entrances may be conveyed underground to or from a postern in the Government work-yard on South B street. It provides also for an enlargement of the present boiler-rooms.

The esplanade.

The plan provides that the esplanade or deck of the terrace shall be divided into two parts, the division running midway between the outer walls of the present building and the outer walls of the proposed new work. The inner one of these two parts is to be level with the foot of the several short flights of steps now opening from the porticoes; the outer one four feet lower. The two levels are to be connected by flights of steps opposite those from the porticoes. In line with the lower flights, and running parallel with the division between the two levels, there is to be a channel 8 feet wide, to be filled with soil and planted.

In looking toward the Capitol from the grounds this division of the terrace into two decks will not be apparent, but the eye will range over it, and the marble of the front of the terrace be thus massed with the marble of the main building just above the granite base course of the latter. Openings will be made through the outer wall of the terrace garden for lighting and ventilating the corridor below.

About $50,000 has been thus far expended on the work. The cost of completing it at the same rate will be about $700,000.

The work is carried on under the joint direction of Mr. Edward Clark, the Architect of the Capitol, and Mr. Frederick Law Olmsted, the landscape architect of the grounds.

The inception of the plan.

"Eight years ago," said Mr. Olmsted, when asked by a Star reporter for information regarding the inception of the plan, "I was asked by the Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to come to Washington and examine the Capitol grounds, which had just then been enlarged, with a view to a general scheme of improvement in adaptation to the enlarged Capitol. A great earthwork had been formed on three sides of the building from the material thrown out from its base, and this had been overlaid with turf, constituting a pedestal for the building, which I felt to be in various ways unsuitable. I concluded that no improvement of the Capitol grounds would be satisfactory while this great, incongruous earthwork interposed between it and the building. I therefore advised, as a preliminary step to a suitable design of the grounds, the adoption of an architectural terrace. This scheme was approved by Mr. Clark, the Architect of the Capitol; later by Mr. Walter, its original designer; then by the Joint Committee on Buildings and Grounds, and was finally adopted by Congress. The plan of the grounds since carried out is designed subordinately to it."

Why the turf terrace is objectionable.

"The more obvious objections to the present earthwork," explained Mr. Olmsted, "aside from its general inelegance, are: First, that it does not provide an adequately firm and stable footing for so ponderous a building when placed on a hillside—I mean that whatever the real security may be an adequate impression upon the mind in that respect is not made. The architectural terrace will produce an adequate impression, and the greater apparent firmness and more enduring strength of the building thus obtained will add greatly to its grandeur. Second, it is impossible in a climate like this, and under the local conditions of the Capitol, that turf shall be kept in nice or even decent condition when laid, as in this case, on steep formal slopes. If it can be kept tolerably green, as it never has been at the Capitol through any single summer, it will still be thin, weak, and shabby, a condition quite incongruous with the elegance of the superstructure.

"Finally, there is a common impression, now obtained by many in looking at the Capitol, which is expressed in the saying that it is 'squatty,' and that its dome appears of disproportionate height and weight. If you will look at this drawing, which shows the Capitol with the proposed terrace, you will see that the grounds of such an impression have been wholly removed.

"It was my expectation that the terrace would be built at once in advance of the improvement of the grounds. I have always regretted that it was not, because the design of the grounds is disconcerted by the presence of so conspicuous a feature, to which they are not at all fitted."

"Why was this not done?"

"Simply because there was a more pressing necessity for proceeding with the roads and other approaches to the Capitol, and Congress was not disposed to make sufficient appropriations for this work, and that which could be best done along with it and at the same time for the terrace."

Objections to the plan.

"What objections have been raised to the plan?"

"I know of but two; one, that the parapet would from certain points obstruct the view of the building. This had, however, been provided for, as I have already explained, by the division of the terrace, which allows the top of the parapet to come below the plane of vision. The other is not really an objection to the terrace, but to the lack of more direct approaches to the building. There are twenty-one streets leading up to the boundary of the Capitol grounds. If lines of direct passage were to be kept open between all of these, and also between each of them and each door of the Capitol, it would be in every respect better to simply pave the entire area, as Michael Angelo did that of the great open place before St. Peter's, and depend for scenery solely on architectural works, fountains, obelisks, and loggias. But that was not the intention of Congress. To have any suitable sylvan and verdant effect it was necessary to secure some spaces of undisturbed breadth of surface. These have been secured at the least possible expense of directness and amplitude of transcommunication. They are all too few and too limited. To split them further into fragments would be ruinous."

"Why is granite being used instead of marble on the face of wall between the upper and the lower terrace?"

"Because," said Mr. Olmsted, "marble would be unpleasantly glaring. It will not be seen in any general view of the building, and there is no reason why this relief should not be given to those walking on the terrace."

The removal of trees.

"I would like," said the reporter, "to know something about the removal of trees on the Capitol grounds?"

"I have been told," said Mr. Olmsted, smiling, "that an impression has become fixed in many minds that I have ruthlessly destroyed many fine old trees. Near the close of the last session of Congress a member who shared this impression held me up to public odium as a vandal on account of it. I have since received a note from him acknowledging that he had been misinformed as to the facts and expressing regret that he should have made the statement. Some years before I was called to look at the ground, the District board of works had lowered the grade of the street on the east of the Capitol so that it appeared a great unfinished canal, and to pass from it toward the Capitol it was necessary to climb a bank in some places eight feet high. In doing this work the best of the large trees of the Capitol grounds had been partially undermined. It was absolutely necessary that openings should be made toward the Capitol on the level of the street. The question is, was it worth while to attempt to design a plan by which these openings could be made, leaving ridges between them to sustain a part of the old trees? I was advised that Congress had assumed that it would not be worth while, and after a careful examination of the trees I fully concurred in this judgment. The trees had been grown under most unfavorable circumstances, had been much misused, and were all in a decaying condition—I mean the older and larger trees, the loss of which has been so much felt. They had but a few years of life left in them, and had been planted upon a plan adapted to a ground of half the extent and to a building of less than half the dimensions of the present. I was instructed to lay out the grounds with reference to permanent arrangements in connection with the larger building and upon the larger scale. Before doing so I had a thorough expert survey of the trees made, the condition and prospects of each being noted. Nearly all of the larger trees on the east ground were found to be in a decaying condition. Such as were not were marked to be left where they were if practicable, and where they could not be left to be transplanted. If I remember rightly there were a hundred and thirty of the latter class, averaging a foot in diameter."

"How many of them are now living?"

"More than nine-tenths, certainly. Not one died in consequence of its removal. Two or three have been badly injured by storms, others by gas leaks, but nearly all are now in a much more flourishing condition than before their removal."

"You have been speaking of the east ground only," said the reporter.

"True. On the west there were three avenues, like this. [Mr. Olmsted illustrated by drawing a rough diagram of the west ground as it originally appeared, with an avenue through the center in addition to the two now existing.] Upon each side of these avenues stood rows of trees, mostly old silver maples. These thin wedges of green between the avenues had no landscape value. The plan adopted at my suggestion threw out the center avenue, trees and all. Now there are two approaches from the west, one from Maryland avenue, and one from Pennsylvania avenue, with a simple, quiet, unbroken spread of turf between them. This, I think, has some value. The rows of old trees were left on the old avenues retained, but provision was made for the future by setting out rows of young trees outside of them and widening the walks. Several of the old trees still remain, and you can see what their condition is, and from it judge what the condition must have been of the trees that have been removed. Nearly every storm brings down some of their limbs."

A movement in which Washington leads the world.

Mr. Olmsted, in answer to the reporter's inquiries, expressed himself as much admiring the general appearance of Washington city in its later aspect. "The tendency of all flourishing cities now is," he observed, "to divide into more and more distinct districts of residence apart from districts of work and trade, and in these to spread out—to increase more rapidly in extent relatively to population than cities have done hitherto. It results that streets are made wider, building sites larger, and trees and gardens are multiplied. In this movement Washington is leading the world, and, in the main, leading it finely. More than any other of our cities it is acquiring distinctively American characteristics, as of a state of society that has escaped from the necessity of town walls and from the restraints of monopolizing landlords, that can afford to march on in open order, and to straggle a little into the woods and meadows.

"Progress in this rus-urban direction," continued Mr. Olmsted, "may be seen to have been very considerable during the last twenty years in nearly all the notable towns of Europe—Rome, Florence, Milan, Genoa, Paris, Brussels, Frankfort, London, and Liverpool, for example. In all of these the country is coming into the town and the town stretching out into the country; and if we look back a century or two it will appear probable that we are now in the middle of a movement, the final result of which will be that to live in the compact blocks hitherto characteristic of towns will be thought a great hardship, if not positively barbarous. In time the beauty of towns will be found to lie largely in a form of scenery, of which the interest will consist, not in what we now call their decorations, but in the grouping of stately bodies of foliage with architectural masses.

Hints about trees and shrubbery.

"You ask if I have no criticisms to make upon what has been done," he continued. "From my professional point of view there are two defects that may be worth noticing. I am afraid that the street trees have not yet been given sufficient spaces of soil, and that unless these are soon enlarged their growth will be checked and they will become weakly and stunted as their roots attempt to push beyond the pits in which they are planted. On account of the health of the trees, also, the fashion of substituting concrete or asphalt for brick as a surface for the sidewalks is to be regretted. The other defect to which I refer grows out of an excessive use of herbaceous decorations on the street fronts of private houses. These are to be seen in perfection only for a short period, and during those parts of the year when the city is most occupied and visited the ground given to them is apt to appear positively forlorn. Another thing: it is difficult to keep deep grass slopes in nice order in this climate—impossible, I may say, except by a large annual bill of expense. Slopes formed upon long, graceful lines instead of being made formal, stiff, abrupt, and angular, as seems to be the fashion for the time, will be much nicer. There is room for a great improvement in this way, and also in a more general use of evergreen shrubbery and vines. In the selection of planting material for private places along the streets it is very desirable that plants should be selected that appear to advantage early in the spring and late in the fall, if not during the entire winter. The contrasts to be now observed in this respect as one drives through the streets are instructive."

Mr. INGALLS. It is rather a novel method of conveying information on a matter that involves the expenditure of a million dollars to have an "interview" published in the newspapers printed in the RECORD the day after the bill is to be voted upon.

I am free to say that the progress of the work so far does not I think justify any very sanguine expectations as to the great results that are predicted by the Senator from Vermont. As I understand him, there are to be ten additional committee-rooms provided. I can not understand how they can be provided except in some subterranean portion of the structure, so that they will be practically a part of the cellar of the edifice, rather than rooms that are calculated for human habitation.

In this connection I may say also that, without any pretense to architectural knowledge, without having had my intelligence trained by the contemplation of the great marvels of antiquity or of other lands than our own, I am not able to see that anything has been specifically accomplished in the work which has been hitherto done. The approach on the north side of the Capitol seems to be more in the nature of an excavation or a canal than an appropriate and dignified approach to a majestic structure like this; and the pavement has been so arranged that with every waterfall the entire surface is covered with a rippling stream that renders the whole space practially inundated, and it appears to me will result in serious injury to the remainder of the building unless other arrangements have been made for drainage than now appear.

Beyond that, the material that has been employed for the pavement seems to be insufficient. It is already in many places cracked; it has yielded to the elements or else has been insufficiently laid, and I observe also that the joints in that portion of the terrace that is constructed of Scottish granite, I believe, have already begun to separate and part, admitting the approach of water and the introduction of frost; so that unless something is to be done that differs from what has already been accomplished, I confess I should like to be further informed than I am at present upon a subject so important as this.

In this connection while we are speaking about the architecture of the Capitol and the various improvements that may be made, I want to suggest to the Senator from Vermont whether it would not be appropriate to make some provision at this time for the removal of that most incongruous group of statuary which now stands at the entrance of the grounds on Pennsylvania avenue. Sorrow, Mr. President, is usually secluded; men do not go into the market-place to weep for departed friends or in consequence of bereavement; and nations never mourn. So far as that group of statuary is concerned, it seems to me that it should be removed at once to some adjacent cemetery. It would be entirely appropriate upon some grassy plain by a still sheet of water and surrounded by weeping willows and other foliage that indicates the grief and melancholy of nature; but placed at the very entrance to the grounds of the Capitol, surrounded by fifteen-cent lodging houses and beer shops, and amid the continuous din and uproar of street-cars and herdics and vehicles going to and fro, with its snowy surface covered continuously with the feculent dust of the highways, I confess that it never has ceased to offend my sense of the appropriate and the decorous since it was first erected.

I do not know who has charge of these matters, but inasmuch as this bill for the continuation of the architectural decoration of the Capitol and its completion emanates from the committee of which the Senator from Vermont is the chairman, I would suggest that he take this subject also into consideration. I hope before we are called upon to act on this measure we shall have at least the information of which the Senator from Vermont is possessed.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I suppose we are all thankful that we have given the opportunity to the Senator from Kansas to distinguish himself as he always can in attacking any measure that comes before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will allow the Chair to interpose. It is the duty of the Chair to remind him that under the rule he can speak but once. The Chair will regard it as the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator proceed. ["Go on."]

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose that the chief amount of necessary information is possessed by every other Senator if not by the Senator from Kansas. I do not desire to defend in connection with this subject the statuary that is at the foot of the Capitol. Perhaps the location is as obnoxious to my sense of good taste as it is to that of the Senator from Kansas, although each figure by itself may be, and I think is, a fine work of art.

Mr. INGALLS. How did it get there? Who put it there?

Mr. MORRILL. Neither do I intend to defend the defective concrete pavement that is on the east side of the Capitol. That has turned out as a good deal of concrete pavement throughout the city heretofore has; but since that was put down I think they have ascertained how and where to obtain a much better article of concrete pavement.

This is entirely an independent matter from either the concrete pavement or the statuary at the foot of the Capitol. The document to which I have referred as Executive Document No. 9 explains fully the expense and the plan. I have stated the general results that will be effected. It will be admitted, I think, by all that this plan is the only one that has ever been suggested which has met with almost universal acceptance and exempt from any intelligent criticism; that is to say, it will give the Capitol the appearance of greater strength, of massiveness, of standing upon a firm foundation, and will be something equal to the size and weight of the dome that is now upon the Capitol. The general elevations are confessedly now too thin, too flat. When this is done there will be an evidence of strength, of solidity, that will be obvious to all.

Mr. President, I do not like to have this bill go over upon the criticism of the Senator from Kansas. I hope that every other Senator will be prepared to vote for this bill now, in order that it may go to the House of Representatives and be acted upon at the present session. I can say that it met with the unanimous approval of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, of which I am not the chairman, and I hope it will meet with the general approval of the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Vermont, before taking his seat, allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. As to the group which so offends the taste of the Senator from Kansas, and likewise my own, I would like to know of the Senator from Vermont whether he would accept as an amendment to this bill for the further improvement of the west front of the Capitol an amendment providing for the removal of the funeral furniture off Pennsylvania avenue to, say, the Soldiers' Home, out by the cemetery? I think that would go very far to reconcile not only the Senator from Kansas but some of the rest of us to vote for the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say to the Senator from Indiana that I will not accept it as an amendment to this bill, because it is wholly outside of and irrelevant to it, but I will pledge him that I will vote for a proposition to properly remove it, where it will be more appropriate, at any time that a bill may be presented for that purpose.

Mr. VOORHEES. I thought it would be entirely in order on this bill to benefit the western view of the Capitol.

Mr. MORRILL. That is outside of the Capitol grounds.

Mr. COCKRELL. How did it get there?

Mr. MORRILL. It got here under the solicitation of the officers and Admiral of the Navy, and before the monument arrived here. I would say that so far as that monument is concerned, if it should be replaced, as I said to the Senator from Kansas this morning, with a large representation in bronze or marble of a buffalo lassoed upon the plains or pursued by dogs, I would much prefer it. [Laughter.]

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $50,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

UTE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 241) to repeal section 8 of an act entitled "An act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same," approved June 15, 1880.

Mr. ALLISON. Let section 8 of the act of 1880 be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). The section referred to will be read. Will the Senator furnish the act?

Mr. ALLISON. The bill proposes to repeal a section of a statute. I should like to have the section read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the hot springs located in what is known as "The Uncompahgre Park," in the Uncompahgre Valley, and four square miles of land surrounding said springs and within said valley, are hereby reserved, and withdrawn from settlement, occupancy, or sale, under the laws of the United States, and dedicated and set apart for the benefit and enjoyment of the people; and, so far as practicable, the provisions of sections 2474 and 2475 of the Revised Statutes are hereby made applicable to said tract.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know why that is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a report in the case.

Mr. COCKRELL. The report does not explain anything. I have just read it.

Mr. HILL. There has been a report at a previous session which explained a similar bill, but the report made in connection with this bill does not go into explanations.

This reservation of the spring and four square miles was made in the act of 1880, but it is a fact well known for a long time that the spring has no value whatever. The spring has never been used. The waters have no valuable properties of any kind. It is found that some settlers are there who settled on the lands and improved them before the reservation was made, and their rights are interfered with. As the spring is of no value, it seems that there can be no objection to repealing the clause making the reservation.

Mr. INGALLS. What is to be done with the land? I did not understand the Senator from Colorado in that report.

Mr. HILL. The land becomes public land of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill does not say that.

Mr. HILL. It was reserved from the public lands, and this bill repeals the act making the reservation.

Mr. INGALLS. Unless there is some declaration to that effect it does not become public land, for it was in no sense a portion of the public domain, and therefore the public-land laws would not apply.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Kansas explain to me why it was not a portion of the public lands?

Mr. INGALLS. It was an Indian reservation.

Mr. HILL. It was not a portion of the reservation.

Mr. INGALLS. That has been discussed a good many times. Why was it not part of the reservation?

Mr. HILL. At the time the act of 1880 was passed it was not a portion of the reservation.

Mr. DAWES. I see that this bill was referred to the Committee on Public Lands. There was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs at this session a bill to correct some mistakes in the original act of 1880, and the Committee on Indian Affairs had the matter under consideration and reported the bill unanimously. I do not know why their attention was not called to this matter, or why this bill took a different course. It has reference to the same act to accept and ratify the agreement made with the confederated bands of Ute Indians.

Of course there was nothing wrong about it; but the Committee on Indian Affairs are entirely ignorant of the necessity of correcting the act of 1880 in this particular, although they were required by the Senate to reform that act and to remove some of the Indians from the place located by the act to another reservation in a distant Territory. It was found that that act required quite a band of these Indians to be located where there was no land, to be located nowhere, and they were obliged to be transferred to some other reservation.

As I said, I do not know that there was anything wrong in this, only it escaped the attention of the Indian Committee in this respect and for this reason.

Mr. HILL. I may be allowed to say a word in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts. The bill to which he refers relating to the removal of the Southern Ute Indians has nothing whatever to do with the portion of the reservation in the neighborhood of this spring. It is a different portion entirely. The spring was upon the public lands near the border of the reservation which was occupied by the Uncompahgre Indians.

Mr. DAWES. I have no knowledge of the desirability of preserving this little tract as a park. When the original act was before the Senate it was represented by those advocating it that here was a valuable spot, like the Hot Springs in Arkansas, that should be reserved, in the language of this section, for the use of the whole people of the United States. Of course the Senator has information about it that I have not. If it is of no more value than any other part of the public domain, I do not see why it should not be opened; but it has been my experience in the last twenty-five years that the more valuable as a public reservation one of these spots is, the more anxious the people are to have it opened as public domain, and as the value increases so increases the intensity of the desire to have it opened. I have but to allude to the new zeal that has sprung up in certain quarters to have the National Park appropriated to private use. There seems to be an almost irresistible zeal just at this moment to appropriate that whole National Park to private use.

I do not make these remarks intimating that the Senator has any such motive or that those who propose this bill have, but to suggest to the Senator that possibly there may be behind this a praiseworthy desire of profiting by getting possession of valuable real estate.

Mr. HILL. There were some bona fide settlers upon this land before the passage of the act of 1880. They are simply farmers living there and cultivating the soil in good faith. There are no speculators, speculators that I know of, concerned in this question.

Mr. DAWES. How could they be there if the land belonged to the Ute Nation?

Mr. HILL. They were not on the Ute reservation. It may have been thought by the Indians that the hot spring was on the reservation, but after making survey of the lines it was found not to be on the Ute reservation.

Mr. DAWES. Of course I do not antagonize the Senator.

Mr. HILL. From my own personal knowledge I can say that the spring is valueless, and is so regarded throughout that portion of the State. There is no reason why it should be reserved.

Mr. ALLISON. This was a subject of rather severe controversy a few years ago, and at that time I had occasion to make some examination in regard to it. An agent of the Indian Department reported to us that there was value in these springs. Of course I would not undertake to say, in the face of what the Senator from Colorado now says, that there is any special value in these springs, but there is one thing very certain, that the Indians believed that these springs were upon their reservation; they acted upon that idea; and that was one of the principal difficulties which originated the trouble in this region with the Uncompahgre Utes, that certain settlers or people went in there and took the valuable agricultural lands in this valley for agricultural purposes, and the Indians complained about it, and said the ground was on their reservation. Now, it may be that on some close and careful survey of that reservation and by some construction it may be shown to be outside of the reservation, but it was understood at the time by all the Indians that this was a part of their reservation. These people, in the face of that complaint and in the face of that claim on the part of the Indians, went in there and occupied these valuable lands.

I undertake to say that if this bill is passed the Government of the United States will not receive one dollar from these lands, and it is not expected that the Government will receive any sum for these lands. These settlers, as they are called, these people who went there in violation of law and without authority of law, are coming now after the lapse of three or four years to ask us to allow them to take these lands as though they were original homestead settlers under the authority of the United States. These lands are valuable; they are worth to-day from $50 to $100 per acre. I do not believe that it is fair and just on the part of the Government of the United States, after having expended all the money we have expended in regard to these Indians, to allow these settlers to take these lands at a nominal price.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to inform the Senator that he has already spoken on this bill; but it will be understood to be the unanimous consent of the Senate that he may proceed, unless objection is made.

Mr. HILL. If there is no objection I should like to say a word. The question as to whether these lands were originally Indian lands or not it seems to me is of no importance now. The Indians ceded the lands to the United States; they parted with all the right and title they had in them. I can not see, therefore, that it makes any difference to-day whether this spring was on the Indian reservation or not.

As to these people getting title to the lands for nothing, I do not know under what conditions the Senator from Iowa supposes they can obtain titles without paying the Government.

Mr. ALLISON. What does the Senator expect will be paid for these lands?

Mr. HILL. The abandonment of this reservation does not give these parties any rights which they would not have under the general laws relating to the disposal of the public lands.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that perfectly, but it was the fact that these people came in and took these valuable lands when they had no right to them, and now under that original claim they ask the Government to let them have the lands at a dollar and a quarter an acre or as homesteads, or whatever the law may be in reference to them.

Mr. HILL. They must take them on the same terms as they would take any other public lands.

Mr. ALLISON. But they have no right to so take them, having originally taken them wrongfully. That is my objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the land worth?

Mr. HILL. I do not know; I can not say what the land is worth; I have no means of knowing. They are like any other farm lands in the mountain valleys, but whatever they may be worth, the title to them must be acquired in the same manner as to any other lands.

Mr. COCKRELL. How far is it from any town or city?

Mr. HILL. Nine or ten miles from the town of Ouray, the nearest village of any importance.

Mr. COCKRELL. Is the country thickly settled around it or simply grazing land?

Mr. HILL. That portion of the valley is settled with farmers. The whole valley nearly is settled now with farmers owning their tracts, of generally one hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. COCKRELL. It makes a great deal of difference whether the Government has reserved that land and held it until it is valuable, or whether it is part of the ordinary public domain, which any one can take and very few want to take.

Mr. HILL. These people were on the land long before the reservation was made.

Mr. COCKRELL. Before the Indian reservation was made?

Mr. HILL. Not before the Indian reservation was made; but, as I have said, this is not upon the Indian reservation. If it was, the settlers had no right whatever to be there; they were encroaching on the rights of the Indians; but they were allowed to remain there and they are there now, and I do not see that any injustice can be done to anybody by making these lands public lands of the United States subject to entry on the same conditions as any other public lands. The bill gives these people no peculiar rights or privileges, as I understand.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, this is an old controversy, and one with which I am very familiar. The whole subject has been on more than one occasion before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and I am at a loss to know by what precedent or authority the bill could have been referred to the Committee on Public Lands at this session of the Senate. The Committee on Indian Affairs had ample advice about this whole subject. They have been long familiar with the efforts of squatters and unauthorized persons to obtain possession of this exceedingly valuable piece of property. When the Senator says that it was never included in the Indian reservation, he forgets the controversy which arose in consequence of the effort by a juggling survey to change the line so that it was thrown out of the Indian reservation. That matter was before the Committee on Indian Affairs at least two sessions ago, and it was the unanimous conclusion of the committee at that time that this land belonged to the Indian reservation and that there was an attempt to deprive the Indians of it by a fabricated survey by surveyors who were in collusion with the parties who were endeavoring to appropriate the territory.

Mr. HILL. May I interrupt the Senator to ask a question?

Mr. INGALLS. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Did not the Committee on Indian Affairs at that time report favorably upon this bill?

Mr. INGALLS. Upon the bill for the perfection of the agreement made between the Government and the Ute Indians we did; but so far as this particular tract is concerned it has always been in controversy, and there never has been a doubt in my mind nor in the mind of any person who has taken the trouble to examine it that there has been a deliberate and studied and pertinacious and persistent effort to obtain possession of this territory in violation of the rights both of the Indians and of the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, this tract of land embraces four square leagues adjacent to the hot springs that lie near the town of Ouray. It is an important mining center in what is known as the Uncompahgre region, and long before the agreement was made by which the Indians agreed to release their right to this territory men had gone in there in violation of law and squatted upon the territory and made their farms and their gardens. It is practically absolutely indispensable, as I understand, to the support and maintenance and welfare of the mining population about Ouray. It comprises practically all the arable land there is in that valley which can be used for the purposes that I have mentioned, and this bill simply proposes to repeal the act, which was in itself a compromise, by which this land was segregated from the remainder of the reservation and the public domain for the purposes of a public park, and that provision of Congress has been nullified, because instead of being used as a public park it has, in fact, been cultivated, occupied by farmers and by gardeners and others as a source of profit in the raising of grain and vegetables for the purpose of supplying the miners of that locality.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have an amendment to offer. I have submitted it, and it has been printed. Let it be read.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to offer an amendment to the text of the bill, if the Senator from Missouri contemplates offering a substitute.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I want to offer an additional section.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to give notice of my motion, which is to strike out, in section 2, after the word "courts," in line 35, the word "which" and what follows in lines 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, and 42 to the semicolon. I should like to have it reported by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas offers an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not understand this. The Senator from Missouri has an amendment first which is intended to be offered.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yielded to the Senator from Kansas to let him offer his amendment now.

Mr. BAYARD. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Beginning in line 35, section 2, it is proposed to strike out—

Which Supreme Court shall retry the cause, as well the issues or questions of fact as of law, and may hear testimony in addition to that given in the court below, and may amend the record of the proceedings below as truth and justice may require; in which Supreme Court of the United States every question shall be open, and its decision shall be final and conclusive.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I do not recall any important measure that has been before the Senate in the last ten years during the period of my service here about which there has been so much said and so little known. We are absolutely without information as to what this bill is to accomplish or the necessity for the very extraordinary provisions that it contains.

This provision which I propose to strike out I believe is an anomaly in legislation. I do not think there can be found in the statute-books of the United States, from the inauguration of this Government down to the present time, a provision that the Supreme Court of the United States shall retry causes that are taken before it on appeal, questions of fact as well as of law; hear testimony in addition to what is given in the court below, and amend the proceedings below as truth and justice may require; giving them absolutely the authority to try these cases on appeal de novo, to hear oral testimony, and to amend the record as they see fit. I should be glad to hear from the Senator from Delaware some reason for this most extraordinary and anomalous provision.

In 1854, thirty years ago, by a statute that remains unrepealed, the surveyors-general of the United States for these districts were required to ascertain and report a full statement of all the grants that existed under and by virtue of the treaty with Mexico, and submit the report to the Congress of the United States for such action as it might deem proper to take; and why it is that after this long interval of time we are without information as to what action has been taken, what interests there are to be affected, how much property is involved, I know not. At the same time, without telling us whether there is one acre that will be affected by the provisions of this bill or twenty million acres, we are asked without instruction to agree to these extraordinary provisions and in effect nullify all that has been done by the court below by declaring that the Supreme Court of the United States shall act de novo in all these cases.

I have listened to this debate, which has now been proceeding for a week or ten days, with the vain expectation that at some time in its progress we should be advised of the reasons and the necessity for the adoption of this legislation; and I venture to express the hope that the Senator himself having charge of the bill will see the absolute impropriety of making such an innovation as this upon the long-established practice of the Supreme Court without some further explanation than we now have.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the length of the debate on this bill has undoubtedly been wearying to the patience of that little handful of the members of the body who have given it much attention. I know no member of the Senate who gives more careful, assiduous, and intelligent attention to the business of this body than the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], and therefore it is that I am surprised to learn now that, although this very question to which he now refers was raised by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND] yesterday, as will be found on page 979 of the RECORD now lying on his table, the Senator from Kansas was not aware that such a question had been raised, and that an answer after one fashion or another had been made to it by me.

Mr. INGALLS. Not upon a motion to amend, I think.

Mr. BAYARD. Not upon a motion to amend, but precisely the question of inquiry as to the wisdom and expediency of the very provision which the Senator from Kansas now proposes to eliminate from the bill. I think it was suggested by the Senator from Arkansas that the provision was unusual and not according to his judgment; but after the statement which I then submitted to the Senate he concluded that it was better to allow it to remain in.

But, Mr. President, it is my duty to repeat in response to the question of the Senator from Kansas, and in opposition to the amendment which he now has offered, some of the reasons which I gave yesterday. That the Supreme Court sitting in cases in admiralty has always had this power, and frequently exercised it, is a fact which of course the Senator from Kansas is as well aware of as I am.

Mr. INGALLS. These proceedings are not in admiralty.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not say they were; I merely say that the Supreme Court has in proceedings in admiralty exercised the very right and power given in the present bill in cases relating to these land claims. This very objection was urged to the bill in debate in 1881, at the time the bill received the approval of the Senate. Judge Davis, of Illinois, who had been for so long a time a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, met the objection by saying shortly that this practice had obtained and been frequently permitted in the Supreme Court. That was his answer, as will be found upon reference to the debates of that period; but I will say something more.

The experience of the last thirty years has shown that the statute of 1854, authorizing the examination by the surveyor-general upon this class of claims and their report to Congress for such action as Congress might see fit to take, has proved an absolute failure, and I will read again, as probably it may shorten this discussion, from the preliminary report of the general land commission. In speaking of the act of July, 1854, the land commission say:

> The law was singularly defective in machinery for its administration, and it imposed no limitation of time in the presentation of claims and no penalty for failure to present. Its operation has been a failure, amounting to a denial of justice both to claimants and to the United States. After the lapse of nearly thirty years, more than one thousand claims have been filed with the surveyor-general, of which less than one hundred and fifty have been reported to Congress, and of the number reported Congress has finally acted upon only seventy-one.

That is to say, favorably and unfavorably. If this was the working of this law for thirty years, it is obvious that some new legal machinery must be found to perfect the obligations of the Government of the United States under these two Mexican treaties. The substantial answer is the necessity of this right to the Supreme Court of the United States, at any moment prior to the finality of proceedings, to take new testimony and to retry the case where they shall believe that justice and right demand such action on their part. The remoteness of this Territory, its scanty population, the semi-barbarism of the people who have inhabited it, the utter irregularity in anything like registration of title or record evidence, the mingling of priesthood and law which has brought about misgovernment in this world wherever the two have met, have created such facility for the perpetration of frauds in the way of coining testimony, in the way of suppressing testimony, in the way of forging testimony in all of its forms, that it has been found necessary to meet them by the most careful examination. Such has been the experience of these thirty years; and the reason why Congress has acted only upon seventy-one out of one hundred and fifty cases has been that over and over again when they had confirmed these grants they have found that they had been hoodwinked by the ex parte presentation of cases involving the most enormous quantities of land. Do we not see to-day millionaires created out of men whom we knew a few years ago were bankrupts, and who by one means or another under the action of Congress have possessed themselves of enormous tracts of land in these Territories? We can read in to-day's papers of sales of the most magnificent ranches, of property that has been created out of this ill-considered, unstinted action of Congress in dealing with these lands.

Now it is proposed to create a tribunal that shall give to great and small in that locality the right to go into court to face their adversaries with for the first time the power and opportunity of cross-examination. They are to be confronted each by the rival claimant, the United States to be represented by its own law officer; appeals are to be taken from the findings of these courts below and appeals are facilitated step by step with the right to advance such questions in the hearing until they shall reach the Supreme Court of the United States.

If you ask why give that court under this law the unusual power—for it is unusual in ordinary civil cases—to retry the case and take new testimony, the answer is that some means must be given to keep pari passu with the frauds against the Government which may be committed just long enough for the perpetrator to be successful unless up to the very period of finality, before the final decision is given, the right exists to block the fraud and to expose it.

I said yesterday and I here repeat that a case that may be known to the Senator—I allude to it without desiring in the slightest degree to prejudice it, for it comes to a hearing upon its own merits hereafter—a case involving enormous values of a land and mineral character stood before the Supreme Court confirmed by the decree of the district court of one of the States; by collusion and fraud an appeal was taken, docketed, and dismissed in the Supreme Court. An affidavit was discovered in the record below and brought to the knowledge of the Supreme Court, and upon motion and argument duly had they recalled their mandate, they re-established their appeal, and they heard the case as though upon the appeal originally entered, and with what result? That with the power to detect this fraud and the power to exhibit this fraud they found reason to reverse that judgment and they prevented one of the grossest collusions between a district attorney of the United States and a claimant to obtain lands worth millions if not tens of millions in value, simply by the power to arrest it in considering this affidavit which came to the knowledge of the court just before the final decision was to be made in the case. I submit to the Senator that this provision is necessary in view of the temptation of the amount, the distance of the locality, the looseness of the whole social system in that part of the country, a system of registration of titles that scarcely rises to the dignity of being so named. Listen to what the commission say further on that subject. I read now from page 406 of part 1 of volume 25 of the executive documents of 1880–'81, and I will hand the Senator the book.

> With no statute of limitation as to the time of filing these claims, with paper titles of grant held by men and women, stored away in old boxes or carried about their persons, no one can form any estimate of the area yet claimed in New Mexico or Arizona. The surveyors-general and Commissioners of the General Land Office for years past have called upon Congress for the enactment of a statute of limitation as to the time of filing these private land claims. There may yet be 1,000 or 5,000. As time moves along the best evidence is fast passing away, which will necessitate more energy and expense on the part of the United States to head off the prospective modern manufacture of ancient muniments of title.

Then they proceed to give the history of these confirmations:

> June 30, 1880, there were sixty private land claims in Colorado and New Mexico pending in Congress for confirmation, embracing an area, so far as the same have been surveyed, of 4,294,672,473 acres. The largest contains 472,736.90 acres, and the smallest, 1,003.55 acres.

Now, I would submit to the Senator, knowing as I do his anxiety and care to effect justice and to protect the public interests here, whether he thinks it well to omit any precaution which experience has dictated in this precise class of cases to be especially necessary, and whether it is not better as it is not compulsory upon the Supreme Court to take new testimony but only where justice shall demand, or it shall seem to them to demand, that they are not to be cut off by saying the record is closed and they can not hear new facts and take new depositions respecting them. I submit to him—for I am sure he has the same object that I have and that is to deal practically and wisely and according to the Constitution with this question, every day growing in importance, every day forcing itself more and more upon us, a question that standing where it is now acts as a paralysis upon the development of this Territory—whether he will set his opinion in this case against that which is not mine alone, for I should have great hesitancy in expressing my own opinion in opposition to the Senator and I should claim certainly no undue weight on that side, but it is that of those who have repeatedly and carefully examined the matter, and it has the approval of this very commission, and of the experience not of anything I may say but that continued practice before the Private Land Claims Committee can give to any man, for it has been my fortune to be associated with the labors of that committee for a great many years of my service in this body. One case is good until another case is shown. Claimants come there and present their case ex parte and all is as fair as the day. Sometimes even before we can report, with a disposition to examine carefully and report favorably, another case is shown that blows the first case into thin air. There are cases of that kind now pending before that committee in which we are called upon to meet a set of facts asserted on one side, and wholly disputed and denied on the other where I may say it is scarcely within reason to suppose that the cases are ingeniously conducted on either side. You can prove anything by affidavits, and you can prove anything by affidavits and yet avoid the penalties of perjury. Every practicing lawyer knows that fact.

Now, here is it wise to take from the court of last resort the power to transfix a fraud which has turned up only since the case was appealed from the tribunal below by saying that they shall not hear the case anew and take such testimony as may be brought to their knowledge by the Government officials representing the United States?

Mr. President, it is not an impeachment of public duty, but it is simply the statement of a plain fact of common experience that private interests are protected and prosecuted and followed much more zealously than those of the public. A man in public life has the sense of public duty, and he will perform that frequently at the cost of great private displeasure; he will make many enemies and no friends; and therefore it is that it is so easy for a man vested with public discretion, whether it be a vote in the Senate or action as a prosecuting officer, to be facile and gentle and generous with the property of the public. Talk as we may please about it, public spirit is a very rare quality; and in this case where you have well-feed ingenuity on one side and strong private interests, where you have these great land companies who are gathering up an amount of territory that is unwholesome and dangerous in a republic, I say that every safeguard which can be given to the courts to allow them to come at the truth of the case ought to be given and ought to be imposed by law; and I shall be sorry if any of the provisions of this bill, which have been so carefully and for years past considered and studied by the committee having it in charge, shall be stripped from it by the Senate unless there shall be some overpowering and overruling consideration of public duty for doing so.

No objection whatever can be urged to the right of the Supreme Court to take testimony anew for the purpose of detecting and overthrowing fraud where the case discloses the necessity for it—no objection except that of the absence of that right in ordinary practice and some possible inconvenience. The machinery is there. In other forms of contestation this very practice is allowed. Although it is true that causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction form the only class of cases in which at present the practice exists—I am speaking now of cases of appellate jurisdiction, for in cases of original jurisdiction of course the Supreme Court hears the case as any other court of original jurisdiction and takes testimony in the usual form—yet if in a class of cases so important and widespread as those of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction the Supreme Court exercises this power, it is an answer to the question put, and shows why it would be most convenient and proper to extend it to the present case.

I submit to the Senator from Kansas, and I trust he will be impressed by the argument, that in this class of cases we must consider the practical experience of the Government in attempting to carry out its duties so that the citizens shall get their rights and at the same time the public domain shall be protected. Therefore it is that I hope this provision, which I say is not one lightly adopted, which is not in the bill now for the first time—as I have heretofore said, twice it has been before the Senate and twice has met with its approbation—will be retained. I hope the motion to strike it out will not be pressed by the Senator, for I think it might prevent that which has often occurred before, the means of detecting a fraud just in time to prevent its success.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware describes the clause I propose to strike from the bill as one which confides a discretionary power to the Supreme Court of the United States which it may or may not exercise as it may think best in each case that may come before it. If that is the judgment of the Senator from Delaware, his interpretation of the clause does not coincide with mine. Listen to the language:

Which Supreme Court shall retry the cause.

There is no confiding of discretion, it appears to me, in that language, nor is there any selection of the cases in which this power shall be exercised, but in every case that may come to the Supreme Court of the United States on appeal from a Territory or from a State the Supreme Court shall retry the cause, not hear it upon the appeal, but "shall retry the cause, as well the issues or questions of fact as of law." If the Senator from Delaware thinks that is the employment of language which intrusts the Supreme Court of the United States with the discretion to try or not try as they may please any case that may come before them, then his understanding of the English language is different from mine. And the last clause is as follows:

In which Supreme Court of the United States every question shall be open.

That means, if I understand the use of language, that no point shall be considered as settled, but that absolutely in every cause that may come up, no matter whether there is allegation of fraud or not, the case shall be retried as to both the issues or questions of law and of fact, and that every question, whether of law or of fact, shall be an open question. If it does not mean that, irrespective of the allegation of fraud, irrespective of the allegation of misconduct in the courts below, the Supreme Court of the United States is to sit de novo, then I can not comprehend the use of the English language.

Mr. President, there are few episodes in American history that are more interesting than the Spanish colonization of New Mexico, stimulated through centuries by the desire for the precious metals, extending northward from the city of Mexico beyond the city of Denver, finally retiring and leaving little to mark its progress except the strange nomenclature of the peaks, the passes, and the streams upon which they resided during their brief colonization. They left behind them a hybrid population that was once fitly described by John Randolph in language that I do not care now to repeat. It is a rainless region, devoid of verdure, where the native population before the occupation by Americans, under the recent stimulus given to civilization by our railroad enterprises, consisted of men without courage and of women without virtue. But I think the Senator from Delaware goes too far when he assumes that this entire system of land grants is based upon perjury, upon forgery, upon the fabrication of titles, upon the manufacture of evidence to such an extent that it is to be presumed that the courts of the locality are either in collusion with the men who are conspiring to defraud the Government or are incapable of detecting frauds that are being perpetrated in the conduct of these causes. It is assuming too much to say with regard to this great system of land grants, which has been conducted in California to a successful and satisfactory conclusion, which in Arizona has been reduced down so that there are but twenty cases remaining undetermined, and those now here for adjudication——

Mr. BAYARD. How many did the Senator say?

Mr. INGALLS. Twenty in Arizona.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator must have other information than mine.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator should not misunderstand me. I do not mean the entire number of cases remaining undetermined, but in the Territory of Arizona undetermined.

Mr. BAYARD. I have heard that question asked in committee for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of apparently intelligent men upon the subject, and I never heard any attempt to give a positive answer. It was a mere estimate; mere guesswork. There were fewer in Arizona than there were in New Mexico; Arizona was carved out of New Mexico; but the claims remaining for the two Territories are, as I said, somewhere between 1,000 and 5,000. How many of them there are in Arizona I do not know; we have never been able to get a very decided opinion even from very well-informed persons on that point.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand that in California, where many of this class of cases were originally found, the whole matter has been adjudicated satisfactorily.

Mr. BAYARD. This bill does not apply to California.

Mr. INGALLS. So I understand. It appears that in California, where there has been a greater stimulus to immigration, where there has been a more active controversy about the possession of lands than in almost any other portion of our continent, these cases have been adjudicated satisfactorily by the machinery already provided by law.

Mr. BAYARD. Let me say to the Senator that he is mistaken. They have been adjudicated, but no man can look back over the history of that California adjudication and not pray to save any other country from such a scheme.

Mr. INGALLS. Well, Mr. President, I am not willing to cast wholesale imputations upon the integrity or upon the honor or the intelligence or uprightness of the tribunals of my country. I say that the contests which have arisen under the Mexican land grants in California have been adjudicated by the machinery existing to the satisfaction of those who are most directly interested, so that there is, and for a long time has been, practical acquiescence in the adjustment; and it has so far proceeded in the Territory of Arizona that, as I am informed by those whom I believe to be possessed of the requisite intelligence to form an opinion, there are not to exceed twenty cases to-day, and in those the testimony has been presented, is agreed upon, and will be accepted by all parties as entirely satisfactory for a basis upon which to decide the claims.

Now, Mr. President, when we have

Thus far into the bowels of the land
* * * march'd on without impediment,

when the courts have acted, when vast tracts have been determined and the ownership agreed upon, I am unwilling to say that in those cases which remain we shall assume that there is such a basis and substratum of personal fraud, that forgery has been reduced to a fine art and false-witness one of the habitual practices of society, that we can not trust a Territorial court, nor the State courts, but must overturn and subvert the whole fabric of our jurisprudence, and declare that in these cases, and these alone in civil practice, the Supreme Court of the United States shall retry them upon every question both of law and fact, assuming as the basis for that declaration that the testimony is fraudulent, that the witnesses are perjured, and that the written testimony and documents are fabricated. I think that is going too far, and I believe that upon further suggestion the Senator from Delaware himself will see that his assumptions have been too broad, that they are, as Burke said, an indictment against an entire people that can not with justice be sustained.

I can see no reason why we can not trust the ordinary system of courts under the safeguards that we throw around them for the punishment of perjury and of forgery with the detection of these cases; and I hope that the Senate will not assume, by agreeing to a provision so extraordinary as this, that the Supreme Court is to take it for granted that everything that has been done has been in pursuance of the action of courts below that have been either in collusion with crime or have been too stupid to detect it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not want the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas to go unqualified, that there has been a sweeping charge against the judicial tribunals of the country by whom the California land cases have been settled. I said nothing of the kind; I intended to say nothing of the kind; but I did mean to say that, owing to the utterly loose and chaotic condition of Mexican law in those distant Territories at the time of their acquisition by the United States, all of those things that we consider safe, and regular, and usual were almost in every case wanting. To sustain that I will take the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, which I read to the Senate on the last day of January, in the case of Rodigues vs. The United States, and will read from the judgment of Mr. Justice Miller on this subject, complaining, as he says, that—

> No class of cases that come before this court are attended with so many and such perplexing difficulties as these locations by survey of confirmed Mexican grants in California.

Confirmed how? Confirmed by a commission, with an appeal to the district court. The court say that with such confirmation their hands are tied; they cannot retry the case however obvious it is to them that injustice has been done and that fraud has been successful. Said Judge Miller:

> The case before us is an example containing as many of the perplexities to which we have alluded as can well exist in one case. Its consideration requires an examination of three different claims which have, each independently of the other, been carried through the board of commissioners and courts and finally confirmed. (1 Wallace, page 589.)

It was for want of just such machinery as is suggested by this bill that such a condition of affairs could exist—three claims for the same land confirmed before the same courts, the same tribunals, and the Supreme Court unable to open the judgments to retry such a state of facts and law and to declare that which common sense and justice proclaims for itself, that there could be but one legitimate owner.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to call his attention to a suggestion that strikes me in this connection? I find that section 2 of the bill provides that these proceedings "shall be conducted as near as may be according to the rules of courts of equity." The part of the section which the Senator from Kansas moves to strike out it seems to me does not enlarge the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in hearing the case on appeal in equity, except as it allows them to receive new testimony. In all appeals in equity, as I understand, they practically retry the case upon the record evidence which was submitted below; so that the only change which is made by this provision is that they are allowed, as in admiralty and prize cases, to issue a commission and take new testimony. If these cases are to be treated as equity cases in the beginning and the appeals as appeals in equity, all that is said in the clause which the Senator from Kansas has moved to strike out would be true of the practice on an appeal in one of these cases, except the clause which allows them to receive new testimony.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think it is necessary for me to prolong this discussion. It is a matter for the Senate to consider. The question has been debated now more than once, and if Senators think that this safeguard against fraud in these cases is improper to be interposed, they will follow the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas. I can not but believe that this discussion must have affected the judgment of the Senator himself and would make him unwilling to weaken the force of a bill which so clearly has for its object the accomplishment of justice in a very difficult class of cases.

I hope the amendment will not be accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOWEN. I desire to offer an amendment which I submitted the other day and had printed. I presume that all pending amendments to the text of the bill are now disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Colorado is in the nature of a substitute. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Colorado that if there be other amendments to the text of the bill they would take precedence of his amendment. Are there other amendments to be proposed to the text of the bill?

Mr. COKE. I wish to offer an amendment. At the end of section 11 I move to add the following proviso:

> Provided, That minors, married women, and persons non compos mentis shall have one year after the removal of their respective disabilities in which to make their claims under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall not object to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there other amendments to the text of the bill?

Mr. McPHERSON. I wish to give notice that when the bill is reported to the Senate I shall again move my amendment to the seventh clause of the twelfth section of the bill, and I shall probably have other amendments to offer then.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer the following amendment as an additional section, to come in at the end of section 13, to be section 14 of the bill:

> That the Attorney-General of the United States, for the purpose of correcting the boundaries of any survey where said boundaries are incorrect, is hereby empowered to authorize the use of the name of the United States as plaintiff, and to order suits in all cases where he becomes satisfied that false and fraudulent surveys have been made, so as to embrace lands by said fraudulent surveys which do not fairly and honestly belong to the tract or tracts of land covered by the grant; and this rule shall apply to all grants where the tract has been enlarged by false and fraudulent surveys. And it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to order suits for the forfeiture of such grants or their correction, so as to make them embrace only the lands properly covered by said grants in all cases where the tracts of land covered by the grants have been enlarged by such fraudulent surveys.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. BAYARD. I think that the bill is already sufficiently guarded in that particular. We are now for the first time bringing these parties into court, where they are to have their testimony tested under the rules of cross-examination. I think that this or some such provision ought to be the general law; it ought not to be confined to these Territories, if it be right and proper (and no one can doubt it) that where false and fraudulent surveys have been made so as to embrace lands which do not fairly and honestly belong to the tracts of land confirmed it should be the duty of the Attorney-General to order suits for the forfeiture of such grants.

I say to my friend from Missouri that under our present laws, while forfeiture may not take place, a rectification of false surveys can take place. I see that already proceedings have been taken, I think in Colorado, by the Attorney-General or under his direction, to break down a system of inclosing the lands along the river fronts by the wire fences which are now so expeditiously erected. That is under existing law. The power I think would exist equally in regard to these cases. If this proposed section be right (and I do not say it is not in the abstract), it ought not to be confined to these Territories and States; it ought to be the general law of the United States.

I ask my friend whether he would not be content to submit his measure to the Committee on Public Lands, that they may report a bill not simply as affecting the Territories now under consideration, but affecting all the public lands of the United States where false and fraudulent extensions of lines have been made by claimants. I hope he will not press it on the present bill. The charge has been already made that this bill is multifarious. It certainly is meeting with a great deal of objection, which I do not deprecate in the slightest, for the bill is very important, but it is a bill not so readily understood, for it deals with a very complicated and intricate subject. I therefore shall regret to find any additional section added to it. The present proposition is one which seems to me to be fair and wholesome enough, but it ought to be a provision of general law applied to all the States and all the Territories where there is public land.

Mr. COCKRELL. This bill relates directly to the private land claims in the States and Territories named. Some of those claims have been confirmed, and after the confirmation there have been extensions of the surveys, in fraud of the rights of private citizens. My amendment simply authorizes those parties to test the validity of the grants that have already been made, some by Congress. It is just, it is right; the Senator sees and recognizes it; and I hope the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator from Missouri think his amendment as framed would cover the case of a grant confirmed by an act of Congress?

Mr. COCKRELL. As to the boundaries.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Senator whether the phraseology is broad enough.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think it is. I think it would cover those cases where there is a question as to boundary—not as to the validity of the grant, only the boundary, the extension of it.

Mr. HARRISON. I see no objection to the amendment. I think it is in the right direction. There have been complaints that some of the grants which have already been confirmed by Congress have been confirmed upon false testimony, and that the bounds of the grants as originally given by the Mexican authorities have been falsely enlarged. I think that the amendment is entirely in harmony with the provisions and the purposes of the bill, and that it should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. [Putting the question.] The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not clearly understand from the reading of the amendment precisely what the proposition of the Senator from Missouri is; as the yeas and nays are to be taken, I should like to have him state briefly what the object is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I like the principle of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. In the examination that I have had the opportunity of making of the land surveys and of the frauds that have arisen under those surveys I think there is great necessity for some such legislation; but it is entirely new. It is conferring a new jurisdiction upon the Federal courts. I am unable to say whether it is a jurisdiction at law or a jurisdiction in equity. The scheme as presented by the Senator's amendment is certainly a very perfect one. It needs elaboration, and it needs to be done with a great deal of care. Suppose you should file a bill in the name of the United States, or bring suit under the language of the amendment in the name of the United States for the purpose of rectifying the boundaries of a private land grant. You first find out the parties defendant. Who are they? The persons interested. I suppose your next inquiry would be whether there had been some false or fraudulent survey. The next inquiry is what would be a correct survey? And the next thing to be done would be an order of the court requiring a correct survey to be made.

There is no machinery in this amendment, neither is there any provided in the general law, so far as I am aware, which would enable any court of the United States to execute its decree in a proper manner. It seems to me that it would be a mistake to incorporate in a bill of this kind an entirely new juridical feature in our system, a new jurisdiction, a new method of procedure, an indefinite one, and one that I think is incapable of execution, unless, indeed, we should confer upon the courts the power to make such rules and regulations as would be necessary to enable a court to execute its decree after it had passed it.

Courts do not usually deal, in rem at least, with questions of boundary. They deal with questions of property and right between contestants, but in questions of boundary they do not deal in rem. I do not know of any court in the United States that has the power either through its equity side or its law side to direct the survey of a tract of land to be made for the purpose of rectifying the boundaries, unless there is some contestant and unless the decree of the court could confer the title upon some opposing party.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORGAN Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRISON. Would not a bill framed as suggested by the amendment of the Senator from Missouri necessarily involve a claim to a recovery by the United States, the plaintiff in the case, of any lands falsely included in the boundaries of any of these surveys? The suits ought not to be brought of course if the contest was between individuals; but if the lands which had been falsely included in the survey belong to the public domain of the United States, then it seems to me the court could decree that fact.

Mr. MORGAN. All the lands of the United States are separated by imaginary boundary lines; one proprietor is on one side of the line and another on the other. A tract of land is supposed to contain, or does contain according to a false survey, 3,000 acres. You cut it down to 2,000 acres. The other man's boundaries by law, after the manner in which we have disposed of the land to him, abut against the boundary which you have rectified. You have got to reach out then and see how much that other man is entitled to. In other words, if you went on the equity side you must have a bill of interpleader to establish the right, not only of the person interested in the particular reservation, but also the rights of all those who are upon contiguous land, so that the subject would spread itself out and would include a great deal more than is included in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. Hence I contend that this subject ought not to be put in this bill in this meager form, but it ought to be the subject of a separate bill carefully prepared with a view to arranging and settling the boundaries of all contiguous proprietors where the lines may be drawn in. Such a bill, of course, as was suggested by the Senator from Delaware, ought to extend throughout the whole public domain.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am astonished at the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, and now at that of the Senator from Alabama, who ought to know about public lands. There is no controversy about the subdivisions of a section or quarter section or anything of that kind. Here is a grant to a corporation thirty by forty miles square or five by ten miles square. There is an indefinite description running in a certain direction. The United States surveys do not run in that way at all. The boundaries have been made to lap over five or six miles on this side or the other side. The grantees claim that the boundary can be put there by the indefinite terms of description, the metes and bounds. Now, we want to test that question, because the United States owns whatever of the public land is not honestly and fairly included within the terms of the grant, and the bill will not apply to anything but private land grants. That is all there is about it. You can not make a bill that will apply to anything else; there is no other subject-matter for such a bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I suppose, though, there is such a thing, after all, as two private land grants abutting upon each other, and in a case of that kind the Government of the United States would not own the land, but the other party would own it, unless by some decree or in some way or other you had the power to adjust his rights in the same suit in which you cut down the first survey.

I do not pretend to know all about the public lands, and I think a man would claim very great wisdom if he assumed to understand all about the complicated system of public lands resulting from our very wild and vague legislation on that subject. But the Senator from Missouri evidently does not understand all about it either, because in respect to some of the Government surveys, as he calls them, there have been great frauds, and they have originated in this way: Men are permitted to run out beyond the boundary. The ordinary surveys run out upon townships and range lines, but after they have got a certain distance, a certain number of townships out into the wilderness, or wherever it may be, they stop and they survey the land off into sections and into other subdivisions, and in that way it is brought into the market. The lands are designated, they are paid for by private individuals who make private surveys subject only to the approval of the surveyor-general of the particular district in which they are made. Now, frauds have crept in; no, I do not say crept in; they have rushed in, they have come tumultuously in upon the public domain; and that is a subject which is giving at least to the Land Committee of this body a very great deal of concern as to how to correct those frauds and how to prevent them in the future. We can get a system, and I hope that the Senator from Missouri will introduce a system, by which we can reach this question in a proper sort of proceeding. It must be a peculiar one. It is bound to be statutory, and its definitions ought to be made very distinct, and the plan of it and all the means of its execution ought to be elaborated with a great deal of care. But the amendment does not do it. It simply hints at the subject. The amendment will only introduce into the bill a subject of difficulty and embarrassment to the courts. It does not clear up difficulties, it merely suggests them.

Mr. INGALLS. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri is not very critically drawn. It contains language that ought not to appear in a statute; it is vague and indefinite in many of its provisions. While it relates to a subject that merits consideration and that ought to be perhaps included in the bill by some provision, I do not think upon the casual inspection I have been able to give it that it would accomplish the result which he desires. The words "fairly and honestly," for instance, do not properly belong in legislation. If the land is included in the grant, it is included in it; it is not necessary to say "fairly and honestly" included in it.

Again, with regard to the authority conferred upon the Attorney-General, he is only empowered to act where he is satisfied that irregularities have existed. There ought to be some definition as to the allegations that should justify him in using the name of the United States. It ought not to depend upon such a vague and indefinite term as that he shall be satisfied that wrong has been done. Therefore, I shall not be able to vote for the amendment, although I think some legislation on the subject ought to be adopted.

There is another class of cases not mentioned in the amendment which require some consideration by the Senate. I have been through the country that is covered largely by these grants, as I suppose many members of the Senate have been. The streams are scanty; the mountains are either valuable for minerals or for the sparse timber that grows in those localities; the valleys are narrow, and the inhabitants depend for their agricultural subsistence upon irrigation. The banks of the little streams that flow down from the mountains are the chief habitation of the people who are not engaged in mining or in forestry. In violation of these grants, or supposing that they may have become extinct in consequence of the failure of their alleged owners to enforce them, people have gone in great numbers on this territory up and down the streams through the Rio Grande Valley and on its numerous tributaries, and there they have small holdings of cultivated real estate upon which they practice irrigation and from which they draw the scanty supplies necessary for their subsistence. There ought to be some legislation by which this class of proprietors shall be protected. If it appears that the alleged owners of those grants have slept for generations upon their rights, and, as in other cases, men have gone on in open, adverse, notorious possession to cultivate the lands, there ought to be some declaration that the owners of the grants should not be heard to say that these men had no claim.

I think the bill is faulty in not containing some provision to protect those proprietors, and I would suggest to the Senator from Missouri, while the principle that he desires to incorporate is just, that it is not broad enough; it ought not only to authorize the Attorney-General to institute proceedings to annul fraudulent surveys and boundaries that have been secured by fraud but it also ought to protect that class of small proprietors who have been in open, notorious, adverse possession for a generation and perhaps two.

Therefore, if he will receive a suggestion from me I would say it would be advisable to prepare an amendment that would cover both these cases. I think it could be done without much difficulty; but the amendment as at present prepared I think would not meet my approbation, and probably not his upon more minute inspection.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator suggest the idea of interposing the bar of time, of prescriptions against the Government?

Mr. INGALLS. I certainly would interpose the bar of prescription, the statute of repose, against any other citizen claiming against the Government. If the alleged owner, the alleged grantee, has slept for a generation upon his right, if he has neglected or omitted to enforce his claims, either by the courts of the country or by presenting them to Congress, to a satisfactory conclusion, I would say that he should not be allowed at any subsequent period to come in and oust those proprietors who have had this open and exclusive possession undisputed for such a long period of time.

Mr. BAYARD. Would not such possessory titles be respected and considered in courts of justice where possessory actions were brought for enforcement?

Mr. INGALLS. I think they should be, and I think there should be an express legislative recognition of the rights of this class of innocent, honest, and industrious people, who are too simple to take care of themselves. They constitute very largely the native or half-civilized population of New Mexico. They live in adobe houses, in huts, in shanties, in little pueblos up and down the valley of the Rio Grande and its tributaries. They are an upright, simple-minded, industrious population; they have no knowledge of law or of legislation, and we should be unjust to them if we passed a bill attempting to settle this great question without incorporating some provision to place them upon the same foundation as those who have claims under statutes and whose rights are always recognized.

Mr. BAYARD. We only propose now to settle the claims under the treaties with Mexico and to perform our treaty stipulations. I hope that we shall not be ingrafting some new code for private claims entirely outside of the stipulations of the treaties which, and which alone, this bill is proposing to carry into force.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I called the attention of the Senate to the class of persons in New Mexico to whom my colleague has referred, but I take issue with him in part in regard to their title. They are not, as a rule, trespassers upon any grant whatever. All any one has to do to be satisfied upon this point is to take the map of New Mexico and examine it. On the map of New Mexico is laid down every known grant, with its actual or assumed boundaries. There are thousands of people living in the Rio Grande Valley to-day who are there by reason of no written grant, but who are there by reason of a possession which was conferred upon them by the civil and military authorities at an early day, sometimes going back as far as two hundred years. They are just as much entitled to recognition under the law of Mexico and under the treaty whose provisions we are assuming to carry out as these people who hold a paper grant; and yet the fact that they are not covered by any grant is conclusively shown, as I have said, by an inspection of the map, wherein it will appear that the ground on which these people are situated is recorded as being public land of the United States, because the surveyor-general of New Mexico, under the instructions heretofore given to him, has only been required to recognize such grants as he found in the shape of the ordinary muniments of title given by the Government of Mexico.

I have here a letter which I received from a prominent citizen of Albuquerque, a Mexican, speaking of claimants of this kind and of the imposition and hardship and wrong which is being laid upon them. If there is a class of people who are entitled to our protection more than any other it is this class. I have no sympathy with men who have large grants; they can take care of themselves. The injustice comparatively that we do to them in compelling them to pay certain costs, &c., I am not concerned about; but this bill will undoubtedly result in wiping out and destroying quite a large land possession on the part of every single one of these small holders.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] said to me the other day (I quote him now because I have no doubt he is willing to be quoted) that he had been besought on behalf of the small grant-holders to do something to prevent the large grant-holders from absorbing them. They have asked us for bread, and this bill gives them a stone. It is as destructive of their rights to-day as though the Congress of the United States should provide that the Army of the United States should sweep down the valley of the Rio Grande and turn every single one of them into its channel.

This letter, addressed to me and dated the 31st day of January, reads as follows:

MY DEAR SIR: Will you be good enough to amend the Albuquerque grant bill so that the commissioner can quiet the title to the valley lands between the Albuquerque grant and the Isleta grant? This valley is all claimed by old Mexican rights, but the absence of title records has enabled pre-emption and homestead claimants to dispute possession with the Mexican owners, and much litigation has followed.

Very respectfully, yours,

FELIPE GARCIA.

I have here a letter written by a former citizen of Kansas, whom I know very well, a gentleman of the highest character, a prominent merchant in the city of Albuquerque, who was here himself the other day, and who told me there were at least 10,000 men, women, and children living in the valley of the Rio Grande upon holdings of this particular kind who would be afforded no remedy whatever under this bill, but would be actually destroyed in all their rights of property by its passage. In speaking generally of this class of cases he says, referring to the Edmunds bill, No. 19, now before the Senate:

Section 10 would seem to cover such cases, but it certainly does not. For instance, the lands in the valley of the Rio Grande when first settled were laid off in narrow strips from 20 to 100 varas or yards wide, running from the river to the highlands, so that the settlers could have access to the river for water, and to the mesa or highlands for grazing, &c. Now, if each one of these settlers or his legal representatives is compelled to fight his case all through the courts, to and through the Supreme Court of the United States, give bond for costs, pay half expense of survey, plats, &c., they might as well abandon their homes at once; for the great majority of them are very poor, not having the common necessaries of life. Is it not a fact that these poor people were compelled by force of arms to become citizens of the United States, and also that their personal and property rights were guaranteed them by treaty? Is it just that they should be put to so much trouble and expense to establish their rights to their homesteads? Hundreds of them only own from three-acre to five-acre lots, on which they live and have small vineyards, and could not raise $50 to save them from execution; and yet the Government proposes to put them to all this expense, and even sell them out if they do not pay for half the expense of survey, &c. The Government surveys and plats lands at its own expense for other settlers, and why not for these?

And so on at great length. But that is not all the hardship. These people have no grant in the sense in which the term "grant" is used in the bill. They have nothing which they can prove up as title. The surveys of the United States have been extended over their holdings. Some of their lands, I doubt not, have already been entered under the homestead and pre-emption laws of the United States. Those simple-minded, inoffensive, innocent people do not take note of the fact that to some man situated in some part of the quarter-section of which he occupies the other part the possession belongs. He does not actually infringe upon that possession.

So the rights of this great Government are growing up around them in adverse hands ready to be used some of these days, and to put them out entirely. This bill, as I said, does actually consummate that very act. There is no provision whereby these people can get into court if they had ever so much money. There is no provision whereby they could get any recognition or standing in court. They were the settlers and soldiers, who at an early day the Government of Mexico, for the purpose of protecting its garrisons, authorized the commanders of the presidios to put upon lands anywhere within four leagues of the posts, stationed as they were in a chain extending from above Santa Fé clear down the Rio Grande to below El Paso, and there they have lived, father and son and father and son, some of them for three hundred years, simple-minded, as I said, knowing nothing about legal proceedings, at the very best that can be said to be turned over to be a prey to the lawyers of New Mexico under this bill, and at the worst, which is the obvious case, to be turned out without any rights whatever. If a grant-holder, a man owning eleven leagues of land, is entitled to the sympathy and to all the time that has been spent by Congress upon this bill, what shall I say for these people who have no means to assert their rights, and who under this bill will have no rights?

I have on my table dispatches which were sent down to me from the Land Office as indicating the steps which are being taken to-day for the purpose of depriving these people of their possessions. Here is a dispatch of the 5th day of January. I asked the Commissioner of the General Land Office, I may say, to send to me anything that he had to indicate the controversy which is going on there and the protection which his office is yielding. He sent me down these dispatches. I may say, however, that among other things, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Interior under date of March 24, 1880, the land then under consideration is described as being township 9 north, range 2 east, and township 10 north of the same range. Here is the dispatch of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the register and receiver at Santa Fé, in New Mexico, some persons having applied to enter some of these lands. The dispatch is as follows:

Require applicants desiring to enter land in townships 9 and 10, 3 east, to submit proof positive that no part of the land is occupied or improved by other than themselves. Reject all other applications.

Why "reject all other applications?" Simply because the Commissioner of the General Land Office, realizing that those Mexicans are living there on what are known in his office and put down on the plats as public lands of the United States, knows that unless he does interpose the power of his office, simply leaving the question of its rightfulness to be determined hereafter, those lands will be taken away from the possession of those people. Here is a telegram that was sent:

Suspend plats of townships 9 north, ranges 2, 3, and 4 east, and townships 10 north, ranges 2, 3, and 4 east. No entries will be permitted by you in any of said townships. These lands are hereby withdrawn for the present.

Why? Simply because the Commissioner of the General Land Office has ascertained in his official capacity that these lands are occupied in the manner I have described, and he is not willing to become a party to the wrong of their dispossession. But that can not go on forever. Entries slip through, we know how sometimes. Some man obtains his receiver's receipt, and finally his patent; he makes no disturbance of the Mexican until after the muniments of his title are complete, and then he turns up the owner of the quarter-section of land which is otherwise in the possession also of twelve or fifteen or twenty or perhaps fifty families; and the inevitable result follows. Those people can not complain; they can not make themselves heard in the case; they can not make themselves heard on this floor; they are absolutely and unqualifiedly as helpless, and more so, than the inmates of Saint Elizabeth's overlooking this city. As I said, they are entitled to our utmost consideration. In the forefront of every single bill that we pass for the adjustment of titles in New Mexico there ought to go a provision which shall guarantee to every one the full extent of what he is possessed of before ever the question of what any man shall have who is entitled to eleven leagues or more shall be considered.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. With pleasure.

Mr. HARRISON. I have no interest in this bill except as I suppose it to tend in the direction of counteracting the schemes of land pirates to swell land grants beyond their proper proportion or to impose pretended grants upon the Government. I had supposed that it was in the direction and in the general interest of the class of persons in whose behalf the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] is speaking, and I want to make an inquiry of him. Take the case of any such person as he has described, who has settled and made his little home within the limits of one of these grants. Is there any power in Congress to pass a law which shall take away the title of the person who holds under the Mexican grant and confer it upon one of those settlers unless he has some grant from the holder of the claim itself?

Mr. PLUMB. I am not talking about that class of people; I am talking about the class of people who are not within the limits of any grant whatever, but who are there in their own right.

Mr. HARRISON. Then will the Senator allow me to ask him another question? What has this bill to do with that class of persons? It does not make their case any worse; it leaves them just where they are. If the Senator will propose legislation in the direction in which he is now talking I am sure we shall all concur with him; but this bill does not affect the case of anybody not within the limits of a Mexican grant. If he is there and does not hold under the grantee, I do not see how we can protect him.

Mr. PLUMB. It is the vice of this bill that scarcely any man can tell exactly what it does cover, as I think. I can not at least. The first section provides for the settlement of incomplete Mexican grants. Those people had a grant in one sense. They were put on there, large numbers of them, as I said, by the commanding officers of the various posts. The posts themselves have disappeared; the remnants of them appear up and down the banks of the Rio Grande; some of them still remain, but not as military fortifications of course; some of them have entirely disappeared. Those people were put into possession by just as good authority as though they had been put in possession by the alcalde under the direction of the governor; but with the disappearance of the posts of course has been the disappearance of the records, and those people can not prove the fact. Who is there who can prove anything but possession where the possession has existed for three hundred years, no matter by what title it might have been bestowed, if that is gone? Where is the witness to testify to the lost record? As the Senator from Delaware said a moment ago, there is no presumption against the Government on account of continued possession. The possession of any one against the Government does not ripen into title.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I will ask the Senator from Kansas if those small holdings are not fenced off?

Mr. PLUMB. Some of the subdivisions are fenced and some of them are not. These people have lived together, largely related I have no doubt, and so the question as to whether there was a fence between their holdings or not was of no consequence. The outlines, the boundaries, of their possessions are known to themselves; they run in irregular directions; they do not correspond in any respect probably with the surveys of the United States, and no survey made under our plans would do them any good whatever. They must have the careful and skillful attention of some one specially directed to the segregation of their lands from the public domain.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Does the Senator say that they have no records of their possessions?

Mr. PLUMB. There is no record of the possession and probably never was. There probably was at some time a record of the fact that certain persons were put in possession of certain lands, but in the mean time those persons have disappeared, their immediate descendants have disappeared, and so on until the time covered by three or four or five generations of people has elapsed, and along with the general decay has been the disappearance of the evidence of their title except so far as the land is found in their possession.

Chapter 34 of the statutes of 1875 contains a recognition by Congress of precisely a similar class of people who are to be found in the Territory of Arizona, which we acquired by the same treaty. It is entitled "An act to grant title to certain lands in the Territory of Arizona," and reads as follows:

Whereas certain lands in Santa Cruz Valley, county of Pima, and Territory of Arizona, have for many years been occupied and possessed by persons of Mexican birth, who became citizens of the United States under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden treaty; and

Whereas the said persons desire to secure patents for said lands in the small and irregular tracts in which they were originally taken up under Mexican authority, and have been held and cultivated to the present time, and they can not do so under the existing land laws of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all the right and title of the United States to the land embraced in sections 2, 11, and 14, and the east half of sections 3, 10, and 15, of township 14 south, range 13 east, Gila and Salt River meridian, in the county of Pima, Territory of Arizona, be, and the same are hereby, relinquished and granted to the person or persons who have been in the actual bona fide occupancy or possession of said land, by themselves or their ancestors or grantors, for twenty years next preceding the date of the passage of this act, &c.

The register and receiver of the nearest land office were authorized, to carry out that act, to have the lands surveyed and to issue to those people such muniments of title as should answer their purposes and fix them in the possession thus recognized to be legal and proper under the treaties which it named, to wit, the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden treaty.

Now we are settling this question. We shall not settle it again. Whatever is passed now while this question is under consideration will be the end of the legislation we shall make for New Mexico. Every one knows how the disposition to legislate upon some particular question rises to a high tide, and how after it has gone the reaction comes and nothing more is done of that kind for years at all events. That country is settling up rapidly. Adventurers of every description are going into the Rio Grande Valley and all the valleys of that Territory, seeking where to get possession. A Mexican is nothing more to them than an Indian is to the ordinary frontiersman where his possession stands in the way of acquiring land. He finds one of these settlers there who has no paper title, and an American has a very high regard for a paper title and for a patent but for no other kind of a title. Gradually they will be crowded out. They will make no complaint; they probably will not even have societies formed anywhere on this continent to stimulate the conscience of Congress and to protest against the injustice we are doing them. But the inhumanity of it will be no less great. Those people are entitled to our consideration; they are entitled to justice. They will not get it in this bill, and when the bill is passed it will be the first step toward the forcible dispossession of every one of the rights which they and those before them have had back to a time before the eastern half of the American continent was settled at all.

Mr. BAYARD. Perhaps I ought to be sufficiently admonished by the remarks of my friend from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] not to undertake to discuss a question as to the public land laws of the United States, because there seems to be some necessary logic by which to prove that I should have little knowledge on the subject. Yet nevertheless I do propose to make some reply to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] in regard to his denunciation of this bill and its effect. Without presuming to put my individual opinion of the propriety or force of the bill against his, yet I will array against the Senator from Kansas the opinion of those best informed, according to my judgment, of the condition of the public lands of the United States and of the legislation necessary for them.

The present Commissioner of the General Land Office has carefully examined the measure now before the Senate, and I am given to understand that aided by his criticism it has been in a large degree prepared and meets his entire approval. The former Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. John A. Williamson, was the chairman of the land commission which made its preliminary report in 1880, and I find at page 41 of their report a strong approval given to the "bill introduced into the Senate during the present Congress by the Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS." That is the bill which we have now under consideration. I think there must be some strange misapprehension upon the part of these experts in the land laws of the United States and in the effects of this very bill when they are charging upon Congress the responsibility of some legislation that shall give to the smaller claimants the right to come into court and make good their claims—I say there must be strange blindness on their part when a measure that has so met their approval is met on the other hand by the denunciation of the Senator from Kansas. It was but the other day we heard his voice loud and eloquent here in defense of unmeasured land grants. He was not satisfied with giving eleven square leagues of land to any owner, but he proposed that the grant under the bill should be unlimited in extent.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President——

Mr. BAYARD. Am I not right?

Mr. PLUMB. No, sir; by no manner of means. I only said that was a question which the court should decide, and which Congress, in view of the doubt expressed about it, might well withhold its decision from.

Mr. BAYARD. When my friend from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] moved to strike out that limitation and debated his amendment, he was corrected and assisted by the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas. I do not think I can be wrong as to the first part of his argument that he did object to Congress placing this limitation of eleven square leagues upon the land to be decreed by the courts to whom the question is to be intrusted. But be that as it may, his arguments then, as far as I could understand them, were in favor of unlimited and great holdings. To-day he seems touched only with sympathy for those who are so poor that they can not enter the courts and pay the costs and take advantage of their rights before the laws of the land.

There is one thing and one thing only that the law of this country and its institutions can produce. It can not make men equal in power and it can not make men equal in fortune. It can give them an equality before the law, but it can not furnish them with the means to enforce that right if Providence should have denied them a larger scale. All we can do in any case and all that any man can ask in any case is the right to be heard before an unprejudiced court, and that is fully done in this bill.

I do not care to continue the debate. It is but repeating, as I think, the statements already made and generally made, I am sorry to say, when not more than a dozen members of the Senate see fit to give the bill any attention. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], who is familiar with these questions by reason of the locality of his home and the consideration to the public land laws which he necessarily would give in that new and vast State, has stated here as his judgment that the plan of this bill is the very best ever yet proposed to Congress. The Commissioners of the General Land Office, both the gentleman holding that office and those who preceded him, have likewise given it their approval. Therefore, I am content to set such judgments as theirs against the sweeping denunciation of my friend from Kansas. I have no idea that there is injustice in any way to the humblest and the poorest.

As to the question of titles long and peaceably held, let me read a few words from a decision of the Supreme Court long ago rendered as to the question of titles acquired from Spain in what is now the State of Florida, decided in the case of The United States vs. Wiggins, cited by my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL] yesterday:

> That the perfect titles made by Spain before the 24th of January, 1818, within the ceded territory are "intrinsically valid and exempt from the provisions of the eighth article is the established doctrine of this court, and that they need no sanction from the legislative or judicial departments of this country." (The United States vs. Wiggins, 14 Peters, page 351.)

Insert the word "Mexico" instead of "Spain," and the year "1848" or "1853" instead of "1818," and you have precisely the same doctrine: "The titles we are now considering in that Territory, which were intrinsically valid and exempt, * * * need no sanction from the legislative or judicial departments of this country." Nor are they affected by the present bill. As has been said too often to need repetition, it is not the class of cases in regard to which the Senator from Kansas has shown so much solicitude that this bill affects. They need no sanction from the legislative or judicial departments of this country; they are complete in themselves, and they are held entirely independent of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no special solicitude about the large grant-holders. Somebody before I came to the Senate did assist in making a great many improvident grants. Let every man defend himself on that matter as he sees fit. I have no defense to make. I have never voted for the confirmation of one of those grants, and as to the frauds which are being held up in terrorem in the Senate, under which millions of acres of land have been taken away from the public domain of the United States, none of those measures were enacted since I have been here, and I am free from all responsibility of that sort at least.

I myself believe that the law of Mexico does limit grants to eleven leagues, but I am not so confident in my own opinion, I am not so thoroughly grounded in that belief, that I am willing to take that opinion as against the opinion of others who are better informed than I am.

My argument in favor of the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey was simply and only that that was a judicial question, which ought to be decided by the courts and not by Congress, and I am not to be deterred from its advocacy by those who compose the Private Land Claims Committee of the Senate throwing in my face the charge that I am solicitous about the large grant-holders. If there be any men who have large holdings in New Mexico they do not have them by my vote; those laws were enacted by Congress before I ever had the privilege of voting upon that question here or elsewhere; and upon those who did that act must rest the responsibility of the great frauds which have resulted from that legislation.

If there is to be a recognition of the possession of these people, why is there not some provision in the bill which mentions them, which confirms their title? These people, as I said to-day, are not protected by the bill or by anything that can occur under it, but their only shelter is the practice of the General Land Office of the United States, which may change at any time.

I know that any amendment which could accomplish what I desire would be subject to criticism, but this subject has been before the Committee on Private Land Claims, and if they knew of the existence of this class of claims it seems to me singular that they did not introduce something for the benefit of those people into the provisions of the bill. But the bill has been brought in here and there has been an admonition substantially that we shall not amend it. It is not to be touched; and of course it comes under great authority, the leaders practically of both sides of the Chamber having united in its behalf, and the Senate, which heretofore could say with reference to the controversies between those two gentlemen that it could be happy with either one of them away, now feel doubly happy in the fact that they are united and that the Senate may follow after them. But I do not propose, in regard to a matter of which I have personal knowledge and of which any one ought to have knowledge who passes upon this bill under the responsibility of his oath as a Senator, to shirk in any way from that responsibility, or if occasion be to mollify in respect to that which I think ought to be done in order to protect substantially the only class of people who can appeal to us for any measure of sympathy or a measure practically of justice. The large grant-holders are in possession of their land; they practically do not need our help. So far as the grant-owners themselves are concerned they do not care whether the bill passes or not. When I consider the provisions of section 9 I have no hesitancy in risking whatever little reputation I have for prophecy in saying that the practice under the bill if it passes will justify my remark that the men who will get anything out of it will be the men who will get what does not belong to them, and that the men who are entitled to something under this Government will not get anything.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, the statements of the Senator from Delaware to the Senate, that this bill meets the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in my opinion must have been made unadvisedly. I read from a letter of the late Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. Williamson, a distinct statement, which is printed in the report of my remarks, embodying the objections of that office to sending these cases in the first instance to the courts, and earnestly recommending the passage of a bill providing for a commission to prepare the cases, and, if not then satisfactory, that their report might be sent to the courts. That is again indorsed no later than June last by the present Commissioner of the General Land Office, recommending the passage of a commission bill.

I did not rise so much to refer to that as to protect myself against the charge of having made a misstatement in the Senate. I desire to say that the substitute, which is now upon the table, presented by me for this bill was prepared in the Land Office, printed there, and brought to me by the Commissioner of the Land Office within the last few days, stated to be the opinion of the Interior Department, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, as a proper bill to be passed. I had the recommendation of that Department that a House bill, which is identical with the measure I have offered as a substitute, before the last Congress met the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and its passage was urged before the House.

I have stated these things and incorporated these statements and copies of parts of these communications in my remarks on this bill; and yet so utterly does the Senator from Delaware ignore a printed statement presented by me that he says this bill meets the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and this bill meets the approval of the Commissoner of the General Land Office, without a word from either of those officers to show any change of opinion from their opinions expressed at the last session of the last Congress, printed in the report of a committee of the other House; and without a word contradicting what I have said, except by innuendo, that the substitute which I have presented providing for a commission was prepared in the Interior Department, meeting the approval of both the Secretary and the Commissioner, this statement is made.

It is due to myself that I should call the attention of the Senate to it. It is due to the Secretary of the Interior and to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that I should, with some authority, deny that they approve this bill. There was printed with my remarks an extract from two points in the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in which in express terms he objects to the passage of this bill and gives good reasons for it, first and second, which were read here in the hearing of the Senate.

Now, sir, there is no power of authority and no weight of influence and no length of continuance in this body that will authorize any one by mere force of authority, without noticing or alluding to what is made public here from the printed documents and records of this Government, either to make such an assertion or to deny the truth of what I have stated. There I leave it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PLUMB. I move what I send to the desk of the Secretary as separate sections to be added to the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That all the right and title of the United States to the land in the Rio Grande Valley and elsewhere in the Territory of New Mexico occupied and possessed by persons who, or whose ancestors or grantors, became citizens of the United States by reason of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, be, and the same are hereby, relinquished and granted to the person or persons who have been in the actual bona fide occupancy or possession of said land, by themselves or their ancestors or grantors, for fifty years next preceding the date of the passage of this act; and it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of New Mexico to hear and determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the rights of the parties claiming under this act; and for that purpose the said surveyor-general shall have power to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony relative to such occupancy or possession: Provided, That no claim as aforesaid shall be of any validity under this act unless it shall have been duly filed with the said register and the said receiver within two years after the passage of this act: And provided further, That this grant shall not extend to any reservation of the United States, nor prejudice any valid adverse right or claim, if such exist, to said land, or any part thereof, nor preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof, and shall not extend to any tract of land exceeding eighty acres in quantity.

SEC.—. That whenever it shall have been determined by the said surveyor-general, or, on appeal, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or Secretary of the Interior, that any tract has been occupied as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general for said Territory to cause the said claims to be surveyed in accordance with the lines of such occupancy, and to furnish approved plats of the same, upon the receipt and approval of which said plats, and field-notes thereof, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, patents shall issue as in other cases.

SEC.—. That any part or parts of said designated lands that are not shown, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to have been so occupied for fifty years, shall be held by him as open to settlement under the provisions of the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, and patents may be issued therefor for any number of acres not exceeding one hundred and sixty that parties complying with said legal provisions may desire to hold: Provided, That all existing occupants that have settled on said lands within a period of less than thirty years shall have the prior right to acquire the same under the homestead laws of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, under the form of being an amendment that is really a substitute, not simply a different plan to effect the object of this bill, but to establish wholly a new system of land claim in these Territories. It is inconsistent with the bill; it is not germane to the bill; and the Senate can do no better if they desire to destroy the whole effect of the measure than to adopt the amendment. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not desire to reply to the Senator from Delaware. I knew, of course, that he would object to this as to all amendments. The amendment as read is substantially the bill that was passed for the settlement of a similar class of claims in Arizona. This bill, if passed, will act upon the Territory of Arizona on those claims settled, but with a similar class of claims in New Mexico unsettled. Congress very wisely, prior to the passage of any bill for the general settlement of land claims in Arizona, passed a bill recognizing and confirming the rights of these small holders.

Now, there are some amendments which should be made to the amendment I have proposed. I had intended to amend it so as to provide that the surveyor-general of New Mexico should settle these questions, because some claims will be found in at least two land districts, and I intended to limit it, so that it may be subjected to no possible objection, to claims not exceeding eighty acres in extent. If the amendment is adopted, those things can be corrected.

This amendment is not at all inconsistent with the scope of the bill; does not interfere at all with the jurisdiction of the court under the bill as described by the Senator from Delaware. Now I am taking him at his word. He says that this bill does not cover that class of claims, but leaves them exactly as it found them. Then I say that that is an important omission which ought to be corrected, and this amendment corrects it, and does not interfere with the jurisdiction of the district court at all, but simply goes along with it, and takes up a class of claims which, but for this amendment, according to the statement of the Senator from Delaware, would be absolutely left out, and must be provided for by further legislation, and in the mean time I beg Senators to observe that every year that goes by without these claims being settled increases the danger that there will be no claims to be settled, because these persons will be ousted of their possessions.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it is quite difficult to understand the scope of this amendment from merely hearing it read at the desk, and as we are not likely, I think I may say, to get a vote upon this bill this evening, I ask the Senator from Kansas if he will not be willing to put his amendment in such shape as he would suggest it and let it be printed, so that we may have it before us for closer inspection to-morrow.

Mr. PLUMB. It is now printed in the shape of Senate bill 1209, with the exception of immaterial amendments which adapt it to the position it would occupy in this bill. I am entirely willing, if the Senator from Indiana desires to have the matter go over for examination, that the Senate shall adjourn. It is now late.

Mr. HARRISON. There are some other amendments, and I was going to suggest to the Senator whether some provision ought not to be made withdrawing these lands, if they are now subject to entry under the laws of the United States, and requiring from the surveyor-general or the land office there some report as to these holdings. Instead of attempting to confer an absolute title now, would it not be wiser to put this in a shape that should require the land officers there to report any such holdings as are described in this amendment, and in the mean time protect these parties from the invasion of any who may attempt to go upon their holdings under the land laws? It seems to me if it were put in that shape it would meet general concurrence, and I for one do not see that it would in any serious sense destroy the harmony of the bill. There is not very much harmony about our legislation here anyhow; we are in the habit of putting almost everything in appropriation bills.

I make that suggestion. If it meets the views of the Senator from Kansas, this matter goes over and his amendment is on our tables to-morrow; if it does not meet his views, it will give some of the rest of us an opportunity to put it in that shape.

Mr. HOAR. This bill has been some six or seven days before the Senate, and, if I am not mistaken, nearly every day about 4 o'clock somebody suggests an amendment, and somebody else thinks the amendment would look a great deal better in print and we had better put it off until to-morrow. At the same rate, taking the time which this bill has occupied, it will take, if I have made correctly a hasty computation, about six years to finish the business now upon the Calendar of the Senate. We have not yet dealt with any appropriation bill or any of the very important measures which are still unreported from committees; and it seems to me this bill ought to be disposed of to-day if we sit until 5 or 6 o'clock. The Senate is thoroughly tired, through and through, out and out, with it. It has had four times more of its proportion of the time of the session than its importance warrants, though it is an important measure.

Mr. HARRISON. I was going to suggest to the Senator that there are other amendments which, I think, will occupy the time of the Senate quite as late as it will be willing to sit. So that withholding this amendment does not mean any protraction of the discussion of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business,

Mr. BAYARD. Before that is done I would like to have the amendment of the Senator from Kansas printed.

Mr. CALL. I wish to offer an amendment to the pending bill, to be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. PLUMB. Following the suggestion which has been made by Senators on both sides of the Chamber, I ask that the amendment which I offered be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HALE. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eleven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 6, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. YAPLE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 3948) making appropriations to supply deficiencies on account of the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, in regard to rebate of tax on tobacco, and to provide for the expenses of the meeting of the Legislature of the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 121) appropriating $100,000 for the support of certain destitute Indians.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE SPEAKER.

The SPEAKER. The Chair makes the following announcements:

For director of the Columbia Hospital for Women and Lying-in Asylum, Mr. I. N. EVANS, of Pennsylvania, in place of Mr. CHARLES O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, resigned.

For directors of the Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb, Mr. J. R. TUCKER, of Virginia, and Mr. W. H. CALKINS, of Indiana.

Consulting trustee of the Reform School of the District of Columbia, Mr. N. B. ELDREDGE, of Michigan.

ASSISTANT ASTRONOMER, NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting proposed bill relating to assistant astronomer on duty at the Naval Observatory; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ADVERTISING.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting account of the New York Herald for advertising; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 15, 1884, the name, rank, and regiment or corps of each Army officer borne on the sick report for long periods or continuously since July 1, 1876, to December 31, 1883, or who is now on sick leave; the length of time each officer who has been retired since July 1, 1882, to December 31, 1883, has been on the sick report or off duty previous to his retirement; the name, rank, and regiment or corps of each officer recommended by a board for retirement and date of retirement of each officer; the number of vacancies in the rank of second lieutenant September 1, 1879, and November 20, 1880; the names of civilians and of non-commissioned officers and enlisted men appointed second lieutenants in the one year ending June 30, 1880, and June 30, 1881; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEELE. I ask that be printed in the RECORD for the information of the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is too voluminous and will fill the RECORD.

Mr. STEELE. A resolution of the House calls for this information, and unless we can get it in this way we will not get it at all.

Mr. COBB. There was so much confusion we could not hear what it was.

The abstract was again read.

Mr. SCALES. Does that require unanimous consent? If so, I object.

Mr. RANDALL. My objection to this request is that it will fill a large space in the RECORD, and as it is going to be printed as a House document I see no reason for printing it in both ways.

Mr. STEELE. This is in reply to a resolution of the House. It is information called for by the House, and it ought to be placed before it in such shape as to be readily accessible.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made to the printing in the RECORD.

DEPARTMENTAL ESTIMATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriation required for the various Departments to complete the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. YOUNG for ten days, on account of important business.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. RYAN, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House all papers relating to the claim of W. H. Powell.

MOTION TO RECONSIDER.

Mr. COSGROVE. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COSGROVE. Before stating the question to the House, I desire to make announcement of the fact that my colleague Mr. O'NEILL was absent from the floor yesterday on account of sickness.

The question of privilege to which I refer is with reference now to entering a motion to reconsider the vote on the resolution reported by the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. YOUNG, on yesterday; I refer to the authority of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department to investigate subjects relating to the management of the Government property at Hot Springs. I voted in the negative, and wish to enter the motion to reconsider that vote and let that motion lie over. If the motion to reconsider shall prevail, then I will ask to introduce the resolution which I now send to the desk as a substitute, and ask unanimous consent that it be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the proposed resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That a special committee of three members, to be appointed by the Speaker, be directed to proceed to the town of Hot Springs, in the State of Arkansas, and make such investigation in respect to the work now being done upon the Hot Springs Creek, on the Government reservation at that place, and into the management of the hotel, the bath-house property, and hot-water privileges situated upon said reservation, under the act of Congress approved June 16, 1880, and report the result thereof as early as practicable, together with their recommendation as to what legislation is necessary and proper for the protection of the public interest and future management of said reservation and the property and hot water situated thereon.

That for the purpose of paying the expense thereof the sum of $1,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the contingent fund of the House, the same to be expended by the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the direction of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered CLAIMS FOR COTTON.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, and bills for the relief of parties claiming to be the owners of cotton seized by the Union authorities during the late civil war and sold and the proceeds of which have been paid into the Treasury of the United States, pending before the Committee on Claims or the Committee on War Claims at the close of the last session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and upon which no final action was taken by Congress, be, and the same are hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for investigation and report, in pursuance of the act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883; and it is hereby made the duty of the Clerk of this House, upon the application of any party seeking such relief, or his attorney, to transmit to the clerk of said court all such petitions, memorials, and bills, with accompanying papers or proofs pertaining to such claim, on file in his office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the presentation of this resolution for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary?

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the resolution which I send to the desk for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That 10,000 additional copies be printed of the bill (H. R. 4416) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes for the use of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of this resolution for present consideration?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RUSSELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR ALASKA.

On motion of Mr. EVINS, of South Carolina, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. 153) providing a civil government for Alaska was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

MUSTER AND PAY OF CERTAIN VOLUNTEER OFFICERS AND MEN.

Mr. STEELE. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to offer an amendment to House bill No. 355, now on the Calendar, and ask to have the bill, with the amendment, printed for the use of the House.

Mr. HENLEY. What bill is that?

The SPEAKER. The title will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 355) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. STEELE. This is offered by instruction of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the bill and the report be read.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let the amendment be read for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "commissioned," in the eighth line, "or were prevented from performing said duties under their respective commissions by reason of wounds received in the line of duty or by sickness in hospital or ever being prisoners of war."

Mr. RANDALL. That is the bill I introduced in the last session of Congress.

Mr. STEELE. That bill was offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the last session.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the bill will be reprinted with the amendment.

Mr. STEELE. Including the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Including the amendment.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ATTORNEYS PRACTICING BEFORE PENSION OFFICE.

Mr. MATSON. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to this House copies of all orders and correspondence relating to and preceding said orders in his office or in that of the Commissioner of Pensions relating to irregular practices on the part of attorneys practicing before the Pension Office, arising since the 30th of June, 1881, together with copies of all official charges against such attorneys and the papers relating to the same, and either copies or duplicates of all circulars used by attorneys practicing before the Pension Office which are deemed by the Commissioner of Pensions to be deceptive in their character and designed to defraud applicants for pension.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SNUG HARBORS FOR DISABLED SEAMEN.

JAMES P. COWENS.

Mr. THOMAS also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4692) for the relief of James P. Cowens; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FREDERICK A. LEONING.

Mr. WEAVER also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4695) to amend an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River opposite to or near the corporate limits of Nebraska City, Nebr., approved June 4, 1872; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

Mr. WELLER. I desire to submit an amendment to the rules, that it may be read for the information of the House and may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] desires to submit an amendment to the report made by the Committee on Rules, and asks that it be read——

Mr. RANDALL. Read for information?

The SPEAKER. Read only for information and that it be printed in the RECORD, as other proposed amendments have been.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Amendment to Rule XXI by addition of section 7:

"SEC. 7. That no bill before the House shall be brought up for final action until a copy of such bill, with copy of the committee's report thereon, has been put on the desk of each member on the day on which final action is sought."

BRANCH SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. CURTIN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4696) to authorize the location of a branch home for volunteer disabled soldiers in either the State of Arkansas, Colorado, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, or Nebraska, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PROSECUTIONS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the official reports of the Attorney-General and of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the years 1882 and 1883 show that nearly one-fifth of all criminal prosecutions in the Federal courts of the several States and Territories for those years were instituted in the State of West Virginia, and that most of such prosecutions were disposed of without trial and without profit to the United States; and

Whereas the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted to this House on the 4th instant, in regard to the expenses of such prosecutions and other matters relating to the Federal courts in that State, shows an unusual and increasing expenditure by the Department of Justice in the State of West Virginia: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be instructed to examine and report as to the occasion or necessity, if any, for such increased expenditures, and for that purpose have power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CALKINS. Let it go to a committee.

Mr. GIBSON. If the gentleman will hear me a moment he will see that there are reasons for action on the resolution at once.

Mr. CALKINS. I am opposed on general principles to giving power to any committee to send for persons and papers and make large expenditures unless where a committee of this House first reports a necessity for it.

Mr. GIBSON. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that the information sought, or much of it, has already been submitted here by the Secretary of the Treasury, and that information is already before the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. But in conversation with the chairman of that committee some question was raised as to the power to report on this matter along with others. I do not suppose the resolution gives to that committee any other power than that they have now; it merely removes any doubt as to its jurisdiction over this subject.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I object to debate, objection having been made to the present consideration of the resolution; and I call for the regular order.

Mr. GIBSON. Let the resolution, then, be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for, which is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees for reports.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.

The question was taken upon the motion of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri; and upon a division there were—ayes 121, noes 10.

So (no further count being called for) the motion was agreed to—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. BELMONT. I rise to a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will present it.

Mr. BELMONT. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back the resolution of inquiry which I send to the Clerk's desk with a recommendation that it be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to transmit to this House complete copies of all correspondence between this Government and that of Great Britain respecting the extradition of alleged fugitives from justice that has taken place since the date of the President's special message to Congress of December 23, 1876, announcing that the suspended extradition under the treaty of 1842 had been resumed; and that the aforesaid correspondence be accompanied by projets of any new extradition stipulations that may have been submitted by either government to the other since the suspension in 1876 of the operations under the tenth article of the treaty of 1842.

Mr. CALKINS. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, made the following report:

The purpose of the resolution is to enable the Foreign Affairs Committee and the House to examine all the diplomatic notes that have passed between the United States and Great Britain since December 23, 1876, on the subject of extradition, and also to examine any projets of new extradition arrangements that may have been made or may have been submitted by either government to the other.

The date December 23, 1876, is taken as a starting-point because the correspondence between the two governments up to that time has been printed. It will be remembered that in 1876 President Grant, exercising the power given to him by the stipulations of the eleventh article of the treaty of 1842, suspended the extradition proceedings under the tenth article. The British Government shortly thereafter abandoned its pretensions, and President Grant revived proceedings under the treaty of 1842. The question then in dispute was whether Lawrence, who had been charged in London by the Federal attorney in New York with the crime of forgery committed several times on distinct and separate charges—and who had consented in London to be surrendered on only one charge—whether he could be tried on the other charges in New York. While that was under discussion President Grant demanded from the British Government the extradition of Winslow, also charged with forgery. The demand was refused, unless the President would say that Winslow should not be tried in this country excepting on the identical charge on which the surrender might be made. The promise was refused, and then President Grant suspended the tenth article of the treaty of 1842. When the extradition article was subsequently revived the country was told that negotiations were on foot for the conclusion of a more satisfactory convention. But no new treaty has been concluded.

The extradition stipulations in the Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842 are contained in one brief article, and are now considered incomplete.

The treaty was negotiated in order to define and settle certain territorial boundaries. The articles respecting the final suppression of the African slave trade and the extradition of criminals were subordinate stipulations. The extradition article is little more than a repetition of the twenty-seventh article of the Jay treaty of 1794, enlarged as to crimes by adding to "murder" and "forgery" "assault with intent to murder," "piracy," "arson," and "robbery."

In 1843 an extradition convention was concluded between the United States and France, which specified the crimes of "murder," "intent to murder," "rape," "forgery," "arson," and "embezzlement."

Up to the treaty between us and the Hawaiian Islands of 1849, which only included the five offenses in the British treaty of 1842, the French and British treaties were the only extradition arrangements which the United States had with foreign governments. In 1850 came a treaty with Switzerland. Since then the United States have concluded some twenty extradition treaties, covering more than as many distinct offenses. Meanwhile the old treaty of 1842 between two such great commercial powers as the United States and Great Britain stands unenlarged and unimproved, with 3,000 miles of boundary on the north of us, with British colonies in the West Indies, and with unsurpassed facilities for almost daily departure from the jurisdiction of either country by swift ocean steamers. The existing British treaty only specifies, as I have said, murder, assault with intent to murder, piracy, arson, robbery, and forgery.

Neither burglary, the fabrication and circulation of counterfeit money, bonds, and bank-notes, embezzlement of public money or of private funds, kidnaping, larceny, nor indeed any of the modern commercial crimes are covered by the British treaty. No treaty arrangements exist between these two great English-speaking nations for a preliminary arrest and holding on an application made by cable, nor indeed are there any of the modern appliances for arrest and surrender such as are to be found in recent extradition treaties, and notably in the one concluded last year between us and Spain.

Besides the evident defects in the Ashburton-Webster treaty, to which allusion has been made, and especially the absence of any definite stipulations about the right and power of the demanding government to try for any other offense than the identical one on which the surrender was made, there is the other grave defect that the existing British-American extradition article says not a word about a surrender when the offense charged—as for example, murder—was inspired and committed with a political motive.

Neither is any reference made to political crimes in the treaties which we have with the Hawaiian Islands, with Bavaria, or with Prussia.

The other extradition treaties concluded by the United States exclude any surrender for a political offense.

France, 1843: "Any crime or offense of a purely political character."

Switzerland, 1850: "Those of a political character."

Two Sicilies, 1855: "Offenses of a political character," unless the political offender shall also have been guilty of some one of the crimes enumerated in article 22, which article specifies "murder" and "assassination."

Austria, 1856: "Not to any crime or offense of a political character."

Baden, 1857: "Crimes of a political character."

Sweden, 1860: "Any crime or offense of a political character."

Venezuela, 1860: "Those of a political character."

Mexico, 1861: "Any crime or offense of a purely political character."

Hayti, 1864: "Those of a political character."

Dominican Republic, 1867: "Those of a political character."

Italy, 1868: "Any crime or offense of a political character."

Salvador, 1870: "Any crime or offense of a political character."

Peru, 1870: "Any crime or offense of a purely political character."

Nicaragua, 1870: "Any crime or offense of a political character."

Orange Free State, 1871: "Those of a political character."

Ecuador, 1872: "Crimes or offenses of a political character."

Belgium, 1874: "Any crime or offense of a political character."

Ottoman Empire, 1874: "Any crime or offense of a political character."

Spain, 1877: "Any crime or offense of a political character, nor for acts connected with such crimes or offenses."

It is to be borne in mind that while the British statute forbids the queen or any minister of the crown to surrender a fugitive for the commission of an offense of a purely political character, the laws of Congress make no allusion to the subject.

There was, not long ago, much excitement in this country, it will be remembered, over the rumor that the British Government had demanded of the State Department the extradition of Mr. Sheridan and one or two others, on the charge that one or all of them had been guilty of a conspiracy to murder Lord Cavendish in Dublin. It is proper that this House shall know officially what passed between the two governments in that relation. Did the British Government make or endeavor to make the demand on the State Department? It will be seen that the British-American treaty does not specify "conspiracy to commit murder," although it is true that a British statute enacted since the treaty of 1842 does declare that "murder" shall in England include "conspiracy to murder."

In the existing relations of the two countries with one another growing out of events in Ireland it is certainly of the utmost importance that this House shall know what views, if any, the British Government has taken and expressed on this question respecting the quantity and quality of political motive and purpose which can make murder an inextraditable offense in the eye of her own statute or in the eye of international law.

Can assassination ever be a political offense in the domain of public law? If assassination be defined as murder committed with premeditation and under the inspiration of private vengeance, would the assassin of President Lincoln or of Secretary Seward have been surrendered by the British Government if he had fled to Canada or Jamaica, and the American Government had made the demand? Would British statute have permitted a surrender? It is quite safe to say that the people of the United States will never consent that their Government shall surrender to a foreign power a participant in even an unsuccessful political revolution, rebellion, or civil commotion who has found an asylum on our shores and has been charged by the government he attempted to overthrow with murder, or forgery, or arson committed in the promotion, and only in the promotion, of such political revolt which had then passed beyond the condition of an ordinary violation of law. And for the reason, among others, that the tribunals of the demanding country can not be assumed to be sufficiently impartial to try such a political offender.

In more than a dozen of the extradition treaties made by the United States it has been stipulated that citizens of the country on which the demand is made shall not be surrendered; but, in a great part of those, the judicial tribunals of the foreign state takes jurisdiction of offenses committed by its subjects in foreign countries which the United States do not, because, under our system, an offense can only be tried in the State or district where committed, unless it was committed in an American vessel on the high seas.

There is another reason why this House should take cognizance of what, since 1876, has gone on between Washington and London in respect to extradition. The tendency is increasing among publicists in both countries to regulate extradition by statute, and by statute to give to the judicial tribunals power to arrest and order a surrender to a demanding government irrespective of treaty, and under conditions to be prescribed by the surrendering state. The reason of the tendency is that governments are beginning to see that it is for their interest to be rid of criminals. Caution is, of course, to be exercised in inflicting a sentence of surrender, but no more than in inflicting a sentence of punishment. One of the objections urged in this country against the extradition article in the Jay treaty of 1794 was, that a jury trial was not secured.

An objection against a general statute authorizing the judicial power to sentence a surrender has been, that, in the absence of a treaty, a foreign government might refuse to reciprocate and surrender to us fugitives from justice. But the answer has been made, that such a refusal would work an injury to the country refusing, by making of it a "Botany Bay" for criminals from other nations.

These are some of the reasons which have induced the committee to report the resolution.

Mr. CALKINS. Before the resolution is adopted by the House I would like to know from my friend from New York [Mr. BELMONT] whether he has investigated the subject so far as to be able to inform us about how much work this will impose upon the Department, and, if the information should be given, how much of a volume it will probably make when printed. I do not want to oppose the resolution, but I would like to have the House informed of about the number of pages this information will make.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I understood that this was a resolution of inquiry and privileged and was to be disposed of without debate.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged report, but is debatable, unless the previous question is ordered upon it.

Mr. BELMONT. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] that it would depend entirely on what may have been done since the printing of the last correspondence, which was furnished to Congress December 23, 1876. It does not appear that since that time there has been a great deal of correspondence upon the subject. The purpose of the inquiry is to ascertain how much and only how much there has been. I do not believe that it will be voluminous at all.

Mr. CALKINS. Of course if the gentleman has investigated the subject sufficiently to ascertain that the correspondence concerning these treaties, protests, and the like that have taken place with regard to them will not be voluminous I have no objection to the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken upon the adoption of the resolution; and upon a division there were—ayes 77, noes 11.

So (no further count being called for) the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BELMONT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 3967 for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, &c.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I desire to submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in some doubt whether, if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] insists upon the consideration of the special order, these reports can take precedence. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield for the presenting of a privileged report?

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. If it does not give rise to any debate I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will present his report.

ABSENCE FROM DUTY OF MINISTERS, CONSULS, ETC.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to report back the resolution of inquiry which I send to the Clerks desk with a recommendation that the same be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House how many and who of the foreign ministers, consuls, or agents of the United States to any foreign country have been absent from their posts of duty since the 1st day of January, 1882, the time absent, and the reasons therefor; and whether their salary has been paid them during such absence, and the amount so paid in each case.

Mr. CALKINS. Let the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution—

"That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House how many and who of the foreign ministers, consuls, or agents of the United States to any foreign country have been absent from their post of duty since the 1st day of January, 1882, the time absent, and the reasons therefor, and whether their salary has been paid them during such absence, and the amount so paid in each case"— beg leave to report, that they have had the same under consideration, and recommend its adoption.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I call the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CALKINS. I make a point of order on the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALKINS. My point of order is that the report does not give to the House the information which is required by the rule, if I recollect it aright.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware of the existence of any rule which prescribes the character of the report, other than that it shall be in writing.

Mr. CALKINS. The purpose of the rule is perfectly evident in requiring a report to be made. It is that the House may be informed why any proposition reported from a committee should be passed by the House; that is the purpose of the rule. Of course a merely formal report that a resolution or bill ought to pass can just as well be made verbally as in writing.

The SPEAKER. Still that is not a question of order. It may be a reason for opposing the resolution.

Mr. CALKINS. I move to recommit the resolution, with instructions to the committee to report to the House the reasons why in their opinion the resolution should be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS], pending the demand for the previous question, moves to recommit the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, with instructions to report the reasons in favor of the adoption of the resolution.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CALKINS, there were—ayes 47, noes 63.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum has voted. I do so only for the purpose of saying to the House—and there should be no party considerations about a matter of this kind——

Mr. BLOUNT. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The point having been made that a quorum has not voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. CALKINS, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CLEMENTS.

Mr. CALKINS. If it is to be the construction that a committee reporting back a resolution of this kind is not required to submit any reasons in favor of its adoption, I have no objection. But it would seem desirable that when a report is made the House should have some statement of reasons upon which to act.

The SPEAKER. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. CALKINS. I withdraw the point, but in doing so I think it due to myself to say that I did not wish to make any contest on this matter. All I wanted was that we should have a construction by the House as to the sort of report that the rule requires.

Mr. HAMMOND. We understand that.

The SPEAKER. On the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to recommit the resolution with instructions, the ayes are 47, the noes 63. The motion is not agreed to. The question is now on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLEMENTS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISEASES AMONG CATTLE, ETC.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I renew the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, the bill for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the special order, being the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have not had the time nor opportunity to bestow that degree of investigation upon this subject which its magnitude and importance demand. Had I fully understood and comprehended the nature and purpose of this bill when, a few days since, the expedition of its consideration was asked by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH], who has it in charge, I should most assuredly have withheld my consent from allowing it to be made the special order of yesterday; for in my judgment there are planted within its provisions danger-signals to one of the greatest and most material interests in the Southwest, and especially in the State which I have the honor in part to represent, that ought not to be disregarded; and especially is my immediate district imperiled, for a vast portion of its territory is devoted almost exclusively to pastoral purposes. It may not be improper in this connection if I impart to this committee some information concerning its extent. In it there are more than 120,000 square miles. It is as large as the combined area of the ten States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and Ohio, represented on this floor by sixty-one members. Over one-half of that territory is devoted to live-stock enterprise, and principally to the cattle interest, and it is by natural selection the home and paradise of the cowman.

The cattle business of Texas is certainly one of the most important industries of that great State. From it has been derived much of the material prosperity which obtains there to-day; it has built cities, invited capital, and attracted immigration from every State in this Union and from "across the great waters." I have been surprised to learn since I became a member of the House that I have many quasi-constituents on this floor and in the Senate Chamber, all the way from New York to Arkansas, who are directly or indirectly interested in the live-stock enterprises of my district, either from owning flocks and herds or tracts of land chiefly valuable for grazing purposes.

I deem it not unimportant if I invite attention for a few moments to the extent and materiality of the live-stock resources of Texas from official authority. I hold in my hand the report of the comptroller of public accounts of the State of Texas for the fiscal year from September 1, 1882, to August 31, 1883, which contains, among other things, a summary statement of assessments of property in the State of Texas for 1883, as shown by assessment-rolls on file in the comptroller's office, with an enumeration of the live-stock of that State as taken from tax renditions. We all know that tax-payers as a rule are not solicitous to render exaggerated estimates as to amounts and values of property, and it is safe to assume that there are in fact more domestic animals there than this enumeration indicates. As shown, there were of horses and mules 1,054,452, valued at $27,678,508; cattle, 6,054,488, valued at $71,393,319; jacks and jennets, 4,756, valued at $247,325; sheep, 4,491,600, valued at $9,228,234; goats, 444,454, valued at $517,601; hogs, 1,044,762, valued at $1,673,298; the aggregate number being 13,074,512, valued at $110,738,285. According to the Tenth Census reports the entire amount of cattle in the United States numbered 41,171,000. So I assume that there is to-day within the limits of the State of Texas over one-seventh of all the cattle in this great country.

I will further state, Mr. Chairman, and in this I speak with only approximate accuracy, that there are annually exported from the State of Texas, by driving or shipment, not less than 500,000 head of beef-cattle, and I believe that this estimate might be safely increased. From the district which I have the honor to represent the annual exportation is at least 200,000, and if I were to say that $25,000,000 is invested in live-stock in that district alone I believe it would be no misrepresentation.

But a few days ago my colleagues and myself had occasion to complain to the Secretary of the Interior that the great cattle-trail running from Texas through the Indian Territory, which has been used for many years and over which there are annually driven to northern points from 250,000 to 350,000 head of Texas cattle, had been closed. What capital, what motors have inspired this obstruction I know not, but I fear that it is but a part of a systematic plan which has for its object every impediment to cattle exportations from Texas. It is true, I believe, that in one State a statute was enacted that interdicted within its limits the entrance of Texas cattle during certain seasons of the year, predicated upon the idea, I suppose, of the existence of some sort of disease.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. What State does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. LANHAM. Missouri. And the bill now under consideration is reported and its conduct controlled by the distinguished gentleman [Mr. HATCH] from that State.

From these considerations, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that Texas Representatives ought to apply their most rigid scrutiny to the bill now under consideration. I may "take counsel of my fears," but the apprehension exists in my mind that if this bill pass a severe blow may be inflicted upon a great and material industry of their State.

Now, my hostility to this bill, Mr. Chairman, is not actuated by the slightest apprehension that there exists to-day or ever has existed within the broad limits of the State of Texas one single, solitary, well-defined case of pleuro-pneumonia. Our climatic conditions, nutritious grasses, wholesome pasturage, the habits and treatment of our cattle, are not such as are calculated to encourage and propagate this plague. Nor is there any disposition upon the part of our stockmen to export or place upon the market any live-stock afflicted with disease. They take special pride in the grades of their cattle, the quality of their beef, and the merchantable condition of their herds. No country on this continent surpasses or perhaps equals Texas as a stock-growing region, or is more healthful and better adapted to that purpose. And it is shown in the discussion which occurred here yesterday, as well as in the report of the committee who approved this bill, that pleuro-pneumonia does not exist west of the Alleghany Mountains, and is confined to parts of five States. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] says:

> This disease we now have extending some three hundred miles along our Atlantic seaboard.

It is never found among the Western herds. If pleuro-pneumonia and its eradication be the object, and other contagious and communicable diseases" the incident, why not confine the operations of the bill and have its provisions to apply alone to infected localities eo nomine?

Now, sir, I desire to take up this bill seriatim and submit such criticisms and suggest such objectionable features as have occurred to me. Its caption is delusive and produces prima facie the impression that it ought to pass, because the inference is that it seeks the extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia, to which no one is likely to object per se. I would not, if I could, embarrass or obstruct the passage of any salutary law which would accomplish that object in a proper way, with reasonable certainty and at reasonable expense; but I believe there are attendant and consequential evils involved in the passage of this bill infinitely more to be dreaded than the cattle-plague.

I have no great sympathy with bureaus or bureaucracy. They involve the lodgment of extraordinary power and authority in the hands of a few, and this bureau, I fear, would place the great transporting and commercial transactions in the live-stock of the country in the hands of a very few men, and afford the opportunity and instrumentality to designing persons to control the markets and the transit of domestic animals. While I do not say, by any means, that such is the purpose of the measure, or at all contemplated by its framers, still I fear that its possible operations may produce just such results.

The first section provides for the organization of a bureau of animal industry, with the appointment of a veterinary surgeon (this is the polite term for what used to be known in my country as a "horse-doctor") as chief thereof, who shall investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use. The legal interpretation of the words "the domestic animals," I suppose, is to include all those not feræ naturæ; and just here we are startled at the magnitude of the work. Horses and mules, jacks and jennets, cattle, sheep, goats, hogs, cats, and dogs come within the generic term of "the domestic animals." The number, value, and condition, the protection and use of each in the United States, are to be investigated and reported; not merely that, but "the causes of contagious and communicable diseases among them" are to be ascertained, together with "the means and cure of the same;" and then, superadded to these labors, is the "collection of information on these subjects." I will simply remark, in passing, that the multiplied work of the Tenth Census is not a circumstance in comparison with the labor herein contemplated. Then comes a salary of $4,500 for the chief and clerk—the addition of two more office-holders to the decimated ranks of that unfortunate class.

Section 2 provides for two additional agents, at a salary of $10 per day and all necessary expenses—gross amount incalculable of estimate—while engaged in "examining and reporting upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals," &c., all to be appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture. What are "the contagious and communicable diseases" intended? Arbitrary assumption may here step in and characterize such diseases as caprice or inclination may dictate as being "contagious and communicable." Pleuro-pneumonia may be lost sight of in the eagerness to extend the range and broaden the field of "veterinary" science and the desire to govern shipments and exportations.

The third section gives the power to the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the suppression and extirpation of diseases, and to certify the same to the executive authority of each State and Territory and invite their co-operation. Whenever such plans and methods shall be accepted, and such executive authorities shall signify their readiness to co-operate in the premises, the Commissioner may expend one-half of the money necessary in any State or Territory for the slaughter of diseased animals and in disinfection to extirpate the disease; and in the proviso following we find for the first time the fatal words, "quarantine of infected herds of cattle." It is noticeable that in the one hundred and fifty-eight lines of this bill the word "cattle" is only twice used, and in each case it is surrounded with an abatis of harsh phraseology in the shape of police regulations, prohibition of transportation, quarantine! Ordinary terms will do to apply to "live-stock" and "domestic animals," but when cattle are mentioned embargo is the word!

But, Mr. Chairman, when we come to section 4, which, in my judgment, is the most vicious and pernicious part of the bill, it seems that the optionary acceptance of the regulations of the Commissioner by the States and Territories is practically neutralized and rendered nugatory, for it allows, upon the presentation of facts by the Commissioner, the President of the United States to declare in quarantine any State or Territory, or part thereof, and to prohibit the transportation of cattle out of the same; and this applies independent of any acceptance of or co-operation by the States or Territories in the rules and regulations of the Commissioner.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman from Texas, but I am satisfied that when he comes to read the provisions of the bill carefully he will not be willing to have that remark stand in the RECORD as he has uttered it. That is not the provision of the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. I am making my criticisms upon the bill as I proceed and construing its salient features as I understand them, and the gentleman will have ample opportunity to respond. But I will read the entire section, which is as follows:

SEC. 4. That whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease exists, which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provision for its extirpation or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

The Commissioner, receiving his information from the "horse-doctor" and the two agents "familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock," may represent a certain state of facts to the President, it is possible, wholly imaginary, and may be derived from a competitive dealer and speculator, its ascertainment not even required to be upon oath or affirmation, which may block the avenues of trade, stop legitimate live-stock business, and paralyze in any locality one of the greatest industries of the country.

What oath do the "horse-doctor" and the two agents take? What bond do they give? To whom are they responsible? Who shall respond in damages to the stock-owner, stopped possibly with his herd in transitu? If it turn out that the condition of his cattle be misrepresented through careless inquiry or for sinister purposes, who shall recompense him for his delay, his expense, his depreciated property when it finally reaches a market, or the disbarkment of his cattle a thousand miles from their accustomed range, or turning them loose in the woods or upon the bleak barrens? Where is the remedy for that pastoral district or section of country that may be made the victim of fraud or misrepresentation during the market season?

Suppose that two rival cattle companies with large supplies of beef-cattle are seeking the Saint Louis or Chicago market, hailing from different States or Territories, or even the same; suppose that numerous small ranchmen from different localities are en route, either on foot or by shipment, eager to reach a rising market, whose aggregate herds will affect the demand; suppose given sections of the Western country are in active competition to furnish beef-supplies to the great cities of the North, and there is "a race for diligence" in reaching the nearest railroad stations; the excitement is intense, speculation is rife, business activities are strained to their utmost tension, the combative motives of buyer and seller are asserting their every energy, the voracious appetite of the "corner-men" is whetted to frenzy, all the machinery and stimuli of greed are in full play, all the multifarious agencies and influences of loss and gain are at work—how potential are the inducements to take advantage, how strong the temptation! The opportunity will be afforded by virtue of this bill, should it become a law, to enable one man or set of men to seriously impair, if not utterly destroy, the business prosperity of another. How easy a matter to circulate the report of the existence of pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious disease in any locality! How many media for the promotion of selfish advantage may be opened and employed! Avarice knows no bound. This is an era of bulls and bears, of corners and stock-exchanges, of bureaus and syndicates, when "moneyed might possesses the means abundantly of wearying out the right."

I believe that the States in their great reservation of rights are able to make their own local and police regulations, to govern their own internal affairs, and that every measure in any way tending to the impairment of their autonomy ought to receive the unwavering condemnation of their Representatives on this floor. Here the Federal Government says to the States: "If you do not voluntarily accept and comply with the terms of the Commissioner, suggested by the "horse-doctor" and bureau agents, we will coerce you, lay embargo upon your commercial transactions, and quarantine your exportations."

I by no means give my assent to the constitutionality of this bill, but in the brief time allowed me I have been compelled to pretermit a discussion of that view of the matter, and to confine myself to a limited consideration of the impolicy involved.

SEC. 5. That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia or any contagious or communicable disease along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live-stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall from time to time establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigation may require.

This scientific bureau, with its "horse-doctor" and peripatetic attachés, will, I suppose, go all along the line of Canada and the British possessions, up and down the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, along the Gulf of Mexico and the Rio Grande border, with power to make inquiry as to the subjects contemplated by this provision. When will the work of the bureau cease? How limitless is the field of its explorations! I apprehend that a necessity may arise to organize some new expedition to go out in quest of lost "horse-doctors" and bureau agents.

The seventh section interdicts any interstate railroad company or masters of steamboats or sail vessels from receiving for transportation from one State or Territory to another any live-stock affected with any contagious disease, and prohibits the delivery of such by any person, company, or corporation; and the eighth section provides for notice to be given by the Commissioner to the proper official of railroads and vessels of the existence of contagion, and also makes certain penal provisions in case of violation.

Here again, I conceive, is to be found a fruitful source of evil. The railroads "will serve whom they will serve." They will constitute themselves the judges of what stock they ought to receive for transportation and what they ought not to receive. Some men's cattle will be shipped and some will go unshipped. The penalties imposed will give to them an arbitrary option and power of refusal, and, besides, the notice brought to them may be predicated upon untrue and unfounded conditions. The door is again thrown wide open for misrepresentation and unfair advantage. It is often the case, as matters now are, that stockmen can only ship their cattle upon a compliance with the most rigorous terms and acquiescence in the limitation of liability upon the part of the railway lines; and in many instances long and weary drives are made rather than submit to their merciless exactions. Such troubles will be still further promoted and aggravated by the inevitable operations of this bill should its passage be accomplished. But even if the railroad companies are disposed to do right and to treat all alike, the restrictions laid upon them are such that their own safety and protection may often warrant a refusal to transport live-stock in consequence of imaginary contagia of some sort.

Then comes the section providing for prosecutions by United States district attorneys for violations when brought to their knowledge by any person making complaint, whether under oath the bill does not say. More Federal offenses, more oppressions to the citizen, more encroachments of judicial power. I congratulate the district attorneys and marshals, for railroad officials and cattle-men are not usually impecunious; but I groan for the people. The results of the bill for evil would be far-reaching, and affect not only the specific live-stock dealer, but every interest which stock-growing promotes and all exchanges that flow from it.

Last, but not least, $250,000 of the people's money, to be immediately available, is to be appropriated. This amount is glaringly insufficient and wholly inadequate for all the objects enumerated. It will hardly be "pocket change" for the bureau. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] says:

We propose to appropriate enough money to begin this thing.

The bureau, with its varied and comprehensive service and multiplied calls upon the fund, will soon exhaust and speedily consume this little sum, and, what is abhorrent to economical government, a deficiency of perhaps a million of dollars will arise in the early stages of the operations of the new law.

I was not astonished to hear the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] on yesterday speak in support of this bill, for it could not enter into the mind of any Representative to conceive a more magnificent method for "unlocking the vaults of the Treasury" and disgorging the public funds.

If I shall have subserved the purpose to elicit careful scrutiny and elaborate discussion upon this bill, to levy requisition upon its authors and supporters to maintain the necessity and propriety of its passage, and to warn this body to be careful how they vote upon it, I shall esteem myself most fortunate and feel that I have discharged a public duty; and with these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I now yield ten minutes of my time to my colleague [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. REAGAN. I do not propose to occupy any time in the discussion of those branches of the question to which my colleague has referred. He has shown very fully the large interest which the State of Texas has in the question of cattle-raising. The remarks I propose to make will be directed to the constitutionality of the first four sections of the bill. And in making these remarks I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I realize fully the importance of the interest taken by the Committee on Agriculture in this subject, for it is one of very considerable interest to the American people; and whatever measure may be lawfully adopted for the purpose of carrying out the wishes of the committee I will gladly join them in. But there may be evils in a remedy like this that are greater than those which it is the purpose of the committee to remove.

The first section of this bill, an act for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, &c., provides—

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his Department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use, and also inquire into and report the causes of contagious and communicable diseases among them and the means for the prevention and cure of the same, and to collect such information on these subjects as shall be valuable to the agricultural and commercial interests of the country; and the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose.

This bill contemplates that this bureau shall engage in the collection of this information in all the States and Territories of the Union. Under our duplex system of government certain duties and powers are confided by the people of the United States to the State governments and certain duties and powers are confided by them to the Federal Government. The object of the constitutions, State and Federal, was to mark the boundary between the authority of the two, so that each government in full operation might move on in harmony without collision with the other.

Now, then, under what clause of the Constitution do we obtain power to send persons into the States for the purpose contemplated by the first section of this bill? I do not know myself under what clause it would be claimed. Possibly it may be claimed under the power to regulate commerce among the States. But that would not be a regulation of commerce among the States; that is, much of it would not. An inquiry into the number and value of domestic animals in the United States and about their protection and use, &c., is not the regulation of commerce, but is purely a domestic question for the action and determination of each State.

There are things that the Federal Government could do in connection with the subject of this bill. It can provide for the inspection of cattle or domestic animals in transitu from State to State or from or to a foreign country. And it can adopt regulations to prevent all that which constitutes interstate traffic, that is, traffic from State to State, or traffic from our country to foreign countries or from foreign countries to us; it can provide inspection to prevent the conveyance from State to State of such articles of interstate commerce as may be injurious to health or may be injurious in any way to the commerce or interests or policy of the country. But that applies only to that power of inspection and prevention which may relate to things passing from State to State, or to or from a foreign country, and can not warrant the going into a State and performing the various things mentioned in the first section of this bill. The second section of this bill provides:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia and to provide against the spread of other contagious diseases.

That section clearly contemplates that this authority and power shall extend into a State and take hold of the domestic interests and business, so far as relate to stock of this kind, in the State, and does not seem to be directed at all to simply that part of it which might constitute a portion of the interstate traffic of this country. Except as to that, I repeat again Congress has no power to act. It derives all its power from that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to regulate commerce among the several States, with the Indian tribes, and with foreign nations. Certainly the ownership and possession of herds of cattle and other domestic animals in a State, the condition and health of the cattle, the manner of caring for them, the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious diseases, pleuro-pneumonia and the like, are not questions which in the sense that the terms are employed here relate to interstate commerce; for these terms relate purely to domestic industries within the State, and subject alone to State authorities. The third section of this bill provides—

That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the speedy and effectual suppression and extirpation of said diseases.

Where? In the States and the Territories of the Union. Here again there is provision for the employment of the power of the Federal Government in connection with the purely domestic interests of a State, which under our constitutional form of government can not be tolerated; a government with certain powers of a national and international character conferred upon the Federal Government, while all the powers which relate merely to domestic interests have been left to the States. The section further provides:

And to certify such rules and regulations to the executive authority of each State and Territory, and invite said authorities to co-operate in the execution and enforcement of this act. Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious disease is declared to exist, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease.

Now, where are all these things to be done? On a State boundary, with reference to property passing from one State to another and thereby becoming interstate commerce? Or on a national boundary, with reference to property passing from one country to another? Not at all, or not wholly so; it is mainly with reference to property which is purely domestic, within the borders and jurisdiction of the State, and over which the Federal Government has no earthly power. There is then a provision—

That the authorities of said State or Territory shall assume and pay one-half of the expense of the valuation of the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter and one-half the cost of disinfection and necessary police regulations in the quarantine and care of infected herds of cattle.

So that it points distinctly to the local internal interests of the State to be affected, with the consent of the State authorities. The fourth section of the bill provides—

That whenever a State or Territory, in any section of which a contagious, infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

I admit that the closing provisions of this section may be within the authority which Congress may properly exercise in regulating commerce between the States—interstate commerce. But this section presents a menace to the States, a command to them that they must do certain things which lie wholly within their own exclusive jurisdiction and control; and it would place us in the attitude of commanding the States of this Union to do things about which we have no right or authority to command them. Now, we ought not to do that.

If we expect to preserve liberty, if we expect to maintain law, if we expect to preserve property and personal rights, we ought to be careful at all times and under all circumstances to maintain the supremacy of the organic law, to preserve from violation both the Federal Constitution and the constitutions of the States. We can not do so by disregarding the provisions of the Federal Constitution, and by invading and disregarding and overthrowing the rights of the States which constitute this great Union.

I desired only to call attention to the first four sections of this bill, each of which, in my judgment, is undoubtedly violative of the Constitution of the United States, and neither of which, in my judgment, could be enforced by the decree of a court bound by the Constitution of the United States.

There are some other provisions of this bill which I would have liked to comment upon, but I do not deem it necessary. While I appreciate the labors of the Committee on Agriculture, while I sympathize with their efforts to preserve these great interests, I dissent only from the methods which have been recommended to be adopted, and which to me seem to be in violation of the Constitution. As I said in the outset, I would gladly co-operate with them in anything that seems to be constitutional in order to carry out their purpose.

I apprehend that in the end we will have to do as the State of Massachusetts has done. That State was suffering more, perhaps, than any other single State from this pluro-pneumonia among the cattle, and it took hold of the question, and by its own energy and its own means it eradicated this disease. The State of New York is now engaged in doing the same thing. Other States can do so constitutionally, and at their own expense, in their own way, and in their own time eradicate this disease, if they will only adopt the course which has been pursued in Massachusetts. There is then no expense to the National Government, and the burden falls upon those most directly interested in it.

There is in this bill a clause which is a little seductive in saying to the State that the Federal Government shall pay half the cost of this proceeding when done within the State. But we should be careful not to accept such a price for a violation of the Constitution of the United States and for the infringement of the rights of the States.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me a question right there?

Mr. REAGAN. I am now through my remarks.

Mr. LANHAM. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT].

Mr. HUNT. Mr. Chairman, according to my judgment the bill before the committee is dangerously unconstitutional. The Constitution of the United States left to the individual States the ordinary police power, and it can not be taken from them, either wholly or in part, and exercised under legislation of Congress. The police power of a State extends to the protection of the lives, the limbs, the health, the comfort, and the quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the State. The right to drain, the right to light, the right to provide measures of health—those rights which are concerned in living in a community where all men must surrender something for the public good—are involved within the police power. The Federal system, as I have already observed, left this police power in the States. It inheres in the States.

The Constitution of the United States, in dealing with the commercial power, has carefully reconciled this reserved right of the States with the general grants to the Federal Government. The Constitution declares that Congress "shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes;" and the Constitution goes on to recognize the right of a State to lay imposts or duties "absolutely necessary for the execution of its inspection laws." The readers of the history of the debates of that time will find, I venture to say, that the phrase "inspection laws," as employed in the Constitution, was intended to refer to laws for the preservation of the health of the people of the States. They will find that in the discussions of that time it was expressly understood that the power to enact laws which touch the internal economy, the health, the municipal government, the well-being, the quiet of the people, resided in the localities where intelligence concerning those subjects was most easily to be had.

Now what does this bill propose? The fourth section provides (and my time of five minutes will only allow me to deal with this section)—

That whenever a State or Territory, in any section of which a contagious or infectious disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation, fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country.

The power which was expressly reserved to the States, that power which is referred to in the reservation to the States of the right to levy duties or imposts necessary to execute their inspection laws, that power which is connected most intimately with police jurisdiction—the power to be used to preserve and protect the health of the citizens of the State—is expressly invaded by this section, which seeks to give to the President of the United States jurisdiction for the purposes of quarantine in the very heart of a State and within its circumscribed limits in a manner foreign to the nature, rights, duties, prerogatives, and limitations of the Presidential office.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. EATON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut will have ten minutes.

Mr. EATON. It certainly can not be expected, Mr. Chairman, that great questions of this character can be discussed in ten minutes. My remarks must necessarily be in the form of declaration rather than argument. Hence I declare that in my judgment this is the most mischievous bill that I have seen on the desks of members of this Congress—mischievous because it is in utter violation of the Constitution of the United States, mischievous because it takes from the States their power and their rights.

Why, sir, my State is a little one—small in territory, but valuable in its herds, as my friend from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] well knows. Perhaps no State in the Union has more valuable stock than the State of Connecticut; and we have for years past been doing our duty as a State to exterminate this disease. And I beg leave to say here that Connecticut does not desire the Federal administration to undertake to determine for her with regard to her rights in this cattle industry.

Mr. Chairman, this bill has a taking title. We all of us say we would be very glad and very happy to do anything that we can constitutionally to regulate this matter. Sir, I find myself with regard to this cattle question in the same difficulty that I found myself years ago with regard to a bill affecting the health of human beings. I did not believe that it was in the power of the Congress of the United States to determine what should be the police regulations with regard to the health of men, women, and children in the great State of New York. I did not believe that anybody to be appointed by Congress would have half the knowledge upon a matter of that kind that would be possessed by the people in the State of New York, who for a hundred or two hundred years had taken care of the health of that community. So I say, sir, that the title of this bill, before it is passed, ought to be changed. It should be declared to be a bill to abrogate and annul the Constitution of the United States and deprive the States of the rights which belong to them.

Why, sir, for one moment, and it can be for but a moment, look at the power this bill undertakes to give the President of the United States. Power to establish what some one calls a horse-doctor, and very well calls, too—to do what? Why, to declare the State of Connecticut in quarantine, and to send this horse-doctor or somebody else from here to Connecticut to tell our people what to do in regard to their safety and the health of their domestic animals.

Why, sir, this whole bill, although framed with the best intentions, is like many other things which are full of good intentions. It is a bad bill, a bill which ought to receive the attention of this House, a bill which strikes directly at the root of the rights of the State, a bill which undertakes to make the President of the United States the master of the people of this great confederation of States.

Sir, the State of Connecticut is sovereign, the State of Texas is sovereign, the State of Missouri is sovereign, in everything regarding the health of her people and the welfare and the property of her people. It is not within the power of Congress. Within the limit of the Constitution Congress cannot undertake to arrogate to itself this great power. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I can not characterize this bill in ten minutes any more than my friend from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] could in five in proper terms. But I ask gentlemen to examine it with care. This is one of the wedges which we have driven into the constitutional rights of the States. Beware of those wedges! They have been plenty in the past. Let us see to it there will be fewer of them in the future; for the safety of this great people rests on the sovereignty and the rights of the States. With those rights—I say rights, not assumed rights, but rights older than the Constitution, God-given rights—with those rights protected, cared for, and adhered to, this Government will go on until it will number hundreds of millions of people and hundreds of free and independent States. But, sir, it can not be done and will never be done if you undertake to take from the States their rights and give those rights to the confederated government.

Mr. Chairman, I notice you have hold of the gavel, and ten minutes more would do me no good so far as the discussion of this great question is concerned. It would require hours for its intelligible discussion, and therefore all I care to say further is to tell my associates on this floor, on this side and on the other side of the House—for in this particular we are all as one man; there are no Democrats and no Republicans so far as this bill is concerned—that we as the Representatives of a free and intelligent and sovereign people can not go for this bill, whether we be Republicans or Democrats. [Applause.]

Mr. BEACH. I do not propose to discuss this bill myself at this stage of the argument. I will yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my hearty support of this bill. In the last Congress precisely this measure I think was adopted, with the exception perhaps of the clause relating to the quarantining of a State in the event it failed to obey the authority vested in and exercised by the Commissioner of Agriculture in attempting to control this pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases in any State.

I think we have passed the point where the United States either as a government or as a nation can attempt to segregate itself from the rest of the world. And it is an actual fact that by far the greater portion of our exports comes from the farms—consisting of agricultural products. It is also a fact that each year this country will more and more feed the nations upon the other continent; and also, that of our exports this beef or meat product will be a great and increasing factor.

But, Mr. Chairman, in this pleuro-pneumonia you have a disease which is threatening the very existence of the cattle industry, a disease which is proven to be incurable. It is known that you can not prevent it. When it gets into a herd all you can do is to kill the diseased animals. And it seems to me that when such a disease places in jeopardy one of the very greatest industries of our whole people we certainly have the constitutional power somewhere in this Government, perhaps on the general ground of the protection of the public interests and the rights of property, to create such executive machinery and pass such legislative enactment as may prove effective in controlling or suppressing that disease; and yet here to-day on this floor we are met with the old, old doctrine of State sovereignty and cry of State rights!

My esteemed friend from Texas—and I wish to say that this question is one of the few questions springing from different material interests over which Kansas and Texas meet in conflict—my esteemed friend from Texas General REAGAN stated the proposition substantially that under the clause of the Constitution with regard to regulating commerce you might go to the State line and inspect cattle, and perhaps that at the State line if you find a diseased animal you might kill it; that the General Government would perhaps have such power there, but that it would not have the power to go into the territory of a State. And he denies that the power to do this can fairly be derived from any other clause of the Constitution. Now, I would like to know just how wide a State line really is. It is not as wide as this strip of paper in my hand is thick. Here is a cow, let us suppose, standing over such a line, with her tail and body in Kansas, say, while her neck, head, and horns are sticking over into Missouri. [Laughter.] I suppose that under the Democratic construction of the State-rights doctrine you might possibly find a point the hundred-thousandth part of an inch wide just above the State line into which you might constitutionally put a knife and kill that part of the cow. But you would have no right to kill either part of the cow which was sticking over. [Renewed laughter.] I do not think, however, that you could legally under that constitutional doctrine—which, be it remembered, I do not at all concede—that you could legally seize the rest of the cow; and it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that Democratic gentlemen are making a very fine point when they undertake to say that while the whole animal industry of the nation may be annihilated by this contagious disease this Government has neither the constitutional power, nor if it possesses it shall undertake to exercise its constitutional power, to go anywhere and protect this interest and save this industry except upon an imaginary line between two States. That is your Democratic State-rights doctrine! Yet when you come to vote levees for the Mississippi River, not for deepening the channel, but for improving the private property of private citizens on the banks, your theory does not count for much. When you come to many other things equally questionable which are legislated upon by Congress, I find that this extraordinary logic does not prevail with you gentlemen. But when the simple boon is asked of governmental action in doing the little which may be done toward preserving the vast herds of the country against the ravages of contagious diseases and toward thus protecting this great agricultural interest, then the Democratic gentlemen from Texas and Connecticut set up the bar of State sovereignty!

But, sir, are you ready and is the Democratic party willing to let whole herds of cattle in their agricultural States be destroyed and be mashed into "smithereens" before you will pass an act giving a Department of this Government any possible power which it can wield to prevent it, or to do any conceivable thing to stop it? That is what this issue amounts to. Is not that a nice position for the Democratic party to take as the "friend of the farmer?"

This bill does not do much, not as much as I would like to see done, in this direction. It comes far short of the effectiveness I would like to see assured. But one thing is certain, that the cattle in the far Western as well as in the Southern States are not beyond the reach of pleuro-pneumonia. Why? Because we of the West are improving our cattle, are getting better animals and breeding up our stock, purchasing thoroughbreds wherever we can and taking them West. We are buying them in Chicago, we buy them in Saint Louis and in New York, or wherever else we can get them. And so are men in the South. Suppose that in this way this disease is introduced, say at Galveston; suppose it obtains a foothold in a Texas herd; your herds will be destroyed, our Kansas and Colorado herds will be infected and destroyed, and it will be but a short time before the disease will spread all over this continent.

Now you may say that it is the duty of the State governments to stop it. Very well. I am with you in that, provided each State will perform its duty. But suppose they do not stop it. Will there be no remedy? Must all cattle be permitted to die? Is the General Government utterly without power? Must the old idea of State rights stand between the capital invested in these cattle, between that form of wealth, which constitutes a great factor in the agricultural prosperity of this nation and destruction? I do not so believe. The Republican party passed this bill, gentlemen, with the exception which I have mentioned. We really enacted its substance in the agricultural bill also. I think we are ready, as Republicans, to pass it again. The great mass of the Republican party is ready to stand between the agricultural interests of this nation and any disease that threatens a serious injury to it, and which can be prevented and controlled by the best efforts of the Government and all needed money.

Now, I venture the assertion that the great opposing forces here are the Texas cattle interest and the doctrine of State rights on the one hand, and on the other a broad and vigorous view of the power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution to pass such laws and to execute them with such precision as will prevent these diseases, disasters, and finally the destruction of these animals—Government action which shall seek to control the disease and seek to build up one of the very great industries of this nation. There are the two issues: Texas cattle and State rights on the one hand, and on the other a broad view of the constitutional power to protect our people and their property against disease by the arm of the General Government. That State-rights doctrine is not a Republican tenet; and I trust that the full power of the nation will be exerted in behalf of the agricultural interest by the passage of even a better bill than this.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, in writing, was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed joint resolutions of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 127) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to detail from that Department two clerks to act as assistant clerks to certain House committees;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 113) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the Military Academy at West Point Antonio Barrios, of Guatemala, and José Victor Zavala, of Nicaragua; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 117) to correct an error in the enrollment of an act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other years, approved March 3, 1883.

DISEASES AMONG ANIMALS, ETC.

Mr. BEACH. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW].

Mr. MULDROW. The practical question here, it seems to me, is this: Is it desirable to eradicate this dreadful plague which exists in some of the States of this Union known as pleuro-pneumonia? When we consider the fact that England has been forced to expend about $500,000,000 to exterminate this disease within her own borders and within the borders of her dependencies, we may well consider that it may ultimately become, if it is not now, a question of vast importance to the stock-growing men of this country. There is a very deep interest felt in this matter among stock-raisers now in this land. Their sentiments were voiced but a short time ago in a convention which was held in Chicago, the largest and most important and most intelligent ever held on this subject on this continent. We ascertain also through the leading stock journals of this country that they are determined to press this matter upon the attention of Congress until their wishes in it have been fulfilled.

The leading stock paper in the West, the Breeders' Gazette, tells us that the cattle-growing interests will be satisfied with no child's play in this matter.

Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested here that this is a matter of police regulation which ought to be controlled and the remedies applied by the different States of this Union. We are informed by the best informed men of the country on this subject that that has already been attempted, and that it is a signal failure up to this time.

Massachusetts attempted it once, and may have succeeded. New Jersey has attempted it, and she has not succeeded. New York has not succeeded. Pennsylvania has failed, and it is said that more than one thousand cattle in the State of Maryland to-day are infected with this plague.

The Supreme Court, in the case of Railroad Company vs. Husen, construing the act of the State of Missouri to prevent the importation of Texas cattle within the borders of that State, decided that the police law of a State in this regard could not go to the extent of the exclusion of all the cattle of a particular State of this country. If the States have not that power, then how is it possible to protect one State from the cattle of another infected with this disease? The Supreme Court in that case gave the solution that it came within the power of Congress under that provision of the Constitution which provides for the regulation of commerce between the States.

The States under that decision are powerless in this matter. They can adopt no effective means; they can apply no effective remedy. Are we then to sit here and let this plague extend all over this land instead of taking it in hand now and exterminating it by the expenditure of a few thousand dollars, whereas, if we neglect it, in a few years we may have to extirpate it by the expenditure of millions? It seems to me that that is not wise.

I do object to some of the particular features of this bill, one of which is that the Federal Government can declare in quarantine every particular district of a State. I can not conceive that the power of Congress goes that far. But we have certainly the power to say what animals infected by this disease shall not be carried from one State of this Union to another. That being the case, and the States being powerless in the premises, I think it is the bounden duty of this Congress to enact some measure by which the States in the great West and South can be protected from the ravages of this plague.

Every year cattle are now being transported from the North to the southern region of the country. In the West it is a prominent matter of trade and merchandise. The cattle of the country are carried from the West to the East, and other cattle are carried from the East to the West. And it is impossible from the nature of the disease to prevent its spread unless some extreme measures are adopted with reference to it.

Ordinarily I am opposed to legislation by Congress in aid of States. I think States ordinarily should be allowed to control their own quarantine and police regulations and their own commerce. But here is an extreme case. It is shown by the testimony of surgeons that this disease lingers in the animal sometimes for months before it becomes fatal, and the disease may be carried from one State of the Union to another unless it is crushed out by the plan of killing the diseased animal and paying the citizen the value of the property. If this is not done diseased animals will be carried from one State to another, and the cattle of the whole country may be infected.

Now, I think the bill is defective in not providing the machinery by which the condemnation shall be made of this private property. I do not think the United States can condemn property without a proper machinery, and the bill should furnish that, instead of leaving it to the Commissioner of Agriculture.

With these objections to this bill I am, in the main, in favor of it. I may state, however, another objectionable feature of it, which is that it leaves with the Commissioner of Agriculture the power to determine what force shall be necessary to carry into effect its provisions. I do not believe it wise to vest any such great power in the hands of one officer of the Government. The number of employés he is authorized to employ should be designated in the bill. It should be ascertained in the beginning how many would probably be necessary, and then it should be stated in the bill what force the Commissioner is authorized to employ.

In conclusion, while I am generally in favor of the objects of the bill, I propose, if I can get the floor at the proper time, to move to recommit it to the Committee on Agriculture, with a view to have it properly amended and perfected in the points which I have indicated.

Mr. BEACH. I now yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] fifteen minutes of my time.

Mr. PETERS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] for his courtesy in giving me fifteen minutes in which to make a few remarks upon this bill, which I regard as a most important measure of legislation.

The question of the meat demand and supply of the world is one of the most interesting questions that can be studied. The more attention that is given to it the more interest will be felt in all legislation that may affect it. In other words, this is a bill that appeals not only to the American pocket, but it also appeals to the American stomach. It is a bill that has not only to do with the progress and prosperity of the country, but it has also to do with the breakfast-table of the American people.

It is a notable fact that wherever a nation increases in civilization and in intelligence just in the same ratio it increases in the consumption of meat. The United States to-day is the greatest meat-consuming country in the world; and I argue from that, and with great plausibility, that the United States is the most intelligent nation of the world.

The country that can produce a supply of meat for its own people, that can distribute that meat supply to its own laboring classes, and at the same time produce a supply for exportation to those countries which do not produce a sufficient supply for themselves, is a country that is prosperous, and its prosperity should be carefully guarded and protected by legislation.

The great competitors of the United States to-day in producing the meat supply for the world are Australia and South America. There are but three provinces of Europe that produce more meat than they consume, and those are Austria, Holland, and Denmark, and they produce but a small amount in excess of their consumption. All the remainder of Europe depends upon the importation of meat for its supply. The consumption of beef in England has been constantly upon the increase ever since the importation of meat from the United States began.

I have said that our principal competitors are Australia and South America. Yet we have a great advantage over those countries, for the reason that in order to reach the markets of Liverpool and Havre they must transport their meat across the equator and over the tropical line, while we can send our meats to those markets by the more northern and cooler routes.

What the United States must seek to accomplish by its legislation is to preserve and increase the great advantage which it has over the other meat producing countries of the world. If we fail to keep our meat pure, we place in the hands of our competitors an advantage to which they are not entitled by reason of location. If pleuro-pneumonia affects the meat supply of the United States it also affects the reputation of American meats in the markets of Europe. Whatever will keep high the standard of the reputation of American meat is a proper and just subject of legislation, and such legislation is in the interest of the people and all the people of the United States.

I wish to call attention to two features of this bill. I do not support it simply because it seeks to stamp out pleuro-pneumonia, but also because it seeks to stamp out that other disease which has been felt so fearfully in Kansas, the Texas fever. I am surprised that the gentleman from Texas should oppose this bill. I believe it is a bill that is in the interest of the great "cattle-drive" from the State of Texas.

The cattle-drive from the State of Texas is an interest that should not be underestimated. I need give only the figures for the last three years. In 1881 the amount of cattle that were transported from Texas into the Territories and the States north of it was 250,000 head; in 1882 it was 250,000 head; and in 1883 it was 275,000 head.

Now Kansas, as a State, does not object to the transportation of these cattle across our borders if they are healthy. She desires and does encourage the transportation of healthy cattle. But she does object, and strenuously objects, to the transportation of cattle that have become diseased by the carelessness of the drivers of those cattle into our own borders. I assert, and beyond the fear of successful contradiction, that the Texas fever is produced by the inordinate driving of cattle in times when they should not be driven.

I say therefore that it is in the interest of the cattle-drive from the State of Texas that this bill should pass, and that a flood of light should be thrown upon this question of the Texas fever. For these reasons I feel an interest in this bill.

We are importing from the eastern part of the United States thoroughbreds in order to let them mingle their blood with the long-horns of the Western States and Territories. The grazing plains of Kansas, Indian Territory, Texas, New Mexico, and Colorado can furnish a meat supply for the world. But if we are to meet pleuro-pneumonia from the East and Texas fever from the West, the result will be that our thoroughbred cattle will die of diseased stomachs or the Texas fever and our Texas long-horns will die of diseased lungs.

The fact is, as every man knows who has had experience in this matter, that where a herd of cattle has been driven too hard in coming from Texas it thereby incurs the disease known as Texas fever, and a thoroughbred can not even look a Texas steer of that kind in the face without at once becoming sick at the stomach. [Laughter.]

Now, we want to cut off this pleuro-pneumonia from the East and stamp it out, and at the same time we want to cut off and stamp out the Texas fever which is prevalent among the long-horns of the West.

And the bill includes not only those two diseases, but also all other diseases, and thereby will enable us successfully to compete in the markets of the world with those countries that are our formidable competitors.

I desire now to call attention to one clause of the report made by the committee on this bill:

> A striking example of the necessity of such work is seen in the recent investigations of Texas cattle-fever. This disease has been advancing and infecting new territory for a century, and until the last year or two we knew nothing about it, and our best informed veterinarians and stockmen did not suppose that it was found in one-fifth of the territory which has actually been overrun. These were points which it was necessary to understand before either legislative bodies or individuals could adopt intelligent measures for preventing the annual losses which have been most discouraging to the cattle industry in large sections of the country. And with every disease there are equally important points still to be investigated.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BEACH. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LAWRENCE].

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I am not a member of the Committee on Agriculture, which reported this bill, but I desire to thank that committee for the very careful, methodical manner in which they have treated this subject. Having been myself before that committee, I happen to know that they have given it much time and thought. I was present, sir, when an intelligent delegation from Chicago and the Western country presented themselves to that committee, and in listening to the discussion on the subject before the committee I learned much that I had not known before. I rise now to say, after having given the subject some thought, that I am in favor of this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard the remark made here frankly and publicly—one gentleman at least made such a remark in my hearing—that he did not believe there was any pleuro-pneumonia in the United States. I heard a very intelligent gentleman say yesterday in the course of this debate that pleuro-pneumonia is not known in the United States, that its existence is imaginary. Mr. Chairman, there is not an intelligent man in this House who, if he will read the testimony of veterinary surgeons before the committee, will not admit that this disease does exist in our country, and has been known as a specific, well-defined affection of the lungs.

I recollect very well, Mr. Chairman, that when I was a member of the senate of Pennsylvania the government of that State was called upon to deal with this subject; and I hold in my hand the act of Assembly which was passed by our Legislature to assist in "stamping out" the disease. At that time there were many men in the senate of Pennsylvania and in the lower house of our Legislature who ridiculed publicly the idea that pleuro-pneumonia existed in Pennsylvania. Yet in less than a month from that time it had been found necessary to kill within our State at least ninety animals infected with the disease. We appointed a commission on the subject. The governor was invested with plenary power. Officers of the State were sent to the counties of Chester, Delaware, and the city of Philadelphia, and the disease was found to exist there at that time—not in large herds but in small herds within and in the neighborhood of those eastern counties. By active measures we succeeded in eradicating the disease for the time—for the time merely.

But, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who oppose this bill assert confidently that the General Government has nothing to do with this question; that its regulation belongs exclusively to the States. Now let me tell you our experience in the State of Pennsylvania. We have found it utterly impossible to eradicate this disease ourselves. Let me give you an illustration. A gentleman in New Jersey owned an Alderney cow and heifer slightly affected with this disease. He sold them to a gentleman residing in Pennsylvania, who did not know that they were thus affected. He took them into the State of Pennsylvania, and in less than one week from that time his whole herd was affected, and they had to be killed at once. Gentlemen must remember that this disease is like the leprosy, you can not cure it; to eradicate it you must kill the animal affected.

Gentlemen object to the General Government "invading" a State to interfere with disease of this kind. Why, sir, when the yellow fever breaks out in the South we do not hesitate to establish a quarantine. When it is necessary to save the lives of their citizens gentlemen in the South do not hesitate to call upon us in the North to aid them, and we send not only physicians but money to their assistance. Now, suppose this cattle disease breaks out on the plains of Texas, the State of my friend who has to-day made so eloquent a speech. Suppose it breaks out in the great herds of that State or on the vast plains of the West. How are you going to stop it? Do not gentlemen know that when this pleuro-pneumonia takes hold of those herds it may go from the Rio Grande away up North to the Canada line, and you can not stop it?

Gentlemen may say that there is no danger. That is not the fact. Did not the gentleman from New York tell you in the few minutes he occupied the floor that England had spent a hundred million dollars to "eradicate" this disease? Look at the sums which Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and other States have spent in this direction. No intelligent man who will examine the subject can fail to see that this work must be done by the National Government, aided by States. The question has been fully discussed before the committee and the necessity of legislation by Congress clearly shown and proven.

But the States could never regulate it. They did not have the power. They could do it within their own limits, but they could not prevent the transportation of diseased cattle within their limits from other States. There must, of course, be acquiescence on the part of the General Government with the States in order to reach and destroy the disease effectually.

Now, the Commissioner of Agriculture, armed with the authority given to him by this bill, will ask the several States to co-operate with him, and no doubt the authorities of the State will promptly co-operate with him to destroy the disease if it exists in that State. Do you suppose if this disease existed on the great plains of Texas the governor of that State would hesitate for a single instant to co-operate with the Commissioner of Agriculture in its suppression in the State? Do you suppose that the governor of any State would refuse to co-operate to eradicate and extirpate this dreadful disease? Of course the law must be within the provisions of the Constitution, but on a question of common peril, on a question so vast as this, it is the duty and interest of the General Government to aid in preserving the great herds of cattle which roam all over the Western country.

Now, Mr. Chairman, have gentlemen thought how important this matter is to the health of the people, as well as how important it is for the success and prosperity of the great industry of stock-raising in the United States? Do you consider how necessary it is to the farming and agricultural interests that nothing should tend to the destruction of the great herds of cattle? I am a farmer. I worked on a farm for many years, and I believe I know something about what are the wants and needs of the farming interest. Let me tell you that the farming interest of this country asks for less legislation than any other class of men. Their industry is the basis of all other employments. You go to the earth for all you want almost. You get your food and your raiment from the earth. The boots and shoes you wear are made out of the hides of these steers which are raised upon the plains of the West. I say, then, it is important for all these reasons, and especially important to the people generally, that this bill should pass. It is not only in behalf of the interests of my own State but in behalf of the interests of all the States, because if this disease is not stamped out where it now exists it may become common throughout the country. You will see then if these herds of cattle are destroyed what havoc it will make in our supply of beef—an article used in this country in greater quantities than in any country in the world.

Look, too, what the enormous loss of capital will be if it should get into the herds of thoroughbred cattle, the Ayrshires, the Jerseys, the Durhams, and the other valuable herds of cattle, some of them worth from one to five thousand dollars each. If it should break out among them, who can calculate what the loss will be?

I believe this to be one of the most important questions before Congress, and one of the most important which could be brought before Congress at any session. I trust those upon this floor who represent agricultural interests will stand up to the support of this measure and see to it that it passes, so we may at least try what can be done in this way to eradicate this disease of pleuro-pneumonia. Let the Commissioner of Agriculture at least have a trial of the proposed method. He himself said, a few years ago, that he believed there was no pleuro-pneumonia in the country. He so thought at the time, but he is now of a very different opinion, for when he came to examine the subject in all its details, and got the figures, and heard the testimony, the conclusion was forced upon him that this disease did exist, not only in one State, but in many portions of the country. Like an honest man he said precisely what he found to be true, and he is earnestly in favor of Congress adopting such means as will extirpate the disease. He is anxious to get the power and the means and to employ the machinery necessary for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I thank the gentleman from New York for his courtesy in yielding to me.

Mr. BEACH. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. I hope the Chair will notify me after I have spoken five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be glad to do so.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have given the pending measure such attention as I could afford since it was taken up for consideration in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and for some years I have had occasion to look generally into the subject. I have no hesitation in saying I am very heartily in favor of this bill. It may be that I am not a great constitutional lawyer. I used to practice the profession of the law in the State of Illinois, and perhaps might be considered a fair nisi prius lawyer. I find no constitutional stumbling-block in my way in voting for this proposition, and as to the great constitutional objection of which we have heard so much in this debate, I do not wish to talk about it at any great length. Suffice it to say, Mr. Chairman, that in my judgment a liberal construction of the Constitution should always be given where a great public good is to be subserved or where a great public evil is to be averted. Of course, in questions arising as to the protection of life, liberty, and property of the individual, we are to pursue a stricter construction of the Constitution.

Now, sir, I understand the fact to be we have very great interests involved in the raising of cattle which are deeply concerned in the protection of these interests from the spread of the disease of pleuro-pneumonia. As to animal industry in my State as well as in other States there has been experienced great trouble in reference to the exportation of beef cattle. It is not necessary for me to call attention in detail to the facts which have been presented in reference to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia. It can not be doubted that the disease does exist and it is equally undoubted that wherever it does exist it should be stamped out by the slaughter of all animals infected, and can be gotten rid of in no other way.

I grant you that Massachusetts stamped it out. I suppose New York would stamp it out. If we had it in Illinois I am satisfied we would stamp it out there. But suppose twenty States stamp it out and one does not, are all the balance of the States to be placed at the mercy of the one contrary State that will not take action in the matter? Are fifty millions of people to be placed within the power and at the mercy of three millions, of one million, or two hundred and fifty thousand people who insist upon non-action on the part of their States respectively? I take it not. I have not, I repeat, any hesitation on that subject when such a state of facts is presented. I have no hesitancy in avowing my belief that we have power under a liberal construction of the Constitution to take hold of the disease and stamp it out wherever we find it. My constituents, and the people generally of the West and, as I understand it, all over the country, want this protection extended to them by Congress. I think we have the power and the money. If it costs money let it be expended, it will be money well spent.

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague, Mr. ROWELL.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

A bill (S. 269) for the relief of M. P. Jones;

A bill (S. 402) for the completion of the Capitol terraces and stairways connected therewith; and

A bill (S. 196) for the relief of the devisees of the late Daniel Carroll.

DISEASES OF ANIMALS, ETC.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that objection to this bill should be made upon this floor from the State of Texas. We are told that her cattle industries represent one-seventh of the cattle industries of the United States. They might have said that that industry has less power to protect itself than the same industry in almost any other section of the country. I repeat, sir, that the cattle industries of Texas are less protected against the inroads of disease than in almost any other section of the country, because of the fact that herds of cattle roam over her plains and can not be confined in pastures as they are in other sections of the country.

If once this disease should find a foothold among the great herds of Texas they would soon cease to represent one-seventh of the cattle of this country. I undertake to say that there is no possibility of eradicating a disease of this kind except by national authority. We in Illinois know something about it. We tried once to protect ourselves against the inroads of the disease by legislative authority. After thousands of our cattle had died; after hundreds of our wealthy citizens had been bankrupted by the importation of Texas cattle and by the spread of Texas cattle fever in our State, we passed a law to protect ourselves. We made it a penal offense to import these cattle during the summer, when the disease would be communicated. We made the railroads responsible in civil damages for bringing them there. We made parties that imported them responsible in civil damages for having brought them and spread the disease. And yet the courts held that we had not the authority to make any such law. The United States courts and the State courts held that we were trenching upon the authority of the United States. So that when a State undertakes to make a law to protect itself the courts come in and tell them that is the business of the United States. When the United States attempts to pass a law and protect the people against the inroads of disease, some sensitive gentleman says you are trenching upon the rights of the States. And so between the two we fail and must submit to the destruction of our industries. Now it seems to me that an industry so large as this ought to be protected by sufficient authority.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BEACH. I now yield five minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. NUTTING].

Mr. NUTTING. Mr. Chairman, I recognize in the introduction of this bill a very important measure. It is an important measure because it affects one of the greatest industries of this country.

We have heard very much, Mr. Chairman, upon this floor in the discussion of this bill in regard to the large herds of cattle which are raised upon the plains of our western country. While that portion of the industries of our country is very large indeed and very important, still when you take into consideration the number of cattle scattered over the United States outside of that, in the States of the East, South, and in some of the Western States, and in the Northwest, the number of cattle is doubtless very large, greater in the aggregate than the number represented by the herders' interest of the great West.

There is one thing which has come to my notice in the investigation of this bill, in the little time I have had to think about it and read about it, and that is in regard to the importation of cattle into foreign countries. I find, for instance, that when cattle were imported into England last year, and even for the last two years, the people who imported those cattle into England were obliged to have them killed within a very short time after they reached the docks, and upon the docks of England. And why? Simply because of the fear of disease among those cattle, caused by rumors of disease among American cattle. Now what does that mean? It simply means, for instance, as regards the hundred thousand head of beef-cattle which have been imported into England within the past year, that in that one branch of industry those who have imported the cattle have been injured to the extent of $1,000,000, for it is estimated that each head of cattle slaughtered in this compulsory manner damaged the owner to the extent of $10.

When one man in our country, or combination of men, is injured in this way we are all injured. If in one instance like this we are injured to the extent of a million of dollars, then I take it the Representatives of the people, when we come here and find it is necessary to pass a law to protect our people in that regard, should not hesitate because of the considerable appropriation that is asked for in this bill. The great State of New York has 1,500,000 milch cows. It is a great farming and dairy community. In addition to this, we have in this great State more than 1,000,000 neat cattle. When I say, Mr. Speaker, that New York, a part of which I have the honor to represent, has important interests to protect in this regard, it is not the value of these milch cows alone and the additional neat cattle that we are sensitive about, but it is the product of this great industry as well. The State of New York stands first in the great column of States having dairy interests.

In the fiscal year 1883, ending June 30, last, this great nation sent out of this country for foreign consumption, for which was received gold and good money to make the farmer and cattle-raiser and the country at large richer thereby—horned cattle, $8,341,431; fresh beef, $8,342,131; beef salted and canned, $3,742,282; butter, $2,290,665; cheese, $11,134,526; condensed milk, $180,505. The total amount thus received from foreign nations was the great sum, then, of $34,031,540.

Is this, then, an industry to be overlooked and treated lightly in our national council? "No" is the answer which will come up from one end to the other of our great land. A government is formed to protect. To protect what? First, the people; and, next, the material interests of the people.

We have not always protected our people, and shame to us for it; but we have thus far protected our people's material interests, and I hope and believe we shall always do this.

I have heard the objection made to this bill that it creates another bureau. That is not true at all. It does not create a new bureau; but it simply creates new powers in a bureau that already exists. That is all. That is the sum and substance of it.

I find, Mr. Chairman, that the expense which is incurred by other nations, of which I shall speak, for the promotion of their agricultural interests is very much more than the expense which we incur in America in that regard. For the last fiscal year, for instance, the expense of the Agricultural Department of the United Stutes was less than half a million dollars. England expends very much more than that; yes, five times that amount each year. And so each of several countries to which I might refer had I the time, especially the countries that are interested in the raising of cattle and the dairy industry, expend much more than is expended on this interest by the Government of the United States. And I say the people of the country whom we represent in this House will be faithfully represented when we pass this bill.

I hear objection made to the bill on another ground. The principle of State rights comes in here; the constitutional question, which is easily raised but not so easily answered perhaps—the question as to whether or not we can pass a law regulating material interests affecting the several States. When any material interest is so broad and so important as to require united and unified action to protect the interests of the whole people, then the Constitution is broad enough and comprehensive enough in its letter and spirit to permit necessary legislation upon the subject.

My opinion upon that question, given on the little examination which I have given it, is this: When it comes to legislation under the Constitution for the guidance of the people of a State alone and by itself, then perhaps we might be troubled with a difficulty; but I take it there is no difficulty in our legislating upon a question of interstate commerce when the subject of the legislation affects the whole people, as, for instance, where we pass from one State to another. That has been settled by a court of high judicial character, and I could, if I had the time, produce the authority.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BEACH. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. In my judgment no more important bill will be urged upon the consideration of this House this session than the one that is now demanding our attention. And representing, as I have the honor to represent in part, one of the great stock-growing States of this Union, I desire on the part of my constituency to urge, not as a partisan, not as a Representative of a peculiar section of the country, but as a Representative of a great nation, desiring the greatest good to the greatest number, the importance of this bill.

That this disease exists, that contagious diseases have existed, is in this argument admitted, and the necessity of legislation is conceded by all. Of course we may differ concerning the provisions of the bill. But legislation is the creature of growth. This bill may not be perfect in all its provisions. No bill is likely to be perfected at this session that will in every emergency and under all circumstances furnish relief and provide for every case. But it is necessary that we should commence, that we should make a beginning, that from experience and investigation we can determine what can be done, what may be accomplished for extirpating these diseases and for the purpose of protecting the great stock-growing interests of the country.

We have legislation upon almost every other subject. We have appropriations made for almost every other industry; and now when the stockmen of the country ask protection at the hands of this House, when they come here and demand that something shall be done for them and in their name, to protect them against infectious and contagious diseases and to secure immunity for millions invested in their business, the constitutional question is raised. It is said that we have not the power under the Constitution of the country to protect the property of these men against infectious and contagious diseases.

Mr. Chairman, it is not the first time that the constitutional question has been raised in debate. And history informs us that in the past some of these gentlemen have been mistaken concerning the constitutional powers of this Government, and I hope that this debate will satisfy them that they are mistaken now. That Congress has the power to extend its aid, that we the Representatives of this nation have a right to enact this legislation, it seems to me, can not be questioned. In fact, in the last session of Congress the power of this legislative body to legislate upon this subject was recognized and exercised. We find an appropriation made giving to the Secretary of the Treasury $50,000 for the purpose of carrying into effect such legislation as we are now discussing and considering; for the purpose of creating quarantine if necessary, and for the purpose of establishing posts where diseased cattle may be examined and cared for and communities protected from them when so afflicted.

Now, as has been suggested, if Congress has not this power, where does it exist? Can the State authorities exercise it? Is it delegated to them by the Constitution of this country or by the constitutions of the States? As has been suggested here in argument, where the States have attempted to exercise this power such exercise has been declared to be unconstitutional.

Gentlemen speaking in opposition to this bill ask if a "horse doctor" shall be permitted to place sections of this country in quarantine? In answer I would suggest that if this disease exists in Texas, for instance, there must be some power somewhere to protect other sections and other States from being contaminated with it. Texas can not do it; Kansas can not do it; Missouri can not do it; Iowa can not do it. If, then, the power is not lodged in Congress under the Constitution of the United States, where does it exist? If Kansas, Missouri, Iowa, Nebraska, or any other State should attempt by legislative enactment to restrict importation or exportation of cattle afflicted with the Texas fever or with pleuro-pneumonia, such acts would be declared unconstitutional.

Hence, these men, knowing what has been the decision of the courts, come to the law-making power of this nation and ask protection from us; they demand adequate legislation in order that this great industry may not be stricken down and paralyzed. They ask that legislation shall be enacted which shall take care of these cattle when so afflicted, and that communities and States may be protected from their infectious and contagious effect. And by the provisions of this bill the fact must first be ascertained; then the Government may act.

This bill is not limited in its action to pleuro-pneumonia. It provides for protection against all infectious and contagious diseases of cattle. That other diseases exist is well known to us all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I hope I can receive the attention of this committee while I present a few facts worthy of consideration bearing on this great question. I regard this as the most important bill that we have been called upon to consider during this session of Congress or during the last Congress.

A thousand millions of property is involved in the bill upon which we are now called to act. There are 40,000,000 cattle in this Republic, one beef creature to every man, woman, and child in the United States. We should consider this question, not as partisans, and not as politicians, but as statesmen, and look at it as affecting public interests, the public wealth, and the public health of this great nation.

In this country $400,000 have been appropriated for the benefit of agriculture. In France, with a population of 37,000,000 of people, there has been appropriated annually seven millions of dollars to advance agricultural interests.

When the cattle-plague broke out in Massachusetts some years ago that State lost one-half of the value of that property in her borders, and has hardly yet recovered her loss from that time to this. When we have the consideration of 40,000,000 of cattle, representing hundreds of millions of dollars, I say it is a great and supereminently important question, and should be considered with deliberation and in a spirit of absolute justice.

Permit me, gentlemen of the committee, to call your attention to a few facts which I think should be known to every member of this House. I have here a table which I will incorporate in my remarks; but I desire to call attention to the steady growth of our exportation of horned cattle.

In 1872 we exported $565,799 worth of horned cattle; in 1873, $695,957; in 1874, $1,150,857; in 1875, $1,103,085; in 1876, $1,110,763; in 1877, $1,593,000.80; 1878, $3,806,818; in 1879, $8,379,200; in 1880, $13,334,195, and in 1881, $14,304,162. It will thus be observed that our exports of horned cattle have increased from $565,799 in 1872 to $14,304,162 in 1881.

Look at the vast growth of this great industry. Look at the exports that have been made to Europe in the form of horned cattle. I have not called the attention of the committee to the amount of meat we have sent abroad in the form of salted provisions. I have alluded to this only to call your attention to the vast importance of the great question with which we have to deal.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. BELFORD. Certainly.

Mr. COX, of New York. If I have understood the drift of my friend's argumentation and statistics it is this, that our cattle trade has so increased, has become so aggrandized, as to be "supereminently important," to use the expression of my friend.

Mr. BELFORD. That is my exact language.

Mr. COX, of New York. And therefore it has so well taken care of itself under past conditions that it requires no further legislation!

Mr. BELFORD. I do not propose to go into any bout with the gentleman on the tariff question. [Great laughter.] I have simply called the attention of the committee to the vast growth of this industry and to the absolute necessity of passing some wise and judicious legislation for the protection of the cattle interests of this country.

I do not say we will do it by this bill, because unless it is amended I shall not vote for it. I propose to point out before I conclude my remarks what I conceive to be the substantial and inherent defects of this bill.

Gentlemen, do not defeat this bill on the narrow ground of State rights. I hope to God that when it comes to a matter of public health the question of State rights will be buried so deep beneath the bosom of the ocean that no diver ever can go down to bring it up.

Mr. Chairman, to show you and the House that I am not speaking from a Western standpoint, I desire to have read by the Clerk an extract from a most valuable document, prepared under the direction of the Treasury Department of the United States. It is called the "Report of the Treasury Cattle Commission on the lung-plague of cattle or contagious pleuro-pneumonia." I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph I have marked, and I hope members will give it attention.

The Clerk read as follows:

We have kept steadily in view the main object of our appointment, and have fully established the claim that the Western and Southern States, as well as the whole of New England, are free from this disease, and have set forth the conditions under which we believe that the cattle of these States could be shipped to Europe with a perfect guarantee of soundness as regards this plague. Finally, convinced that any permanent guarantee of continued immunity for our as yet uninfected States and our export cattle can only be secured by the extirpation of this disease from the continent, we have set forth those measures which in the light of history and science are the best calculated to secure its speedy and thorough extinction.

Mr. BELFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be observed from the report made by this commission appointed by the Treasury Department that none of this disease exists in the West or in the South. The statement is clearly, emphatically, and authoritatively made by the Treasury Commission that this disease does not exist either in the South or in the West. Where, then, does it exist? This commission further declares that it does not exist in New England. Then it must exist in New Jersey, in New York, in Rhode Island, and in Pennsylvania. Those are the States where this disease exists, if it exists at all. How did it come to this country? It came here in 1848, when it was landed on the shores of the city of Brooklyn. Beyond the borders of New York it has never yet extended one foot to the westward. I defy any man to point to the evidence of the fact that this disease exists in a single State west of the Alleghanies or west of the Mississippi River.

I desire to have it understood most distinctly that I will vote for any bill which will guarantee to the owners of cattle the broadest possible protection. I believe this cattle business is a part of the great commerce of our country; and, so believing, I think it is fully and clearly within the national authority.

One gentleman said to-day that he objected to this bill on account of its quarantine provision. Sir, there is nothing in that objection; and I will tell the House why. In the last Congress we enacted a provision which I ask the Clerk to read from the sundry civil appropriation act of August 7, 1882.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to co-operate with State and municipal authorities, and corporations and persons engaged in the transportation of neat cattle by land or water, in establishing regulations for the safe conveyance of such cattle from the interior to the seaboard and the shipment thereof, so that such cattle may not be exposed to the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague, and to prevent the spread of said disease, and to establish quarantine stations and provide proper shelter for neat cattle imported, at such ports as he may deem necessary, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. BELFORD. That was an enactment practically as broad in all its provisions as the one contained in this bill with reference to the establishment of a quarantine. It provides that a quarantine lasting three months shall be applied to foreign cattle as they land at our great ports. Whether that power is exercised by the President, or by the collector of customs, or by any supervisor is a matter of positive immateriality. But that is not my objection to this bill. I said yesterday I would vote for this bill, but after a careful consideration of its terms I will not vote for it unless it is radically amended and fundamentally reconstructed. Why? I propose to give a reason for the faith that is in me. I am not going to vote against this measure under the flimsy vesture of State rights. I believe this is a nation spelled, with a great N, held in the bosom of fifty millions of people, and I believe it is the duty of this great nation to protect the health of its people, whether they live in Connecticut or California. But what I object to in the bill is this: It authorizes some scientific crank [laughter], to be appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, to take charge of this whole subject and investigate the character and condition of the cattle to be shipped from one State to another. I say this is too great a power to be lodged in the hands of any one agent of this nation.

I say the only way to determine this question, when a man's cattle are charged with being infected with a dangerous disease, is to allow the owner conjointly with the Government agent to examine and a jury to pass on that question and be governed by the result. This bill provides no such remedy. It does not declare that the owner of a herd shall have any right whatever in determining the character of the disease, whether it is dangerous or not. I may have consumption, or be threatened with consumption, and are you going to pass a bill here saying to a Government agent that you find that the member from Colorado is weak in the lungs and shall not go from Washington to Denver? [Laughter.] And are you going to rest my right exclusively on his judgment, without allowing me to call in any competent authority to determine that fact? That is the fault, the fatal fault, of this bill, and unless it is amended, in my judgment, anxious and sincere as I am in my desire to protect this great interest, which involves a thousand million dollars, I shall vote to recommit this bill to the committee, with a view that it may be remodeled, refashioned, reframed, and purified and exalted to meet the judgment of the great body of the American people. [Laughter and applause.]

I now yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER].

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, I entirely sympathize with some of the purposes which are sought to be secured by this bill. So far as those purposes are within the constitutional power of the country I am not only willing but desirous that power shall be exercised to the end which this bill seeks. But, sir, our Government is a system of self-government, of local self-government. There is nothing so significant in our Constitution, there is nothing so fundamental or organic in our system of government, as that which makes it in every fiber of its construction from top to bottom a system for enabling, for guaranteeing, for securing self-government within the States and by the people of this Union. Our Constitution is to be construed and administered to this end forever. If it departs from its purpose it will depart from the great purpose for which it was founded, and it will cease forever to accomplish the end for which it was made.

Now, sir, what does this bill do? In one section of the bill it provides for an appointee of the executive department of the Government to go over this land, upon the farm, into the barnyard, everywhere, make inventory, appraise—ah! it makes it his duty to inventory, appraise—and report on the condition, upon the value, upon all of this vast property, from the Gulf to the Canadas and from ocean to ocean.

Some idea has been given of the magnitude of this work by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] who has preceded me. But, sir, consider now some of the magnitude of that work. The work of your last census is nothing compared to this work. By whom is it to be done? By a branch of the executive department of this Government. By what instruments and agents is he to do it? The language of the bill is that he is authorized to employ a sufficient force for this purpose. Now, what force will be sufficient? Why, as has been said, $250,000 will not be ten dollars apiece for the force that would be required to enter on this work. Why is it necessary that this work should be done? Are not the States of this Union intelligent on this subject? Have they not administered and taken care of this great industry? It has been my fortune to see something of the condition of domestic animals in other countries as well as in this throughout the different States of the Union, and I undertake to say that this country can learn nothing from England or any other nation on the subject of domestic animals. Under the Constitution this, like all other domestic industries, is equally cared for by the States and the people of the States themselves. They compete together each to see which has most excellence in its system. While pursuing that course, if one State makes an advance it is instantly adopted in the other States. When one makes a mistake it is avoided by every other State in the Union.

No State makes a mistake but it is avoided by the other States in this Union. Our system of Government is so formed that so long as it has free play and so long as we do not attempt from a central source and power to interfere with the affairs and duties and the responsibilities of the people of the States themselves, it will carry this people forward and upward to as high a point as was ever before reached by human governments in the history of man. A most important and essential element of its progress is that it shall leave to the competition, to the experiment, if you will, to the trial of the States, each with the other, to say which shall do the best. What is there in our achievements as a people during the time that we have been a sovereign people that has not sprung from this very root?

I am not here, Mr. Chairman, to defend the doctrine of State rights merely. That is not the question at this time. This is no question of State rights. It is a question of State duties; it is a question of State responsibilities; and I am here to say in behalf of my State and her people that she is competent to discharge this duty herself, and is not willing to give the discharge of it, so far as this matter of inspection is concerned, and so far as anything is concerned outside of what comes under the terms commerce, external and internal, to any one else. She is not willing to part with her control over that question, because she believes she can do it better, that she understands it better, and intends to do it better than anybody else can do it for her.

Now, sir, in the second section of this bill it is provided that a board of officers shall be appointed, and for what purpose? They are to—

Report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals—

From the time they are born until the time they die, I suppose, throughout all the vicissitudes and all the conditions in which they may require care. Are the great States of this Union—empires in themselves, one of them of which we have heard this morning equal in area to five times the British empire—are the great States of this Union to delegate the power to an appointee of the Executive of this Government, with power to appoint a subordinate, who is to give them the information as to how they shall treat their domestic animals; or, in the words of the bill, "the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals?"

This transportation, in so far as it is a matter of interstate commerce, may come properly within the purview of the bill. But this does not limit it to interstate commerce. And then the bill goes on and provides that they shall also reports—

As to the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of this contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious diseases.

Now, what other contagious diseases? I happen to know from my own experience, for I have a pretty large farm for the East, and a good many cattle on which I bestow my care—I happen to know that there are a good many of these contagious diseases, and they are all perfectly understood by the people in the State. They are all managed in the State, and the knowledge of the people of one State is given to another, and their treatment is adopted if it be found good. The moment there is an improvement in the treatment, it is communicated from one State to the other, and no State is allowed to get ahead. There is not the slightest need to empower the executive department, with its appointees and subordinates, to spread this information among the people. There is nothing that this provision can do in behalf of the people on this subject that they are not all willing and able to do for themselves.

Then, sir, this Commissioner of Agriculture is to make rules for the extermination of these contagious diseases, and especially pleuro-pneumonia, and upon condition that the States in this Union so agree. But I will quote in this respect the language of the bill—

Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other infectious or contagious disease is declared to exist—

Then, and not until then, can they co-operate and be co-operated with in return by the General Government in the extirpation of that disease.

Why, has it come to this, Mr. Chairman, that these great empires are to be told they can not go forward in the extirpation of these diseases with the aid and countenance of the Federal Government unless they will adopt the methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the plans which he suggests and agree entirely to them? Now, sir, with all the respect that I have for this Commissioner of Agriculture, and I knew him many years ago when he was in Massachusetts, and had occasion to know him professionally, and have great respect for him as a man, I say that with all of that the State of New York is quite as competent, and there is not a State in this Union that is not quite as competent, to deal with this question as he and all the appointees that he can summon to his aid. I hope this bill will be recommitted to the committee with instructions to have it brought before us again in such shape as to secure the objects which may be legitimately secured by such a bill, a bill that shall be entirely within the constitutional power of this Government, that shall respect the relations of the States to the Government, and shall remember above all things that this Government was made for the purpose of securing and maintaining forever a republican form of government by giving the power of government to the States and within the States by the citizens of the States. [Applause.]

Mr. BELFORD. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I will simply use the two minutes which the courtesy of the gentleman from Colorado has assigned me to have read the resolution of the Legislature of New York bearing not on this bill but on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY,
Albany, January 8, 1884.

Whereas the subject of the existence in the United States of the contagious disease of cattle known as the lung-plague, or contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and the necessity and practicability of its being suppressed has, during several recent sessions of Congress, been presented for the consideration of both Houses without any effective action being taken, although earnest appeals have been made, not only by individual members, but by legislative bodies, by agricultural associations, and by representatives of the dairy and grazing interests in many of the States; and

Whereas it has been conclusively shown by the report of the commissioners appointed under the authority of Congress to consider the matter, and known as the Treasury Cattle Commission, that the disease in question is entirely of foreign origin, that its existence in any country threatens the supply of beef and of milk to the inhabitants, that the neglect to extirpate it in time has brought great calamity in some countries, while in others, in which proper and timely measures have been taken, it has been wholly driven out and kept out, and that, under the circumstances existing, the work can be effectually accomplished in the United States only by means of an organization unlimited by State lines, and such as Congress alone can authorize and establish, which shall exist for the purpose of harmonizing and unifying the action of the several States involved, and shall for that purpose be furnished with funds from the national Treasury, to be expended for an object which is national in its character and importance: Therefore,

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the Senators of this State in Congress be requested and the Representatives of this State be requested to use their best efforts to secure the enactment of a law to carry into effect the recommendations made by the Treasury Cattle Commission in its report transmitted to Congress in February, 1882, for the extinction of the lung-plague, and to provide means therefor, or to secure such other legislation as may speedily and effectually accomplish the result.

Mr. BELFORD. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN].

Mr. HEPBURN. There seems to be no division in the sentiment of this House with reference to the transcendent importance of this bill. We know how much of the wealth and what proportion of the industries of this country are invested in and devoted to agriculture. In the State that I in part represent more than a hundred millions of the capital of the State are invested in its flocks and herds. We know that these animals at any time are liable to great injury if not to destruction. This matter is one of such importance that year after year the General Assembly of that State has instructed its members in Congress to vote in favor of provisions similar to those in this bill, and the political parties of that State year after year have declared themselves to be in favor of suitable legislation in order that this pest may be stamped out. No one, I believe, on this floor is opposed to the results of the bill if they can be attained by methods that will not be harmful to their ideas of constitutional power. But certain opponents of this bill seem to be very sensitive lest the Constitution may be violated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call your attention to this fact, that in very many instances constitutional limitations from the very earliest days of this Government have been determined and interpreted in accordance with the supposed interests, political or otherwise, of the men announcing them. From the very earliest times your strict constructionists have been able to trample upon all of their own opinions whenever it became necessary to carry out some pet measure. Where can you find within the limits of the Constitution an authority for the purchase of foreign territory? And yet Mr. Jefferson, the father of all the strict constructionists politically, did not hesitate to put his hand into the Treasury of the United States and take therefrom $15,000,000 in order to buy foreign territory.

When the administration desired to make an attack upon the commerce of New England, who of the reigning party hesitated because of constitutional limitations to pass the embargo measures and the non-intercourse measures that destroyed the commerce of New England and for years tied their shipping rotting to their wharves prior to the war of 1812?

When you go a little further, sir, and it became necessary to carry out the views and institutions of a certain section and you wanted to purchase the Floridas, who hesitated then about the constitutionality of it? And not only that, not only to buy foreign territory, but to sell to a foreign nation millions of acres that we then owned? And I want to remind gentlemen from Texas who are now such sticklers upon this question that the very men whom they now assume to follow felt that they could find warrant in the Constitution not simply for this but to transfer the allegiance of men that were citizens of the United States. For you will remember that under the treaty of 1803 by which we acquired Louisiana we acquired a large portion of the now State of Texas. But by the treaty of 1819 we transferred all of our rights in Texas to the most arbitrary government that was then existing, and we took from men who were citizens of the United States their rights as citizens and made them subject to the King of Spain.

There was power enough in the Constitution to do this, and the very men whom you are now following, or are assuming to follow, are the men who felt they had the constitutional power to do it. Come down a little later, sir, to the fugitive-slave law. Where do you find in the Constitution the authority of the Government of the United States to put its hand on the escaping slave? The language of the Constitution is this:

No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due.

No authority for the General Government to authorize its officers to invade a "sovereign State" to lay its hand upon a man there seeking an asylum not charged with crime; he shall be delivered up by the State authority. But if the State authority elected not to do that, you gentlemen felt that you had the power under the Constitution to arm not one officer but a thousand if need be and send them to invade the "sovereign States" for the purpose of executing such a law. Yet you had no authority save by implication. So, too, in the legislation to prevent the spread of yellow fever. Then you did not hesitate to say the Government had ample power to place men in quarantine. Coming down a little later, where do you find authority for the improvement of the private lands for the owner who lives along the margin of the Mississippi River? And yet you are putting your hand into the Treasury and taking from it millions of dollars annually in order to improve the private property of men who are the owners of that soil by building levees for their protection. I think I am correct in saying that when your interests lead you in that direction you can find broad warrant in the Constitution for the acts that seem at the time to be in consonance with your interests.

For my part, sir, I find no difficulty upon this subject. The Constitution provides that the Congress may regulate the commerce between the States. This bill, sir, does not propose to put its hand in any way upon the authority of a State until that State is about to invade another State with articles of commerce that are diseased and that imperil our interests. We feel that under this state of affairs we have the right to demand protection for ourselves.

Why, gentlemen say it is the duty and it will be the pleasure of the States themselves to enforce needed quarantine. But experience teaches us that they do not do it. And year after year the State of Missouri or the State of Kansas or the State of Iowa has been invaded by great herds of cattle from the State of Texas, carrying disease all along the line of their march, which has entailed millions of dollars of loss annually to each of those States. Would Texas, protect us against that? Their interests were to dispose of those herds while they yet had life enough to travel beyond the limit of their own border; and acting upon the selfish interests that pertain to them (no more perhaps than other men), they from year to year exposed us to these losses until we were compelled, in a feeble way it is true and most unsuccessfully, to strive to protect ourselves.

We had no adequate protection from this Texas cattle disease until there was such a change in the commercial relations of the two States or such a construction of new lines of travel as that the cattle either passed around us entirely or were carried swiftly through the State without stop. As I understand it, the objections that are urged to this bill on the ground of a want of constitutional power are against the fourth section of the bill. That section provides—

That whenever a State or Territory in any section of which a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease exists which the Commissioner of Agriculture has declared to be dangerous to the animal industries of the nation fails to make provisions for its extirpation, or to co-operate with the plans of the Commissioner of Agriculture for the extirpation of such disease, the President of the United States, on the presentation of the facts by the Commissioner of Agriculture, shall be authorized to declare in quarantine the said State or Territory, or such part of said State or Territory as he may deem dangerous to the animal industries of the country, and to regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district.

That section simply provides that when these animals are in a dangerously diseased condition they shall not be forced by their owners upon their reluctant neighbors; that is all. It simply provides that the infected cattle, the dangerous cattle, the cattle that would destroy this branch of the commerce of the country, shall not be permitted to invade other States.

It seems to me that we have had too many illustrations of the interpretation of the implied powers given to Congress by the Constitution to justify our quibbling now with regard to a matter of this kind. We have had legislative interpretations over and over again; we have had executive interpretations over and over again. We find that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] himself proposes to lay his hand upon the entire transportation of this country. We find that he proposes, if it may be necessary, to absolutely destroy the interest which an individual may have in a corporation in order to secure his ideas of economy in transportation and cheapness of rates.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman tell how I propose to destroy any property?

Mr. HEPBURN. To a certain extent by making such regulations as will render the property in certain instances not remunerative, and in that way affecting the stock of the company, and to that extent destroying the property of the stockholder.

Mr. REAGAN. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. HISCOCK. Any limitation is to that extent a destruction of the property.

Mr. REAGAN. All I propose to do is to punish certain crimes against transportation.

Mr. HEPBURN. I agree with the gentleman in the main in regard to many matters pertaining to transportation, perhaps not in regard to his pet child known as the "Reagan bill." Perhaps in regard to the general subject of transportation there would be no disagreement between him and me. The wonderment in my mind is how the gentleman can so interpret the Constitution of the United States as to give to himself the right to lay his hand ruthlessly in this manner upon hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property, and then when this other question comes up, as much a subject of interest, or nearly so, to us as any other, he can see at once the bugaboo of State rights looming up before him and can find himself shriven of all power to help the people.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to explain to him——

Mr. HEPBURN. I know just exactly what your views are, and the country knows them, for they have been before the country for ten years and are well understood.

Mr. REAGAN. Do you think you fairly represent them, then, if you know what they are?

Mr. HEPBURN. I think I do.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose that, without your consent, I can not show that you either do not know my views, or, knowing them, do not represent them correctly?

Mr. HEPBURN. If my time can be extended I have no objection to any interruptions of this character. This bill affects something more than the mere question of property: it affects the health, and, through the health, the lives of our people. It affects not only our property and our herds here, but it affects all the commerce that we have of this kind and character with foreign nations. The mere fact that it is charged that this disease prevails among us, although, in fact, there may be but little of it, affects us every year to the extent of millions of dollars in our foreign trade.

We ask that a quarter of a million of dollars shall be appropriated for this purpose, and gentlemen hold up their hands in horror at the stupendous sum. Yet we are paying more money every year for the adornment of the city of Washington, for the beautifying and preservation of its squares, for the culture of flowers—more money by thousands of dollars than we pay out for the benefit of the whole interest of agriculture in the United States. Right here in this city and for this class of expenditures there is more money lavished every year than the aggregate of all the appropriations of Congress for the benefit of the great agricultural interests of this country.

We are now asking, I say, for but this meager sum; there can be no more spent than this amount. Gentlemen seem to fear that there is to be a multitude of officers appointed by the President to invade every section of the country. Let me remind them there are but few places to-day where this disease exists, and but few places where the necessity for the presence of these officers may be felt. Under the provisions of this bill there can be but few of them.

The great bulk of the expenditure of this $250,000 will be for compensating men whose herds have to be decimated to exterminate this disease. I sometimes doubt whether that is a wise provision. A man who has an animal liable to spread disease dangerous to the animals of his neighbors who will not extirpate the disease by destroying the animal ought to have it destroyed by some power superior to his own and at his own loss. But this bill provides for compensating him amply for that which perhaps is almost entirely worthless.

There is no provision of the bill in my belief that is not well guarded in order to meet the exigencies of the case. These are extreme cases, I will admit; but because they are such they seem to require what might otherwise be considered by some a dangerous exercise of power.

This bill is not directed alone against pleuro-pneumonia as it is known to cattle-men, but it applies to all contagious diseases of domestic animals. I remember one occasion during the period that the gentleman from California [Mr. ROSECRANS] was in command of the Army of the Cumberland when he lost from his corral in less than six weeks more than 7,000 animals belonging to the Government by a disease then called by experts who examined it pleuro-pneumonia. I know that we are liable to meet with losses of this character at any time; and when now there is little disease, comparatively, in existence; while the danger is not most imminent, I want to adopt those wise methods which will protect us from the terrible losses that may come upon us if we allow the disease to spread all over the country, reaching to such an extent that extirpation may not be possible except by the expenditure of millions.

From reading and from the testimony of gentlemen conversant with this subject I know that this disease is never removed from the system of an infected animal. Once there, it remains. It may not immediately destroy life; but it spreads contagion. It may not immediately kill the animal first affected, but it may destroy hundreds of others, for it is never entirely cured. Up to this time no results of science promise us any relief. There must be a destruction of the animal infected in order that we may be freed from the peril.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GIBSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN].

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that as a member of the Committee on Agriculture I would be entitled to speak on this bill immediately after the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD]. I desire to be informed whether I am correct.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MILLS). The present occupant of the chair, who is seeking to carry out the views of the permanent chairman of the Committee of the Whole, understands that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] will be next recognized.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I avail myself of the courtesy of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] for the purpose of saying a word only. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] seems to be very greatly distressed because I find constitutional objections to this bill, while I do not find such objections to the Congressional regulation of interstate commerce, and a great many other things of which he speaks. If the gentleman had listened to the remarks I made to-day, he would have understood me as distinctly stating that there are within the powers of Congress, without violating the Constitution, measures which might be adopted for aiding in the prevention of the spread of disease among cattle. He would have heard me say that the power which Congress can exercise in this respect is that which is derived from the authority to regulate commerce among the States, and with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes. Outside of this power, Congress has no authority over this subject. No court has ever held that under this power the Congress of the United States can go into a State and attempt to regulate its purely domestic and local affairs. Now this bill proposes to regulate the domestic and local affairs of a State, in plain violation of the Constitution, in disregard of all the opinions of the Supreme Court and other courts that have passed upon the provisions of the Constitution bearing on this subject.

Some of the speeches made by gentlemen on the other side would seem to imply that the men making them have never read the Constitution. Certainly they are made by men who have no respect for the Constitution, and regard it as no barrier to the exertion of their powers. If the Constitution has any purpose it is to point out what the Federal Government may do—that it may exercise certain national and international powers. No one ever dreamed that the object of the Constitution was to enable the Federal Government to go into the States and take the management of their local affairs.

Mr. HEPBURN. How about the fugitive-slave law?

Mr. REAGAN. The fugitive-slave law was passed pursuant to a provision of the Constitution which authorized its passage. If the gentleman had read the Constitution he would not have asked me that question. I had suspected before that he had never read it. [Laughter.] The Supreme Court sustained the constitutionality of the fugitive-slave law, and that court has generally been a law-abiding body.

Mr. BAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman what provision of the Constitution authorized the enactment of a law for pursuing the fugitive slave into the States that had not the institution of slavery.

Mr. REAGAN. The Constitution confers on Congress all the powers necessary to execute the express provisions of the instrument. I refer to Article IV, section 2, clause 3; and to Article I, section 8, and clause 18, of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BAYNE. There is not a line or a word in the Constitution that authorizes it, and the decision of the Supreme Court was in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Chairman, I saw to-day in Puck a picture with the words "The old hose won't work." Now, gentlemen had better let the fugitive-slave law alone. "The old hose" will not work. We had better argue a constitutional question on its merits, not appeal to the prejudices of the past. Is there nothing higher than prejudice to influence the minds of men who direct the legislation of this Congress? Are we here to consult for the best interests of the country, or are we here, like the gentleman from Iowa, to appeal to nonsense and to prejudice?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] a single question. I hope the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] will yield for a moment longer.

Mr. GIBSON. I will if the question is pertinent to this bill.

Mr. HISCOCK. It is. I would not ask any other. I ask the gentleman from Texas whether he did not support the bill of 1879 creating a national board of health?

Mr. REAGAN. I can not say.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to a provision in that bill. In section 3, after it provides that the board of health shall act in concert with the boards of health of the different States, it goes on to say as follows:

> And at such ports and places within the United States where quarantine regulations exist under the authority of the State, which, in the opinion of the National Board of Health, are not sufficient to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States, or into one State from another, the National Board of Health shall report the facts to the President of the United States, who shall, if, in his judgment, it is necessary and proper, order said Board of Health to make such additional rules and regulations as are necessary to prevent the introduction of such diseases into the United States from foreign countries, or into one State from another, which, when so made and approved by the President, shall be promulgated by the National Board of Health and enforced by the sanitary authorities of the State where the State authorities will undertake to execute and enforce them; but if the State authorities shall fail or refuse to enforce said rules and regulations, the President may detail an officer or appoint a proper person for that purpose.

Mr. REAGAN. There were two bills. I am not certain whether I voted for that bill or not. [Laughter on the Republican side.] There was one of them I voted against. The gentleman from New York knows my position on that question; it was to prevent diseases coming into this from other countries.

Mr. HISCOCK. No.

Mr. REAGAN. There the power of Congress was exclusive, because the United States has control over foreign intercourse. I objected to interfering with the relations between the States.

Mr. HISCOCK. It was to prevent the introduction of yellow fever from one State to another, and I believe it had the unanimous vote from the Democratic side.

Mr. REAGAN. Oh, no!

Mr. GIBSON. I do not yield any further to the gentleman for this colloquy. I will yield, however, for five minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think I am in a better condition, perhaps, than my friend from Texas to answer the query of my colleague from Syracuse. I never favored that system of quarantining by which the rights and privileges of the States were overridden by Federal legislation. I never did. [Laughter and applause.] Every time when these Federal bills for quarantining came up, when there was a prospect of yellow fever or cholera, if I could not kill the bill I always got a proviso on it that it should not affect our State quarantine and our State relations. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in justice to my colleague, that he with a gentleman from Connecticut did stand up as a marked monument against this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I have always been a monument in this House. [Laughter and applause.] The reason I have stood out so long and why I stand here to-day is because I am a representative of that peculiar cycle in relation to these Federal divisions as a State and to Federal legislation. After many years the old cycle comes around again, and I appeal to men of the Democratic faith if they believe in it——

Mr. BELFORD. I do not believe they do. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, the vote will test it. When my friend from Maine smiles about it I know he never had a particle of that kind of faith [laughter], and he never will have it. The State of Maine does not encourage it.

Mr. REED. It is a compliment to me for the past and a felicitation for the future. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. COX, of New York. I only hope the gentleman's future in this world and in the next will be better than any man who lives in the State of Maine. [Laughter.]

But I desire, in the two minutes which are not quite gone, to say that the very form, structure, system, genius of our Federal policy demand that we should not have legislation in this sweeping kind of way. It is undertaking by Federal power to get the States to revise their municipal regulations.

It will not be well done. It is done against the interest as well as against the rights of the citizens; and though you may bring in a better bill, and though I hope one will come in to conform to our principle of interstate commerce under the Constitution, or of foreign commerce under the Constitution, I want to vote for no bill which will intrench upon the rights of the States or break in upon that old, well-ordered division of State and Federal sovereignty which is the refinement of our system and the honor of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me ask my colleague a single question, whether in the last Congress he did not vote for every resolution which appropriated money for the sufferers by the freshets of the Mississippi?

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not think I did.

Mr. HISCOCK. Every single one, I believe.

Mr. COX, of New York. I may have voted for a good many bad bills that the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations brought in. I plead ignorance, because I never could get much out of him on the committee. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, the wide range that the discussion of this subject has assumed would, even without a close scrutiny or criticism of the bill itself and its provisions, convince any man who has paid any attention to it that it involves questions of vital importance to the people of every section of this country, and that it embraces not only questions of organic government but that it embraces also great industrial questions which now so much interest and agitate the land.

I regret very much that in the discussion of a measure intended to accomplish a great good in the protection of private property and the vested interests of this country we have not been able to treat it as a question alone of that character, but have had every sort of political prejudice injected and involved in the discussion. And when I remember what has been the course of gentlemen upon the other side for the last two or three years, I must confess my utter surprise to hear their attack on any thing like State rights. I remember that when the doctrine of State rights would enable them to steal the Presidency of this country they hugged it to their bosoms with lecherous embrace. I remember when their party became the ally of Mahoneism in the attempt to capture the State of Virginia with corrupt motives, nobody cried out for the rights of the States like gentlemen on the other side. It only goes to show, Mr. Chairman, that when we come to consider this subject we allow ourselves to be carried off by political prejudice and bias and drift away from the true question that is presented.

But let us for a moment undertake to consider this bill beyond the constitutional question, for that has been discussed; and before I go into a criticism of the bill, I must say that I wish to express my gratitude to the gentleman from New York for the very clear exposition he gave of some of the defects in it. I do not mean to charge that the intelligent Committee on Agriculture designedly got up this bill and put it here in the shape we find it. I believe they were honest in their intentions; but I think every member of this House will see that they have been overreached, and that the bill as it stands here is a fraud upon its face and intended to perpetrate a great wrong upon the people.

What has been said in defense of this bill? Has any man argued to you here that this is a bill to create a census bureau for cattle? Not a solitary argument has been used in defense of it. They have told you it was for the purpose of preventing the destruction of cattle, and that alone. They have told you it was for the purpose of the promotion or protection of the public health. Why, gentlemen, that is but the smallest part of it. That is not the only effect of the bill. It is not intended to affect, as we are told, all the States, but only certain portions of a few of the States. The real object, the effect of the bill, its purpose, is to secure an army of office-holders all over the land who shall take the place of the routed internal-revenue officials and pry into every man's household and ride over every man's farm. Why, I repeat, the diseases of cattle have but little to do with it. Listen but for a moment. We are told—

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief therefor, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, whose duty it shall be—to investigate and report upon the number.

He must go into every county in every State and Territory of this Union. He must go upon every farm in every county. He must list the number of cattle, the number of horses, the number of sheep, and the number of hogs, and down to the very chickens that scratch about in his yard. Not only must he list the number of them, but he must get at their value; an assessment upon every farm in the country! Not only that, but he shall inquire into the condition of every domestic animal in the land; and, further than that, he shall inquire as to how these domestic animals are used. If he finds a man who has a hundred head of cattle, he must inquire and report whether ten are used as work-oxen; how many are used as cows, and how many are used for one purpose and how many for the other. And for the purpose of allowing him to execute this monstrous raid and to give him an opportunity of discharging its onerous duties, this committee added this wonderful clause, that he should have power, "and is hereby authorized, to employ a force sufficient for this purpose!"

Now, I say, gentlemen, this bill is a fraud upon its face. Every argument has shown it to be such, and not a single advocate of this bill has defended it upon any ground. Even the vigorous gentleman from Missouri who championed the bill has not undertaken to put it before the House in a light that can commend it to our judgment.

Why, sir, there is not a State in this Union that has not its own census upon these things. And you can go down here to the national Census Office, and there you can get all these censuses.

But this remarkable bill is to create an officer in every county, and to send them all over the country for the purpose of retaking the census. And where, sir, will it stop? Does it end in one year? Where is the limitation of it? The census is taken one year, according to this bill, and then it may be taken again in the next. The report upon the condition of the cattle of one year would amount to nothing to show what is their condition in the next. Of this bill, the handiwork of a Democratic majority and a Republican minority in this House, the result would be that you would have a whole host of thousands of office-holders riding throughout the land and fattening on the substance of the people. Let this bill be passed, and you would not have cattle enough in the country to pay their expenses by the time they were done with it.

And yet it is this feature of the bill which has been slurred over and covered in this way. The very point and pith of the bill is covered up. Every single advocate of it has told you he wishes to protect the people against diseased cattle, to build up the agricultural interest, and to take care of the health of the country. What limitation is there on this? Can you tell me any other act ever passed by this or any other Congress in which a subordinate officer has been given such unlimited power? And that subordinate officer, what is he? My friend from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] said a horse-doctor; my friend from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] said a scientific crank. The advocates of the bill call him the one and the opponents of the bill the other. But we do know from common reputation in this country that we have no such thing as skilled veterinary surgeons who occupy that place in the scientific world that entitles them to the unlimited power of a bureau officer in this country.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is only one of the features of this bill. That I say is its chief feature. I have already expressed my utter astonishment that a committee, an intelligent committee of this House, would report a bill giving such unlimited power into the hands of a subordinate officer and opening the door of the Treasury so wide. That committee must have been carried away with the magnificent idea of my friend from Colorado in his desire to open the public Treasury.

But, Mr. Chairman, that is not all it proposes to give to those officers. It proposes not only that he shall take a census, but after he has taken this census it proposes that he shall adopt rules and methods and say in what kind of cars you shall carry your cattle, how far you shall drive them in a day, how often you shall feed them, where you shall stop with them. The second section of the bill says he shall adopt rules and those rules shall govern the transportation of cattle, and that no man shall transport cattle otherwise than according to the rules adopted by him.

Following the bill up we come to section 3. That is the most remarkable section, I venture to say, that has ever been found in any bill introduced into this House. What is it?

You have now this scientific crank or this horse-doctor bureau. You have made him the arbitrator of the rights of the people in the questions of disease. He has reported to his chief officer, the chief of the Bureau of Agriculture; and they have laid down certain rules. Then those rules are what? Mark the language. Those rules laid down by this horse-doctor for the government of these things are certified to the chief executive of the State, and the chief executive of the State is told he has got to approve of those rules and submit to them under the threat of the State being quarantined or, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HATCH] said, under the threat of a wall of fire being built all around it that will neither let others in nor themselves out.

I asked the gentleman from Missouri when he was discussing this matter: suppose, upon the statement of this officer, there was this disease and the authorities of the State declare the disease did not exist? How was that to be settled? Here is this scientific crank, or this horse-doctor, or this agent, or this chief of this new bureau; he sits down in the city of Washington and certifies that in the State of New York, or the State of Missouri, pleuro-pneumonia, pink-eye, distemper, lung-fever, hog-cholera, rot in sheep, or anything else exists. Thereupon the chief of the Agricultural Bureau telegraphs or writes to the executive of that State: "My subordinate has informed me that there exists contagious disease in your State. Now you must agree with me that I shall send my men there to slaughter the cattle all over your State; and not only that, but you must agree with me that your State will pay half the cost that my agents will fix, or I will build a wall of fire around you."

And yet gentlemen stand here and undertake to tell us that this is a fair bill; that it does not invade constitutional rights, that it does not invade every idea and every principle of good government. The governor of the State replies: "You are mistaken; no such thing exists; my veterinarian surgeons say it does not exist; my people say it does not exist." "Ah, but," says the chief of the bureau or the President, "I have a man here created by Congress, the supreme Legislature of this land, and he has declared that it exists, and I must take what he says in preference to your statement; and as you have not agreed with me to an unlimited call for which your State treasury will be responsible, I will declare a quarantine in your State, and no man shall come out of it with a hoof of cattle or take one in."

Mr. BROWNE, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. GIBSON. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. GIBSON. The Chair will understand that I am entitled to the floor when the consideration of the bill is resumed.

The motion of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COBB reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, had come to no resolution thereon.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask consent to have read at this time a proposed amendment to the rules, so that it may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANDALL. It is understood that it is read for information only, as other proposed amendments have been read.

The SPEAKER. It will be read merely for information, and printed in the RECORD, as other proposed amendments have been.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and a bill is reached for consideration, and before its consideration is begun, one motion may be made that the committee lay that bill aside and take up any other on that Calendar, which motion shall be decided by a majority of the committee without debate.

Mr. WELLER. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 848) to amend section 2776 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to authorize the unloading of coal, salt, railroad iron, and other like articles in bulk, under the superintendence of customs officers, at the expense of parties interested, at places to be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury within the collection district, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1019) for the relief of Peter K. Dederick, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT. The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred on the 10th day of January, 1884, the petition of William H. Ward, of Monongahela City, Pa., praying for the passage of a bill paying him for a bullet-machine furnished to the Navy Department, have directed the petition to be transmitted to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act known as the Bowman bill, and I make report of that fact to the Senate.

Mr. VANCE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a petition of members of the police force of the District of Columbia who were in office during the year 1867, claiming the amounts due them under the joint resolution of Congress approved February 28, 1867, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 1432) for the relief of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1149) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, 1880, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 717) for the relief of John G. Rose, to report it adversely. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar, as one Senator on the committee desires me to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 453) for the relief of Coronna, Taussig & Co., and others, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1148) for the relief of William B. Moses, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1104) relative to acknowledgments of conveyances of land in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 57) for the relief of settlers and purchasers of lands on the public domain in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. JACKSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 29) for the relief of the State National Bank of Boston, Mass., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

ISRAEL DODGE'S LAND CLAIM.

I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate of December 11, 1883, to investigate the issue of certain scrip to the heirs of Israel Dodge, to submit a report, together with the testimony taken by the committee, and to ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the testimony be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The testimony seems to be voluminous. The Senator from Oregon did not move to have it printed.

Mr. DOLPH. I supposed, that being a part of the report of the committee, it would be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a written report?

Mr. DOLPH. There is a written report, and the testimony is appended to the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then it will be printed, under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CULLOM (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1433) for the relief of persons to whom the governors of the Northwest and Indiana Territories confirmed lands, which lands were afterward sold by the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LAPHAM (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1434) for the relief of Daniel W. Lee & Co., of New York city, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PIKE introduced a bill (S. 1435) to fix the positions of the assistant astronomers at the Naval Observatory; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1436) granting a pension to Francis M. Cox; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper and the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1437) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of David A. Hawk; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1438) for the relief of Anna Holborn; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PLATT (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1439) to remove the political disabilities of Anderson Merchant; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1440) to amend an act entitled "An act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1880; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. KENNA introduced a bill (S. 1441) to authorize the construction of bridges across the Great Kanawha River, and to prescribe the dimensions of the same; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. KENNA. In introducing this bill I desire to say that there is a difference of opinion as to the propriety of the height of the bridges authorized by it to be constructed so as not to interfere with navigation. Therefore I have left the height blank. There are also other provisions of the bill which I have not personally investigated to which I wish to give some attention and perhaps make some suggestions about. There is a general desire to have the bridges, but likewise a universal feeling against interference with the navigation. I shall place all available information on the subject before the committee, and hope that if the bill is not now it may be so formulated as to permit the bridges and save harmless the navigation.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 1442) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a Mississippi River commission for the improvement of the said river from the head of the passes, near its mouth, to its headwaters," approved June 28, 1879; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Improvement of the Mississippi River and Tributaries.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1443) granting a pension to Peter Riley; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1444) granting a pension to William J. Hess; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 1445) to provide for the settlement of the rights of the States and of the corporations and persons interested in any grant of lands in aid of railroads and canals which shall be declared forfeited by an act of Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LAPHAM introduced a bill (S. 1446) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Lou. Gobright McFalls; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1447) to authorize the construction of certain bridges across the Staten Island Sound, known as Arthur Kill or Kill von Kull, and to establish the same as post-roads; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRIS introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 56) for the relief of Martin and P. B. Murphy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HARRIS. The joint resolution provides for the payment of claims against the Light-House establishment growing out of the embezzlement and forgery of one of the officers of the Government, who, by the way, is now in the penitentiary. The joint resolution authorizes repayment out of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made, and I suppose the Committee on Claims probably would be the proper committee to consider it. I move that it be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 57) for the relief of Maria V. Brown, assignee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I gave notice last week that I would ask the Senate this morning to take up for consideration the bill (S. 1139) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library. As it is a bill very like what has several times passed the Senate heretofore, I think it will take but a very short time, and it is important that the bill should pass and go to the other House in order to get early consideration. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill now.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator from Vermont to defer his request until the morning business is over. I have a resolution which I wish to offer, which I suppose will not occupy any time.

Mr. MORRILL. I will yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to proceed to the consideration of a bill at this time. After the order of resolutions is finished it will be open to the Senator from Vermont to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

REFERENCE OF PAPERS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HOAR. I submit the following resolution, and ask that it be now adopted by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That any committee of the Senate which shall cause any claim or matter pending before it to be transmitted to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, shall report the fact of such transmission to the Senate, and such report shall be entered upon the Journal.

I desire to say in explanation of the resolution, that the act which was passed at the close of the last session, known as the Bowman bill, authorized any committee of the Senate to transmit any bill or matter pending before it to the Court of Claims for a finding upon the facts. The Journal shows the history of all bills and all resolutions which are pending in the Senate, and the list of bills contained in the bound volume of the RECORD shows also the history of all bills and petitions which come before this body. But under the new statute a bill may be referred to a committee and totally disappear from the Journal and from the RECORD. My desire is to provide that when a committee under this authority sends a matter to the Court of Claims it shall report the fact, so that the Journal and the RECORD will show the history of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GARLAND. Let it be again reported.

The resolution was read.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is exactly right, I think; but ought it not to be a standing rule, so that it will be published with our rules?

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it will become a standing rule. That is the reason why I asked that it be adopted by unanimous consent, that by a suspension of the standing rules it may be adopted without notice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

TORPEDO MACHINERY.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate the report of the so-called Selfridge board appointed to examine the torpedo machinery of the Destroyer and other papers in the Navy Department relating to the same.

GEOGRAPHICAL CONGRESS AT VENICE.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada, submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That there shall be printed in quarto form and bound by the Government Printer 5,000 copies of the report of the commissioner and delegate of the War Department to the third international geographical congress and exhibition at Venice, Italy; 1,000 copies for the use of the Senate, 3,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,000 copies for the use of the War Department; and the style of the text, together with the accompanying plates and maps, to correspond with like publications of, and the latter from proofs corrected and approved at, the Engineer Department, United States Army.

CASE OF CARLOS AGÜERO.

Mr. CALL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to prevent the delivery of Señor Carlos Agüero, now in prison at Key West, Fla., and held for extradition on the demand of the Government of Spain under the treaty of extradition, until it shall be ascertained that the charges against him are true, and that he is not held for political offenses; and that the President be requested to direct the Attorney-General of the United States to have an investigation of the case made and evidence taken; and if it shall be found that the said Señor Carlos Agüero has been arrested in the United States for political offenses alleged to have been committed in the island of Cuba, that he cause such proceedings to be had in conformity with law as will prevent the extradition of the said Señor Carlos Agüero.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What reference does the Senator desire?

Mr. CALL. I hold in my hand——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution or its reference?

Mr. CALL. I shall ask for its reference when I state the object of the resolution. I hold in my hand the proceedings of a mass-meeting of Cuban citizens of the United States, held at San Carlos Hall, in the city of Key West, Fla., on the 24th of January, 1884, for the purpose of taking action relative to the arrest and imprisonment of the Cuban patriot Señor Carlos Agüero, and it was resolved to issue the following address:

Our esteemed friend Señor Carlos Agüero has this morning been arrested in this city by the United States marshal and lodged in jail at the instigation and upon the unjust demand of the Spanish Government to the authorities at Washington, which arrest will be followed by the delivery of the prisoner to the sanguinary government that tyrannizes over our beloved Cuba, unless the American Government and American people carefully scrutinize the political history and tyrannical acts of Spain in the "ever-faithful" isle.

The Spanish Government has preferred charges and accuses Señor Agüero of being a highwayman and a robber, in order that under the provision of the recent extradition treaty he may be delivered up as an ordinary criminal, and thus again satiate its thirst in the blood of one of the most valiant soldiers of Cuban liberty; blotting his illustrious record in the opprobrious epithet of highwayman and robber, a name which Spain has always applied to the defenders of liberty in her American colonies. Highwaymen and robbers she called Bolivar, Sucre, San Martin, and other heroes of South American independence in the early part of the present century. Cut-throats and assassins she afterward called the defenders of Cuban liberty Joaquin Agüero and Narciso Lopez, and later the same epithets were applied to Carlos Manuel de Cespedes, Pedro Figueredo, Ignacio Agramonte, and all the officers, soldiers, and sympathizers of the noble cause of Cuban liberty.

No! Señor Agüero, who to-day languishes in jail at Key West under criminal charges preferred by the Spanish Government, is neither a highwayman nor a cut-throat. He bears the reputation of a valiant soldier and standard-bearer in the strife for Cuban liberty and independence, which record has been honorably won during the ten years of military service under the orders of Generals Agramonte, Gomez, Sanguili, Reeve, &c.

Upon the termination of the war, and peace being proclaimed at Zanjon in 1878, Chief Agüero retired to private life until the following year, when, in obedience to the orders of General Calixto Garcia, the leader of a new movement in Cuba, he again took up arms in defense of his country, when he was made a prisoner by the Spanish Government and condemned to die, but escaped in company with another patriot named Augusto Arango. After his arrest and escape Señor Agüero was not connected with the Cuban movement until December of 1882, at which time, acting in accord with and under instructions from the Cuban revolutionary centers and a number of our chief agents, he again took an active part by enlisting sympathy and support and seeking protection for his contemplated march towards the Cuban army in the interior of the island.

In obedience to these instructions Señor Agüero remained in Cuba until, under pressure of his advisers, who appeared to be acting in accord and with the concurrence of the Spanish Government, he left the battlefields with two of his companions and reached the city of Havana, where he remained unmolested, and where he publicly took passage for this city, where he arrived on the 15th of November last, and from whence he immediately proceeded to New York, having returned here within the past eight days. We invite the particular attention of the American people and the American Government to these facts, which illustrate the perfidy involved in the request of the Spanish Government for the delivery of Señor Agüero after having allowed the departure of himself and companions from Cuba within the past few months. The acts committed by Agüero, and upon which are based the demands of the Spanish Government for his extradition, are none other than those recognized and resorted to by all nations in time of war, and which the Cuban patriots have been justified in using at all times to combat the tyranny of a government which enslaves them.

I am requested by that large and respectable body of American citizens to bring this subject to the notice of the Senate and to ask that the resolution which I have offered may be passed.

Article 3 of the convention between the United States and Spain of 1877 declares "that the provisions of the convention shall not import claim of extradition for any crime or offense of a political character, nor for acts connected with such crimes or offenses."

Article 4 of the convention of 1882 declares "all the provisions of the 5th of January, 1877, not abrogated by these additional articles, shall apply to these articles with the same force as to the said original convention."

It is, therefore, apparent that Agüero is not subject to extradition if the offense charged against him was of a "political character or connected with such crimes or offenses," and that he has a right to the protection of this Government against such extradition. The Cuban citizens of the United States at Key West have a right to make this demand on the Government and to have it respected.

Their request is sustained by the established policy of the Government and by the traditional policy of other governments, who in all past time have allowed their territory to be an asylum for persons charged with "political offenses or acts connected with such crimes."

I move its reference, with the accompanying paper, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN DUDLEY.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service be, and it is hereby, instructed to inquire into the cause of the removal of John Dudley, colored, laborer, on the rolls of the Senate. The committee is directed to reduce to writing the evidence which it takes in regard to this removal, and lay the evidence, together with its report, before the Senate. The committee is further directed to report what change, if any, in the rules of the Senate is necessary to protect its employés against dismissal from their positions.

Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HOAR. I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky to the fact that there was a slip of the pen in drafting the resolution which, if he will read it he will wish to correct before it is adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not yet before the Senate. Does the Senator from Kentucky ask for its present consideration?

Mr. BECK. I will allow it to lie on the table until to-morrow morning, so that I may examine it. I wrote it at this moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. BECK. I rose only to say that I first endeavored to have an investigation made by the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but that committee had no authority, so they advised me; they had at one time, but the rule was changed.

This man is a colored laborer. He is from Kentucky, the only one I believe here from that State. He was a soldier for three years, and he wears a badge of the Legion of Honor. I suppose he will get the certificate of all the officers of the Senate that he is the best man they ever had—quiet, honest, faithful; and he has had family afflictions which have made him very dependent. That he has been dismissed summarily and without cause and to the detriment of the public service I have no sort of doubt; but I have no means of obtaining information to prove it except by having an investigation made. If reliance can be had upon the testimony of all his superiors, they will say that his place can not well be filled and never has been filled so well.

I will allow the resolution to lie over until to-morrow, when I think I shall lay the proof before the Senate of a most wanton case of dismissal of a very competent, good man.

Mr. CONGER. Is the resolution in a proper condition for an amendment at this time?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not. It went over under the rule at the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky, and the debate that has taken place upon it proceeds by unanimous consent.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SLATER, it was Ordered, That the papers of Jacob Fritz be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. COKE, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to Senate bill 803, for the relief of Overton Love and others, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers on file relating to Senate bill 804, for the relief of William Beddo and others, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY BUILDING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" that order is closed, and the Calendar, under the eighth rule, is before the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (S. 1139) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves, as he has a right to move, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BECK. If the bill is taken up now, does it come under the five-minute rule as to debate?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not; it will be taken up by motion.

Mr. BECK. And open to unlimited debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unlimited debate.

Mr. INGALLS. Until 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the bill itself passes from the consideration of the Senate and the unfinished business comes up.

Mr. BECK. I only desire to say that I will vote to make the bill a special order for 2 o'clock to-morrow or any other day and to continue it until it is disposed of, but I do not believe that all the morning business ought to be stricken down to consider this bill, however important.

For one I am opposed to the bill. I am opposed to the proposed location of the Library building. I think there are many other places that would be far better. I think a building can be built almost for the cost of the ground it is proposed to build this on, and quite as good a one as may be desired. At any rate I desire to be heard; and I hope that the whole morning business will not be set aside, but that a day will be fixed, and that early, as early as to-morrow, if you please, at 2 o'clock, or the moment that the bill now pending as the unfinished business is disposed of, when the bill shall be considered.

Mr. MORRILL. This bill has been so frequently before the Senate and has received so large a support, that I do not think it will take longer than from now until 2 o'clock to dispose of it. I do not object to a disposition on the part of the Senator from Kentucky to debate it. All I propose this morning is to make a few remarks that will show the present condition of the Library and exactly what we propose to do, and I should be very glad of the opportunity to submit those remarks this morning.

Mr. INGALLS. If the Senator from Vermont desires the opportunity of submitting observations upon this bill, under the usage and precedent of course there can be no objection; but to attempt to pass a bill of the importance of the one which he mentions in the time between now and 2 o'clock seems to me to reach the very frontier of hardihood.

Mr. MORRILL. I am glad I have reached that.

Mr. INGALLS. When the Senator from Vermont states that this bill has been debated many times before, he forgets that there has been a very important change in the personnel of the Senate since that debate occurred. I am, like the Senator from Kentucky, entirely opposed to the whole scheme and system of the bill that the committee have reported; and while the matter is one of great importance and ought to be considered, I protest against the injustice that would be committed by attempting to limit the discussion of a subject like this, involving the appropriation of millions of dollars, to the short space of time between now and 2 o'clock. I will agree with the Senator from Vermont in fixing a time when this bill shall come up for debate, and I think he ought to consent to it, and I am quite sure on reflection he will be willing to do that.

Mr. BECK. I shall be very glad to have the Senator from Vermont make his statement to-day and let it be published in the RECORD. It may convince me. I know we want a Library. I desire to vote for one; I do not desire delay, but I do not think the debate can be closed before 2 o'clock. If he will make his remarks to-day, they will be very valuable no doubt, and have the bill made the special order for to-morrow at 2 o'clock and continue it, or at any time when he will give us an opportunity to consider it fairly, I shall be satisfied. That is all I ask.

Mr. MORRILL. Upon a conference with the Senator having charge of the Mexican land bill he agreed with me that we might pass this bill in the morning hour or before 2 o'clock, and if it should take a few minutes more than that he was willing to yield. I desire not to cut off any discussion by any Senator. Of course I despair of ever having a bill of this kind that will exactly please my friend from Kansas; but I think when it is explained it will satisfy a large proportion of the Senate, and that is all I desire to say at the present time, except that I should be glad to have the bill taken up in pursuance of the notice I gave last week that I would call it up this morning.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand nothing is now before the Senate except the desire of the Senator from Vermont to be heard upon the bill which he has reported from the Select Committee on Additional Accommodations for the Library. I never heard of objection being made to such a request, nor do I understand that there is any objection to that in this case.

Mr. INGALLS. None, certainly, on my part.

Mr. VOORHEES. I understand so. I suggest, therefore, that the Senator from Vermont take the floor and make his remarks, and at the end of them we shall consider whether it is practicable or possible to go on with the subject or whether it shall go over to a day to be fixed.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no doubt that if the Senator from Vermont will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill for the main purpose I understand him to indicate, that consent will very cheerfully be given by the Senate; but I shall not only object but vote against any proposition to take this bill up to clog the way of the Calendar, not for the hours between now and 2 o'clock but for the next two weeks, at the end of which time the Senator from Vermont would find his bill still not passed and probably not disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill named.

Mr. HILL. I desire to ask what effect that will have on the consideration of the bill that was under consideration at the close of the morning hour yesterday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator mean the unfinished business, the land bill?

Mr. HILL. No, sir; the bill in relation to the act relative to the Ute Indian reservation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will have the effect to displace the bill that is first in order under the eighth rule, but it will not lose its place to-morrow. It will stand at the head of the list when proceedings under the eighth rule are again resumed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to know distinctly of the Senator from Vermont whether he intends to attempt to override the rules of the Senate and by a mere majority to set aside this Calendar and take up his bill in the morning hour and force all the other cases on the Calendar to remain until that is disposed of? If that is his proposition we will meet it. If he asks to submit his remarks this morning there is not a Senator, I will guarantee, who will object to it, and then after his remarks have been submitted at some other time the bill can be taken up and disposed of. I presume the Mexican land bill will not take all the rest of the session. I am perfectly willing just as soon as that is disposed of to let this bill come in, but I tell the Senator now that he will not pass his bill in the morning hour. We have some rights and other claimants have some rights here. We have got a Calendar and we have got a settled rule that we have established. It is the only rule under which we can do any business, and the Senator knows it as well as anybody else. Now, for him to be the first man to come in here and ask the Senate to trample down that rule, throw us into confusion and disorder now and during the whole residue of the time, I do not think is right. I hope the Senator will consent to make his remarks and then to fix a time when this bill shall be considered, and not undertake to force its passage this morning, which is a physical impossibility.

Mr. MORRILL. I have not proposed to set aside the rules of the Senate. I have made no motion that is not in order. I do not desire to proceed against the wishes of even a small number of the Senate. After I have finished my remarks I am perfectly willing to fix a time at some future day when the bill shall be considered.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question on the motion of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I hope the Senator will not make that motion, but will withdraw the motion and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up for the purpose of enabling him to submit his remarks upon it.

Mr. BUTLER. That will answer the same purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think there is much difference in the propositions.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. There is a great deal of difference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, of course, can only put the motions that are made. The pending motion is that of the Senator from Vermont, to proceed to the consideration of the bill named.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I appeal to the Senator from Vermont to withdraw that motion. I shall be compelled to vote against that motion, but I shall be very glad to be one to give unanimous consent that the bill may be taken up for the purpose indicated.

Mr. MORRILL. I yield to my friend from Wisconsin. Already about as much time as I should take up has been consumed; but I desire to keep myself in harmony not only with the Senator from Missouri but the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. All right.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill named may be taken up for the purpose of his submitting remarks thereon. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the bill (S. 1139) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library is before the Senate for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. If I appear once more as the advocate of a new Library of Congress it is because the extreme want of it is getting to be unendurable, and because the bill before us, so far as the committee can judge, if not all that some would like, is all that our circumstances plainly require and all that is likely to obtain the favor of Congress. Having for many years urged attention to this subject, I confess that it would give me some pleasure to see the Library so greatly and immediately needed acceptably completed during what may remain to me of life, and completed while our present excellent Librarian, in his ambition and administrative vigor, is at his best. The bill has the approval of the special committee, and will not involve a larger expenditure than is rigidly required for an appropriate building nor more than will harmonize with the views of the most careful and prudent legislators.

In the present Library of Congress there is shelf-room for 280,000 volumes, and we had January 1, 1884, on hand, 513,441 volumes of books and 165,000 pamphlets, for which room is required. This plain statement of the facts shows that only one-half of the present stock of books and pamphlets can now be properly cared for, while the other half is lying around in promiscuous and dusty piles, unavailable for use and obstructive even to the use of such books as have the cleaner privilege of scanty shelf-room.

Last year we had large and valuable personal donations of books to the Library, which had to be stored in the crypt of the Capitol, where they are about as accessible as they would be in the Roman catacombs. Such a subterranean disposition of generous donations, were it to be but temporary, is not calculated to win many more exhibitions of similar liberality. If we may not anticipate for every year the full growth of 1882, which amounted to over 59,000 volumes, or nearly three times as many as in 1852 were to be found in the whole Library, yet the increase of the Library of Congress will forever be on a grand scale, and, like the annual growth of our country, will be greater and greater in every succeeding year. The prolific sources of this increase are known to all and need not be stated.

Beyond books and pamphlets, room has to be provided yearly for the copyright articles received, and these in 1882 amounted to 26,683.

There are no reading-rooms; no rooms for the display of manuscripts, of maps, of the graphic arts; none for even the official administration of the Library, and none for a bindery.

The distressing condition of the Library at the present time, with all of its proper and needful vacant spaces—floors, corridors, alcoves, and galleries—filled with the most inflammable substances, can not be regarded as free from grave and constant peril by fire. One careless spark would suddenly show how great a matter a little fire kindleth. The Library may be and is what is called fire-proof, but where there is combustible material in large abundance piled up all around, sufficient at any moment for a quick, hot, and smoking fire no possible building can give absolute security for its contents. The Library is now exposed to this extraordinary and daily increasing risk, and there is not an insurance office in this city that would accept such a risk on any terms less than extra-hazardous.

That new accommodations for the Library of Congress are inexorably demanded is a point no longer open to argument, and a new Library can no more be decently shunned by Congress than a new barn can be shunned by the farmer when the old one is found insufficient for even one-half of his stock.

This Library, while primarily for the use of Congress, is always, as the property of the nation, open to all the people without any ticket of admission, and derives its support, directly or indirectly, from the nation. It is, perhaps, the largest storehouse of human knowledge and of valuable materials for the use of scholars to be found in the United States. We guarantee by copyright to authors in the whole field of American letters their exclusive property, including literary, musical, and artistic productions. Of all these we receive in trust printed copies, and also receive ample fees to compensate the Government for their perpetual preservation. We are paid in advance for keeping the most perfect and complete record of the intellectual progress of our people as traced in "the art preservative of all arts," and its custody is intrusted to our honor and our enlightened sense of propriety. Our duty is obvious, and its neglect can not escape reproach.

I know that the ghosts of some ideas, which have suggested the possible avoidance of a separate Library building by some crude extension of the Capitol, or by finding room where there is none for the enlargement of the Library, still flutter around us, but when approached they will all vanish into "such stuff as dreams are made of." Not one of them will stand the test of a critical examination. There is no scientific trick by which a quart can be put into a pint cup, nor can anything of real or permanent value be gained by a topsy-turvy rearrangement of the existing compartments of the Capitol. Even more objectionable would be monster extensions from the center or from the wings, destructive alike of the beauty of the grounds and of the Capitol itself. All of these suggestions have had their quietus by an examination and an adverse report made by an authorized commission of architects, and if resurrected they will appear in the grave-clothes in which they were buried.

The present Capitol in its general outlines and fine proportions fitly represents the legislative Capitol of the Republic, and is not surpassed, perhaps not even equaled, in its classic simplicity and massive dignity by the legislative halls or parliamentary buildings of any other country. It is the best architectural work we have, an unmistakably legislative structure; and the Congress which should consent to its mutilation or to incongruous additions would earn an unenviable fame. The well-ripened judgment of the people will prove its sufficient protection against all such vagaries.

Were it possible for the two Houses of Congress to surrender room to shelter the slightest expansion of the Library within the present Capitol, and it then should be found such an encroachment or annoyance as to require a prompt removal, as it surely would, we might be told in the language of Æsop's porcupine, "No; let them quit the place that don't like it," and thus Congress would find itself far on the way toward getting temporary accommodations, or a clumsy, inconvenient, insufficient, and very expensive Library in exchange for the loss of a very fine Capitol. We can better defend the propriety of building a new Library than of a new Capitol. Both the Senate and House of Representatives now really need much more room for many purposes, and when a new Library shall be completed only the central part of the present Library will remain for a working library, and the two large wings will at once be utilized as Congress may then determine.

An examination of the present bill will show that it is nearly the same as that perfected by the committee and presented by me February 23, 1883, and provides for a building at much less cost than what had been originally proposed. In other words, the committee, while still seeking to have a creditable and scholarly building, propose a less expensive style of architecture and a less expensive material than granite.

The plan of the exterior of the building now presented is in the Italian renaissance style, stripped of elaborate decorations, instead of the German Gothic, requiring pinnacles, flying-buttresses, and much perhaps for dainty show, and it will involve only about one-half the cost of the previous plan. The building will be characterized by great simplicity, and yet in the elegance of its proportions and quiet dignity it will not prove unworthy of our country, and the interior will be found to possess all of the varied and substantial merits required for extensive and practical use.

The character and merits of the plan will be indicated by the fact that it is the same plan as to the exterior elevations to which was awarded the first premium in a contest under the law of Congress ten years ago with more than thirty distinguished competitors, but now with a different and greatly improved interior arrangement under the advice of our Librarian, or a modification and adaptation of the foremost plans ever presented here or elsewhere known.

In dimensions it will be large and sufficient, 309 by 459 feet, and so designed as to permit extensive future additions of shelf-room without any enlargement of the building for generations to come. For the general reader there will be a central octagonal room one hundred feet in diameter, and other rooms for separate study, for exhibitions of some of the arts, and for various other important purposes, including the copyright and other administrative offices of the Librarian.

In the basement of the building, which will have two-thirds of its height above the level of the sidewalk, there will be rooms for a bookbindery, for bound newspapers, copyright work, packages, janitor, and for other special purposes. Even much smaller libraries have found a bindery not only economical, but nearly indispensable, and here it will be of great and special importance. There will also be an abundance of sunlight. The method of ventilation after much investigation will, it is believed, be of the most approved character, on what is known as the down-draft system, and such as will shield books on the topmost shelves from excessive heat and dust. This system has been adopted and tested elsewhere, and especially by the library of the Brown University at Providence, and that it has been entirely successful is shown by a letter to Mr. Smithmeyer from the librarian, dated December 21, 1883, in which he says:

> In regard to ventilation, what I wish to state is this: After a trial of five years I am satisfied that it is as near perfect as anything of that kind can be. (It is the system you advocate.) At any time during the day a match or paper (burning) applied to the surface of the ventilating shafts will be drawn downward. The temperature of the upper (third) story is precisely that of the lower. This I have verified by a thermometer time and again. Should be pleased to have you call and see for yourself. Facts are better than theories.

This is the testimony of Reuben G. Guild, the librarian, and we could hardly ask for anything better upon this most important and hitherto very troublesome problem.

It will undoubtedly be found practicable with a new Library to keep it open to public use many more hours of the week than heretofore, including evenings, and to this end appropriate means of heating and lighting will be supplied.

The expense of the building, considering its dimensions and its high and permanent character, will not be excessive, and will necessarily be spread over two or three years. After the exterior and central portions of the building are completed a considerable part of the cost may be postponed, as no more of the iron shelving, which is an expensive feature, will need to be supplied than may be required for immediate use; and some share of the inside finish can be postponed without hinderance to its early occupation.

The estimate of the architect, for the building, constructed with limestone or sandstone, with three hundred alcoves, or sufficient for 800,000 or 1,000,000 volumes, with the heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and other fixtures, is $2,323,600. When fully completed there will be seven hundred additional alcoves, which will cost $700,000 more; and the entire completion of the whole interior, including the basement, will require a further sum of $239,000. This is a carefully revised estimate, and shows that the building may be put into a condition of readiness to be occupied with very large accommodations at an expense already mentioned, and when it shall be hereafter completely finished, with a capacity to hold over 3,000,000 books, with facilities for even largely increasing even this vast stock when absolutely necessary, in addition to all of its other extensive and important accommodations, its ultimate cost will be $3,262,600.

This, the committee believe, is not extravagant, and, for a building that is to last for centuries, will be accepted as satisfactory. It will be far less than has been appropriated for public buildings in many other cities, and less than half the cost of the New York post-office; and yet in point of real dignity it ought to be superior to them all.

The cost of the site proposed, under any circumstances not to exceed $550,000, will be, comparatively, exceedingly moderate—less than it would be in almost any other part of this or any other city; and that it will be much the best and most accessible will hardly be disputed. There is and can be no jobbery behind it; nor can any party but the Government profit by its purchase.

Let it be borne in mind that the avenues, streets, and alleys, which will be taken without cost, are more than equal in extent to all the space to be bought and paid for. Beyond this, the value of the materials in the existing buildings and their foundations, which must be sold and removed or used in the construction of the foundations and inner walls of the new library, will be enough to make a very sensible reduction from the gross cost of the site. Preparations for the foundation on such high ground will be inexpensive, and the Library itself will forever be dry and healthy, unwholesome to none of its contents, whether of books or men. Economically considered, therefore, the site is not without solid and most important advantages. It will be worth all it will cost.

Appropriations are not refused for court-houses, post-offices, and custom-houses in near or remote States; and the cost of land alone, $1,491,200 at Philadelphia, $708,036 at Cincinnati, $368,882 at Saint Louis, $553,500 at Baltimore, $1,329,095 at Boston, and other sums at two hundred other places, as well as the cost of buildings, has been heretofore found practically necessary, and does not seem to have been begrudged, though the expenditures may appear to have been often chiefly of local advantage, and only asked for by the constituents of a single Representative or Senator, but when more accommodations are required here for the Library of Congress, an object wholly national, indispensable to Congress, and overflowing with public benefits, we have been subjected to protracted delays and confronted by the doubts of some statesmen, ever pregnant with fault-finding, who are not sure that our surplus of unshelved books might not be more wisely disposed of by a bonfire, as the Dutch get rid of surplus spices; and, if land must be purchased, they feel certain that some uninhabited or yet undiscovered spot or place can be found at a cheaper price.

The land which it is now proposed to acquire is in close proximity to the Capitol, and has been heretofore offered by most of the owners, over their own signatures, on the most favorable terms and for far less than has been paid elsewhere. If any now should be unwilling to part with their property at a reasonable price, it will be fixed by the court or by appraisers appointed by the court. The fact that it has long seemed inevitable that these squares would at some time be taken for public use has had the effect of retarding their improvement and depressing their value. The people of the United States do not desire parsimony in public expenditures for worthy objects when they get the worth of their money, and here the expenditure is not only worthy, but it is in the right place and the value of the acquisition incontestable. If Senators will look at it, or once travel around it, they will see that they can not be cheated in its purchase or condemnation. It is worth more to the United States than to any other parties. If not taken now, as I believe it will be, it will surely be taken by our successors.

When this subject was last considered here, so far as it could be settled by the Senate, the question as to the site of a new Library was settled by a large and a very decisive vote, more than two to one, in favor of taking some of the squares east of the Capitol. There are very few members of the Senate to-day who voted against that location, and of these few it may be hoped not all will now be found opposed to it.

It is evident that, unless we are willing to destroy the most attractive features now surrounding the Capitol, no invasion by any annex, and no offshoot in its front or rear, at one end or the other, can be permitted in any direction or upon any part of the present grounds, which are yearly more and more unfolding their wonderful beauty. We must submit to the conditions which we cheerfully accept everywhere else, and when a site for public use is absolutely required it must be taken and a just compensation paid.

Singularly enough, while there is apparently an unending struggle here in the political capital of the country to retain the few acres which were originally reserved for squares and for a small park, New York, the commercial capital of the country, is applying to the State Legislature for power to purchase large tracts of land for several additional parks. The commission appointed to select lands for these new public parks have made a report to the Legislature, from which I take the following statement:

Paris has 172,000 acres in parks, or one acre to every thirteen inhabitants; in Vienna the proportion is one acre to one hundred persons; in Chicago one to two hundred; in Philadelphia one to three hundred; in Brooklyn one to six hundred and thirty-nine; in New York one to 1,363, but New York proposes to buy 3,808 acres for additional parks, at an estimated cost of $2,000 per acre, or in the aggregate at the cost of $7,616,000. In the city of Washington, outside of the grounds surrounding the White House and the Capitol, and what used to be called the Mall, now strangled by the railroad, the public reservations are deplorably small. The public may be dazed by the multitude of minor triangular reservations at the intersection of the avenues and streets. There are on the plan of the city about two hundred of these pleasing trivialities, but hardly one of them in extent would be more than equal to a site for a common dwelling-house. Though small, they serve, however, to mark and punctuate the magnificent avenues with perennial points of admiration.

The conclusion that I would have drawn from this is not that we should follow the expensive example of New York in buying acres by the thousand for three or four new parks, but that Congress should preserve and protect from all absorption or devastation the very few acres in the meager open spaces which are now left in Washington. This city is destined to be visited, perhaps inhabited, by many persons devoted to professional, literary, and scientific pursuits, by those having more or less culture, who may find it a desirable winter residence; but, destitute of commercial and manufacturing advantages, and without even the shadow of political influence, it is unlikely ever to become, and I hope it never will become, a great and overgrown smoking metropolis. It is, however, most desirable that with clean streets we should have a clean people, and that the city should be distinguished for its wide intelligence, for the high personal character of its citizens, and become a leader among the prosperous cities of a Republic whose people as a whole it may fairly be claimed have more town and private libraries and are the best read of any people in the world.

For a great library a proper site is as essential as a proper building, and this consideration derives prominence now from the fact that some of our best public buildings unfortunately have not proper sites. It may be said that the cheapest site would be the most proper, but that would be an absurdity, as the cheapest might be found on the farthermost limits of the District or on the flats of the Potomac. The site should be conveniently near to the Senate and House of Representatives, and it must have its foundations resting on ground well drained and wholly free from dampness. The site east of the Capitol, contemplated by the present bill, fills all these requirements, and its great superiority over all others has been conceded even by some who have strangely urged that even the best site should not be purchased. It is elevated, dry, and only one square away from the Capitol, or not more than the distance from the Senate to the House of Representatives.

But there may be the embers of a contention that the Library should be placed on some part of the public grounds now owned by the Government. I have for many years had occasion to thoroughly examine that question, and I unhesitatingly say that there are no vacant grounds belonging now to the Government which even the pages of the Senate would recommend for a library site. The most of the existing very limited squares, triangles, and circles were created by the intersection and crossing of streets and avenues, but all these are too remote and insignificant for library purposes, and we have very little, in fact no ground left which is appropriate for any public building. We have, it is true, La Fayette Square, in front of the Executive Mansion, and Franklin Square, on K street, between Thirteenth and Fourteenth streets, but these small squares have been long elegantly laid out and planted with trees and shrubs. Not until Sitting Bull gets elected to Congress need we expect to have the proposition made to use such squares for building sites.

The only public square we ever had large enough to base even a poor argument upon, much less a good library, was Judiciary Square, and that, with only seven votes in its favor, was overwhelmingly rejected by the Senate. Since that the square has, I hardly know how, been jumped upon by the Pension Department, although its occupation by any building, as it seems to me, must be regarded ere long almost as a public calamity. We could not well afford with our limited possessions everywhere to part with so large a part of Judiciary Square in a region where for a mile square there is nothing else. It was an unexpected wrong precipitated upon those who have homes and families in that part of the city.

It is, therefore, a grave error to suppose that we now have anywhere suitable grounds which were reserved for and intended to be occupied by public buildings. The plan of the city was made under the direction of Washington, and where he said "Let there be light and fresh air" it will be better not to be in haste to blot out such vacant spaces with even an architectural display of bricks and mortar. Open spaces, rich in foliage and flowers, are as conducive to the health as to the beauty of the city, and they are all too few for the number of children here, which, during the better half of the year, throng and decorate them with a loveliness beyond the reach even of flowers. They should be wholly and sacredly preserved. The people of this city have some rights which Congress should feel it a point of honor to respect. The Capitol with its grounds has grown to be precious to the eyes of the American people, will grow to be worthy of the great Republic, and if we can do little to exalt it, let us do nothing to drag it down.

It happens that what is now proposed will be most for the advantage of Congress, studying that advantage only, but should it also happen to confer a slight local advantage upon the city of Washington, there is no reason why we should not accept of it for the capital of the whole country as gladly as we all would were it for a building in the capital of any State.

The fees paid into the Treasury on account of records of copyright are increasing every year, and for the past five years were as follows: 1879, $14,689.90; 1880, $16,303.50; 1881, $17,051.50; 1882, $18,554; 1883, $20,000—amounting to $86,898.90.

Hereafter this source of income will annually exceed the sum of $20,000, a sum which will much more than cover the interest on the cost of the site proposed to be purchased for the Library. It will, therefore, be noticed that the Library is an institution which earns a stable and independent cash income, and is at the same time receiving a still larger annual income in books and other publications, valued at not less than $25,000, which costs the Government nothing. Here, then, is an amount of $45,000 this year, and not less every succeeding year, which tends to show that the Library has some just claim to have a house and home large enough to hold the whole of its treasures now and hereafter.

Possibly some may not see their way clear to vote for a new library, as some votes were given in 1815 against the purchase of Mr. Jefferson's library, but all would regard it as a great mistake if the twenty-seven wagon-loads of books from Monticello had not been purchased.

It will be a grave mistake, possibly a calamity, to postpone the construction of a library for a single year; and I urgently ask that the Senate will appreciate the importance of at once taking care of the most valuable Library now existing on the American continent.

Mr. President, I now ask that this bill shall be made the special order for Tuesday next.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The Senator from Vermont asks that the bill under consideration be made the special order for Tuesday next, at 2 o'clock the Chair supposes.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope that this bill, as well as every other one on the Calendar, will be allowed to take its regular course. We have just adopted a system of rules, which in themselves are very fine, to give every Senator and every committee here an opportunity to have his or its bill considered by the Senate in due and proper order. This is not a case of emergency; we have been at this subject for many years; and whether this bill shall be heard at the time designated or whether it shall be two weeks or three weeks later can not affect the welfare of the country.

I shall insist, although it is not a pleasant thing to have to do, that our rules shall be adhered to, so that we can get some benefit from the labors which our Committee on Rules have performed so ably in giving us a better system than we had before.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator will remember that it was the general expression that there would be no dissent to making the bill a special order after this morning if I did not insist on any action at the present time, and I hope the Senator from Alabama will not object.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not want to set myself against the judgment of the Senate about this, but I shall ask a vote upon it. If a special order is made it must be done by a vote.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the bill be made the special order for Tuesday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HAWLEY in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that the bill under consideration be made the special order for Tuesday next, at 2 o'clock.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Under the rule I believe it requires a two-thirds vote to make any matter a special order.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. MORRILL. I did not suppose the motion would be resisted after the general expression in favor of making the bill a special order. I hope there will be no objection. It is a very important bill, and it ought to go to the House early.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 45, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—45.

PAPERS ON THE FILES.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to offer a standing order, to be adopted by the Senate, in reference to the transfer of papers from the files of the Senate to the committees. I wish to inquire whether it will be in order for me now to do so?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, it will be received.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for its present consideration unless some one desires it to lie over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That any papers on the files of the Senate relating to a bill or resolution referred by the Senate to any committee shall be taken from the files and sent to such committee on the written requirement of any Senator addressed to the Secretary of the Senate. But this order shall not apply to the papers in any case which has been reported adversely by a committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of this order?

Mr. INGALLS. Is that proposed by the Senator from Alabama as an addition to the standing rules of the Senate?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. INGALLS. I would suggest to the Senator that perhaps as the full effect may not be understood it had better be referred to the committee.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it be printed then and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made in accordance with Rule XL.

UTE INDIAN RESERVATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under Rule VIII the Senate proceeds to the consideration of bills on the Calendar. The first bill will be reported.

The bill (S. 672) to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes in relation to patents was announced as the first in order.

Mr. HILL. I move to take up Senate bill 241 which was under discussion when 2 o'clock arrived yesterday. It was reached regularly on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose that at this hour a motion to take up the bill which was under consideration yesterday does not cause the one which is ahead of it on the Calendar and which was passed over without prejudice to lose its place, and with that understanding I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it does not lose its place.

Mr. HILL. It will take but a few minutes to dispose of the bill which was under consideration yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 241) to repeal section 8 of an act entitled "An act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same," approved June 15, 1880.

Mr. COCKRELL. There ought to be an amendment, it strikes me at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], "and that the lands referred to in said section are hereby restored to the public domain."

Mr. INGALLS. "And be disposed of under the public land laws of the United States."

Mr. COCKRELL. If they are restored to the public domain they can not be disposed of otherwise.

Mr. HILL. I do not believe there is any necessity for such an amendment. That is the only objection I have to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. It can not do any harm, but makes it explicit.

Mr. HILL. I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

Mr. PLUMB. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Colorado. What was the method prescribed for the disposition of the lands acquired from the Ute Indians, of which this is a part, in the bill which this amendatory of?

Mr. HILL. The act of 1880 provided that the lands which they ceded to the United States should be subject to cash entry only, but this tract as I claim was never a part of the Ute Indian reservation. It was south of the line surveyed and accepted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DURATION OF PATENTS.

The bill (S. 271) for the relief of Louisa Boddy was announced as the next in order.

Mr. PLATT. I suppose Order of Business 41 retains its place, and is properly in order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to call that up now?

Mr. PLATT. I may as well call it up now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order of Business 41, being Senate bill 672, is the regular order.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 672) to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes in relation to patents. It proposes to amend section 4887 of the Revised Statutes so as to read:

"SEC. 4887. No person shall be debarred from receiving a patent for his invention or discovery, nor shall any patent hereafter granted be declared invalid by reason of its having been first patented or caused to be patented in a foreign country, unless the same has been introduced into public use in the United States for more than two years prior to the application; but every patent hereafter granted for an invention which has, prior to the filing of the application for said patent, been patented in a foreign country, shall expire seventeen years from the date of the foreign patent, or, if there be more than one, seventeen years from the date of the earliest foreign patent, and in no case shall it remain in force more than seventeen years; but all applications hereafter made for patents for inventions previously patented in a foreign country, upon the invention of the same person, shall be made within two years from and after the date of such foreign patent, or, if there be more than one, from the date of the earliest foreign patent. No patent granted for an invention which had, prior to the grant of such patent, been first patented in a foreign country, and which has not expired at the date of the passage of this act, shall be declared to be invalid by reason of its not being so limited on its face or in its grant as to expire at the same time with the foreign patent, or, if there be more than one, at the same time with the one having the shortest term; but this section shall in no wise renew, revive, prolong, or extend any patent heretofore granted."

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the chairman of the committee will explain the necessity of this bill.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will ask the chairman to state what change or changes this bill proposes to make in the law as it now exists.

Mr. PLATT. I will take the five minutes to which I am entitled to make a statement which I think will be satisfactory.

The present section 4887 provides that "every patent granted for an invention which has been previously patented in a foreign country shall be so limited as to expire at the same time with the foreign patent, or, if there be more than one, at the same time with the one having the shortest term, and in no case shall it be in force more than seventeen years."

As that law was understood up to a very recent period, and as the laws prior to the act of 1870 undoubtedly were, a patent issued in this country expressed to run for seventeen years was not determined by the expiration of a foreign patent if the application had been first made in this country for the patent. I have no doubt that when the law was drawn that was the intention, that the time of the expiration of a foreign patent granted for the same invention should not shorten the term of the American patent if the American patent was applied for before the foreign patent; but the decisions of the courts under this statute are to this effect: If the foreign patent has been granted before the American patent has been granted, then, although the American patent is granted for seventeen years, it expires at the expiration of the foreign patent.

The terms of patents in foreign countries are various, and they are liable to be forfeited in some countries by the non-payment of tax, by the failure to operate; and the effect of this statute under the construction of the courts is that a patent taken out in a foreign country so determines the term of a patent here that very often the term of the patent here is made to cease at the end of two years or three years or five years or ten years, according to the time during which it is in operation in foreign countries. For instance, in England a patent is granted for fourteen years, and it has to be renewed by the payment of a tax or is forfeited. If the person taking a patent fails to pay the tax, at the end of three years I believe it is, his patent is forfeited, and the American patent which has been granted for the same invention falls to the ground with it. So in Canada, a patent may be taken out for five years, ten years, or fifteen years. If taken out for five years, it may be extended and renewed so that it shall run for ten or fifteen years; but the courts hold that the term of five years for which it is taken out must determine the time for which the American patent shall run. So a man may have just this state of affairs, and I know of a case where just this state of facts existed: A person making an invention applied for a patent to our Patent Office first. He supposed that he was going to get his patent in the United States first. He then made an application for a Canadian patent. Some things delayed his patent here, so that his Canadian patent was first issued just twelve days before. By the decisions of the courts under this statute his United States patent, therefore, expires at the end of five years from the time it was granted, and that although he has renewed the Canadian patent and has got a patent for fifteen years in Canada.

It is manifest that these things are not right. It has grown up out of successive constructions which have been put upon the statute by the courts. Senators will see that there can be no reason in a law which provides in reality that if a person does not patent his invention abroad and gives it to the whole world, except the United States, free, and does patent it here, he can have a term of seventeen years; but if he happens to patent it abroad first and tries to protect himself abroad as he does here, then he is limited by the laws of the country where the patent happens to be first granted in relation to the time to which it shall extend.

There has been quite a pressure brought to bear upon the committee to report a bill which should apply to patents which have already expired by reason of the law as it stands. This the committee declined to do. They make this act applicable simply to the future, and then they say to these persons who feel that particular hardship exists in cases by reason of the determination of their patents by the expiration of the term of a foreign patent that if there are special hardships they must present them to Congress as special cases, but that it would not be wise and right to pass an act which should have reference to what has already taken place, but only with reference to the future.

So far as I know this act meets the approval of everybody who has examined it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to line 23 and the following lines, which seem to me to perpetuate patents which are now invalid and to bring them into life and existence.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator will listen to me a moment I think he will see——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can only proceed by unanimous consent, as his five minutes have expired.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senate will allow me to make the suggestion and the explanation that it may go along with my other remarks it may save time. ["Go on!"] The Senator refers, I think, to the paragraph beginning on line 23. If he will listen to my explanation he will see what that means. Not only have the courts held that patents thus issued in this country for seventeen years are determined by the expiration of the foreign patent, but they have held under this section that if a patent had been granted in a foreign country, no matter whether it had expired or not, and the Commissioner had failed, in writing out the patent, in issuing the letters patent, to state on the face of the letters patent that the patent issued in this country should expire, at the same time as the patent in the foreign country, then the entire patent was invalid from the start, because the patent had not been limited on its face to expire at the time when the foreign patent should expire by reason of the foreign law. All that this clause provides is that no patent shall be declared to be invalid because the Commissioner has not written out on the face of the patent that it shall expire at the time of the expiration of the foreign patent; and the very next lines after that sentence, lines 30 and 31, I think completely meet the fear which the Senator from Missouri has in his mind:

But this section shall in no wise renew, revive, prolong, or extend any patent heretofore granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must call attention to the fact that the hour of 2 has arrived and the unfinished business must be taken up.

Mr. HOAR. I hope if there is any debate on this bill the Senator from Delaware will allow a vote to be taken upon it. I do not think there is to be debate.

Mr. BAYARD. I will with pleasure allow a vote. I have not delayed it by debate.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator misunderstands me. I suggested that the bill which has been up and has been explained may be passed now if there is no objection to it.

Mr. BAYARD. Oh! I misunderstood the Senator. If there is no objection to the bill, let it be voted on.

Mr. COCKRELL. If it goes over now, it will come up to-morrow morning. I want to read the explanation of the Senator from Connecticut. There is no printed report with the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill of the Senator from Connecticut stands at the head of the Calendar and will come up in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, and the Senate proceeds to the unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 19.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 2309) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause the remains of Capt. Walter Clifford, deceased, to be transported to his late place of residence and making appropriation therefor;

A bill (H. R. 2555) to change the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce" to that of "The National La Fayette Bank;" and Joint resolution (H. Res. 152) for the relief of E. H. George and H. W. Walker.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to submit a suggestion which I hope will meet the approval of the Senate. For more than a week this bill has been before the Senate and has been very thoroughly discussed, and I suggest now that at the hour of 4 o'clock debate upon the bill shall cease and that we vote upon the bill and upon such amendments as may then be offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware suggests that by unanimous consent the debate shall cease upon this bill at 4 o'clock to-day. Is there objection?

Mr. CONGER. I am in favor of getting to a final vote on this bill as much as any one, but in the order of business all amendments to the bill itself must be introduced and discussed before we come to a substitute, and I should like to have the last five minutes if I say anything on the substitute submitted by me. I do not know any disposition that any one has to delay progressing as fast as possible with the bill.

Mr. BOWEN. I have offered an amendment to the substitute of the Senator from Michigan, but I have no desire whatever to discuss that substitute at length. I desire, however, to make my own record satisfactory and to explain briefly the reasons for my amendment. I am in favor of the judiciary settling this question, but I am not in favor of this bill as reported by the committee. I shall probably ask fifteen minutes of time to simply explain the reasons why I offered the amendment, and with the understanding that I shall have that time I am willing to adopt the suggestion. Having offered a substitute, I should like to explain why I offered it instead of the bill that comes before us from the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the two Senators to object to the agreement suggested.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not quite understand the statement of the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He declined to assent to the understanding.

Mr. BAYARD. I regret it. I merely wish to say that the pressure of other measures has been suggested to me by Senators having them in charge, and the intimation given that they were getting impatient at the length of time this bill staid before the Senate. It was therefore with a due consideration to public business and to facilitate the conclusion of this measure at some time that I made the suggestion. I expected of course that the Senator from Colorado would make a full explanation of his substitute, and I had no design to prevent it; and as there are two hours from this time to the period proposed I supposed it could well be done.

I may say further that under our present rules it is in order to move at any time to lay an amendment upon the table without affecting the bill, and I propose during this discussion to allow the mover of any amendment fully to explain it, and then to make the motion that I have suggested in order that there may be some limitation upon debate.

As I have said, this bill has been before the Senate for more than a week. On one or two days of the discussion I think the Senator from Michigan was not in the Senate at the time, although measures that he had suggested were referred to in discussion.

But the matter is for the Senate to determine; it has control of its own business; and I made the proposition in the interest of facility, not with the slightest design of preventing discussion on the part of my friend from Colorado, but, on the contrary, welcoming it.

Mr. CONGER. It was only because the substitute which I had offered would be the last thing to be acted upon, with the amendment to it which the Senator from Colorado has offered, that I spoke of it in this way. The remark that the Senate is tired of this business did inadvertently cast some reproach upon the committee in bringing in a bill so little perfected, but I beg to say that the Senator from Massachusetts did not intend to make a very decided avowal of reproach upon the committee that they had not perfected the bill when he said the Senate was tired of it, because, as the gentleman must know, every committee is liable to bring in a bill which may meet with objection and meet with discussion. I make this avowal in behalf of the committee, that they may not consider themselves under the reproach of the Senator from Massachusetts for having brought in such an imperfect bill.

Mr. McPHERSON. Inasmuch as no agreement can be arrived at in respect to the time at which a vote shall be taken upon the bill, and as I agree substantially with the general plan of the bill, but am unalterably opposed to some of its provisions, what few suggestions I want to make upon it had better be made perhaps before the consideration of the substitute is brought before the Senate.

I am in favor of the plan of the bill, leaving the decision of all these cases where it properly belongs, to a judicial tribunal. I have watched the debate with vigilance and have listened to every argument made by the honorable Senators having charge of the bill to find some objection which could be reasonably or fairly urged to the amendment I had the honor to introduce, and I have been unable to find one.

The Senate will remember, not with any degree of pride, it is true, the untoward action of Congress some years ago in granting great blocks of land, amounting to tens of millions of acres, to corporations and individuals. Notwithstanding the gift and the unenumerated evils which have followed as a result, I do not think the honorable Senator from Delaware would for a moment support a proposition which had for its object the despoiling those grantees of one acre of land which they had honestly earned under the contract. How much stronger stands the case of those claiming title under the Mexican grants? We are not only bound to them under the contract of treaty which requires that we shall respect every right, but we occupy a still stronger position and a more responsible one. We are bound to them as trustees in the fulfillment of every particle of that treaty, express and implied.

It is true that here was a royal grant, royal in its magnitude and in its munificence, exciting the admiration of mankind, until our Republican friends undertook to distribute the national domain. Then the grant-makers in Mexico, belittled and abashed, retired to the rear. But I do not understand that the magnitude of a grant or the question of its quantity has ever been considered as influential in a judicial tribunal in testing the right of a man to property.

Let us ask ourselves what, in fact, the Government of the United States acquired under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo? And what perfect rights, if not perfect titles, existed in the territory covered by the treaty?

An answer to the inquiries cannot, I think, be given in better words than those of Chief-Justice Marshall, in a case under the Lousiana purchase in the case of Delassus vs. United States (9 Peters, 118):

> The sovereign who acquires an inhabited territory acquires full dominion over it; but this dominion is never supposed to divest the vested rights of individuals to property.

And in respect to the case then before him he says:

> The inquiry then is whether this concession was legally made by the proper authorities and might have been perfected into a complete title under and in conformity to the laws, usages, and customs of the government under which the same originated, had not the sovereignty of the country been transferred to the United States.

It is evident that in that case Chief-Justice Marshall supposed that he was considering a title that was not complete at the time of the transfer of the sovereignty. It must, therefore, have been an "incomplete title." And in respect to such title he says:

> The right of property then is protected and secured by the treaty, and no principle is better settled in this country than that an inchoate title to lands is property.

He does not intimate that an "incomplete title" is one which the sovereign making the acquisition may complete according to rules and principles of his own devising. The completion is to be, as he says, "in conformity to the laws, usages, and customs of the government under which the same originated."

The United States, then, acquired the political dominion over the territory, but acquired no absolute, unencumbered title to any lands that theretofore were subject to or might be made subject to titles that were either perfect, or inchoate, or imperfect.

We are accustomed to speak of the unoccupied lands of those Territories as public lands; but strictly speaking they are not so, and were not at the time of the transfer of the dominion over them. In the language of Justice Catron, those lands were "encumbered, under the laws of nations, with all the equitable rights of private property therein that they were subject to in the hands of Mexico at the time of their transfer." (Frémont vs. United States, 17 Howard, 567.)

Strictly, then, we have no right to speak of public lands in the acquired territory until every perfect and imperfect or inchoate title has been determined and its limits fixed. When that is done what may remain will be public lands.

We do not stand in the position of giving anything to the parties protected by the treaty, the original grantees, their heirs or assigns. Mexico gave them their rights of property. By the treaty we agree to protect those rights of property, whatever they were, perfect or imperfect, by "guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged to citizens of the United States."

Does this bill, does this seventh subdivision of section 12, protect them in their property by guarantees equally ample as if the same belonged (originally) to citizens of the United States?

It has been supposed that a citizen of the United States having a perfect title to property, or if inchoate or imperfect having a perfect right to complete it, had some guarantee in the Constitution and laws that if his title or right was assailed by private individuals or by the Government, when brought before the courts of the country he could there have what it was his right to have, namely, all questions of fact and of law there determined by the court, not predetermined or prejudiced by any legislative body.

But the United States, having thus pledged its faith in the treaty, would now make itself the assailant in a suit in its own courts, and inform the parties who may there appeal to the guarantees of the treaty that the legislative branch of the Government has determined not very precisely what "imperfect titles" may be, but that it has definitely determined that under the treaty no "Mexicans" nor their "heirs" nor their "grantees" shall ever have a judgment in a United States court on any title under this bill for more than "eleven leagues of land."

Whence does Congress derive the power in a case of private rights to direct a United States court to give a certain interpretation or limitation to the "laws, usages, and customs" of a foreign government? Is that arbitrary power derived from or can it rest upon the "careful consideration" of the body of the laws, usages, and customs of Mexico and Spain that may have been given to them by a committee of this body, however distinguished as experts in Spanish and Mexican laws, usages, and customs they may happen to be?

I believe that lawyers say that foreign laws are to be proved in our courts as facts. Would a provision like this be thought possible or tolerated in any legislation in respect to a case between citizens where the force and effect of a foreign law might be brought in question? Is Congress or our Government so eager, after having seized dominion over that vast country, to now seize title to its domain that we must forget our faith pledged in the treaty and do violence to the rights of those holding titles, either perfect or inchoate, by a disregard of the well-settled rules for the determination of private rights?

As to what were the laws, usages, and customs in respect to grants at the time of the ratification of the treaty and what the colonization laws of Mexico, and whether in force and effect at any certain time, these are all clearly questions for the court; and the parties have a right to the judgment of the court, not of this Senate, upon those questions.

If it is as clear as the gentlemen of the committee, learned in the Spanish and Mexican law, would have us believe, that all "imperfect titles" must be classed under the colonization laws of Mexico and that those laws certainly do not permit a grant of more than eleven leagues, we surely may well leave that question, with the others, where it belongs, to be determined by the court.

Experience in the matter of grants in the Louisiana purchase and in the now State of California has surely informed us that Spanish and Mexican grants are various in form and style, and whether a certain grant may be considered perfect or imperfect, whether under the colonization law or standing independently of it, may be a question.

But the promoters of this bill inform us that where a man has a grant, and has "possession" under it, he is safe. He does not need to come into court under this bill.

But what is "possession?" How far does it extend? Have not our States found it necessary to define by statutes what shall constitute adverse possession? And may not the character and extent of a man's possession of lands in many States be determined somewhat by the question as to whether he has a paper title—whether he has inclosed his cleared land, or used the unclosed woodland?

Now, suppose a Mexican don, in consideration of some distinguished service, or for moneys paid, received a grant from his government years previous to the ratification of the treaty—the land to be selected in New Mexico or Arizona, within certain designated natural boundaries, and to include, say, fifteen square leagues.

Grants somewhat of that character, with boundaries quite undefined, I believe have been found to be not uncommon in our acquired Spanish possessions. The grantee did not have the land surveyed; there were no surveyors in those then wild, arid regions. He did not fence his grant. Fences were not required. He put his rancheros there. They grazed his flocks and herds along a water course and over a mesa; sometimes within the limits of his supposed grant, sometimes outside of it. He or his legal representatives are there to-day in about the same condition. What kind of a title has he, perfect or imperfect; and how extensive is his possession? If his title is considered by the court as imperfect, he can only have judgment for eleven leagues under this clause. If his title is considered perfect by the court, he is to be dismissed from the court without any judgment as to the extent of his right under his declared perfect title.

But, say the committee, if there be any cases of hardship caused by our determination to limit the court to decide on all the facts and law in the cases, the aggrieved party can come and supplicate the kindly consideration of Congress and Congress will doubtless relieve him. Indeed! And how has Congress been accustomed to relieve such supplicants? And by what right does this Congress assume to say to these parties having rights guaranteed by the solemn sanction of international treaty, rights capable of being properly and justly determined in the courts of the country, "You must get out of court, but you may come to some succeeding Congress and doubtless it will of its grace confirm your right?"

Is Congress the forum for decision indicated by the guarantees of the treaty? Most assuredly not. Would legislation like this be attempted in any other cases where the rights of individuals came in conflict with some supposed residuary rights of the Government? In this District we had, I believe, some time since a question as to whether private parties owned the water-front on the Potomac. Suppose Congress had attempted to determine that while the court might consider the question no judgment should be rendered in the case that permitted the lines of any person's grant to come within 100 feet of low-water mark. Who would propose such a measure? And yet these Mexicans and their heirs and assigns in these remote Territories have guarantees equally ample with the citizens of this District; guarantees that we are bound sacredly to regard.

A conflict in Government grants is not an unprecedented thing. Look at land titles in West Virginia; lapping sometimes three deep; unsettled for quite a century. Did it ever occur to any old Virginia jurist that the speedy, easy, and just way of determining the conflicts would be by enacting that the courts should recognize no man's claim to more than five hundred acres? (That would be about the relative scale of land grants by the governments of Virginia and old Spain and Mexico.) And, then, all parties who might feel aggrieved could come to the Legislature for its sympathy and await its mercy!

In the acquisition of a country that had been settled for about three centuries perhaps the presumption might well be that all its lands had been granted and were subject to private rights if not in actual occupation. What right have we to start with the presumption that they were, or that a large proportion of them were, public lands, and upon that presumption proceed to throw any parties holding grants, or rights of whatever nature, upon the mercy of a Congress that represents the other party in interest to the contest?

The policy of Mexico has been referred to. In respect to grants the policy of Old Spain and Mexico is well known to have been most liberal. The colonization law of Mexico was only a part of it. That never precluded the supreme power of the national government from making grants. How often that power may have been exercised we can not here know. If exercised by "rightful authority," it conveyed a perfect right—a right which we, under the treaty, are bound to protect and execute. If anything whatever remained to be done after the making of the grant it only remained as an official duty, which we, as the successors of Mexico, are, by our proper officers, under the guarantees of the treaty, bound to discharge.

Why should any grantees of lands be required to come to Congress? That they may upon the one hand be charged with importunity and lobbying, or, on the other, be subjected to spoliation under the supposed popular cry of protecting the public domain!

Congress is no place to try land titles either great or small. It is no place to try them whether they be few or numerous. If in a certain class of cases the number be few, the courts can readily dispose of them; if numerous, surely Congress ought not to be hereafter troubled with them. If Senators wish to close this business by referring it to the courts, where it belongs, let us do so justly, honorably, impartially, and let the courts decide all the cases and all the questions involved.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the bill the following as additional sections:

SEC. —. That all the right and title of the United States to the land in the Rio Grande Valley and elsewhere in the Territory of New Mexico occupied and possessed by persons who, or whose ancestors or grantors, became citizens of the United States by reason of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, be, and the same are hereby, relinquished and granted to the person or persons who have been in the actual bona fide occupancy or possession of said land, by themselves or their ancestors or grantors, for fifty years next preceding the date of the passage of this act; and it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of New Mexico to hear and determine, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the rights of the parties claiming under this act; and for that purpose the register and the receiver shall have power to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony relative to such occupancy or possession: Provided, That no claim as aforesaid shall be of any validity under this act unless it shall have been duly filed with the said surveyor-general two years after the passage of this act: And provided further, That this grant shall not extend to any reservation of the United States, nor prejudice any valid adverse right or claim, if such exist, to said land, or any part thereof, nor preclude a judicial examination and adjustment thereof, and shall not extend to any tract of land exceeding eighty acres in quantity.

SEC. —. That whenever it shall have been determined by the said surveyor-general, or, on appeal, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office or Secretary of the Interior, that any tract has been occupied as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general for said Territory to cause the said claims to be surveyed in accordance with the lines of such occupancy, and to furnish approved plats of the same, upon the receipt and approval of which said plats, and field-notes thereof, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, patents shall issue as in other cases.

SEC. —. That any part or parts of said designated lands that are not shown, to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to have been so occupied for fifty years shall be held by him as open to settlement under the provisions of the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States, and patents may be issued therefor for any number of acres not exceeding eighty that parties complying with said legal provisions may desire to hold: Provided, That all existing occupants that have settled on said lands within a period of less than thirty years shall have the prior right to acquire the same under the homestead laws of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. I have sent for the Senator from Kansas in order that he may be present when the vote is taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has also sent for him.

Mr. BAYARD. I will merely remark that this amendment contains the text of a bill introduced by the Senator from Kansas and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims on the 21st of January. It relates to a large class of small holdings in that Territory, and the committee have not yet had time to consider whether a bill should be reported for the purpose of especially protecting that class of occupants of small tracts of land who, according to the explanation of the Senator yesterday, have no muniments of title, and rely entirely upon verbal or traditionary licenses to possess and occupy rather than any formal title. But the amendment contains a doctrine in regard to which I hope the Senate will pause long before they agree, and that is that the statute of limitations shall be applicable against the Government. That never has been the law of the United States. I do not think it has been the law of any country with institutions similar to our own. Long ago, in 1832, the Supreme Court of the United States laid down this doctrine:

It is a well-settled principle that the statute of limitations does not run against a State. If a contrary rule were sanctioned, it would only be necessary for intruders upon the public lands to maintain their possessions until the statute of limitations shall run; and then they would become invested with the title against the Government, and all persons claiming under it. In this way the public domain would soon be appropriated by adventurers. Indeed it would be utterly impracticable, by the use of any power within the reach of the Government, to prevent this result. It is only necessary, therefore, to state the case in order to show the wisdom and propriety of the rule that the statute never operates against the Government. (Lindsey and others vs. The Lessee of Miller, 6 Peters, 673.)

This is not only the statement of a rule familiar to us all but it is a statement of the reasons for the rule as applied to the public lands.

I trust, therefore, under no show of a special mercy towards the small holders, for whose protection this bill has been in a large degree designed, will Congress consent to the adoption of a principle which all governments have held it necessary to deny in relation to the sovereignty.

I do not care to prolong the debate or the controversy on this measure. I am ready therefore that the Senate shall act upon the pending question. I consider while there is much in the theory of this amendment which I can understand as appealing to one's sense of commiseration for those who have no muniments of title, mere possession of small holdings, yet those possessions must have been under color of law or title to create such an occupation as the law favors, and which can ripen into a title recognizable in law. A man going into possession of the public land not having color of title can gain no title by any lapse of time. Mere possession will not enable him to maintain a suit against one who enters under title from the Government.

The amendment proposes (and there is an amendment suggested by the honorable Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to the same effect) to allow their ancestors or grantors that means, when stated conversely, their heirs or assigns, for the grantor, whether it be by deed of gift or of sale, or the word "ancestor," which implies inheritance, and amounts to this that a party can by mere possession gain title to public lands as against the Government or its grantee.

Sir, it would be the adoption of a very dangerous rule and is in violation of the established rule of this Government and lead to the overthrow of the sovereign power by the mere lapse of time without color of law or grant. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. PLUMB. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Delaware to chapter 34 of the acts of the Forty-third Congress, second session, wherein he will find that precisely this question was settled by the passage of a bill which came from the Private Land Claims Committee.

Mr. BAYARD. Is that the same reference the Senator made yesterday?

Mr. PLUMB. The same one I made yesterday.

Mr. BAYARD. In regard to titles in Arizona?

Mr. PLUMB. In regard to titles in Arizona.

Mr. BAYARD. I read it in the RECORD this morning and heard it yesterday.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that is a complete answer to the objection the Senator makes about the question of acquiring title by limitation.

In view of the fact that there seems to be a recognition generally that something should be done to protect these people, I think it is incumbent upon the Committee on Private Land Claims either to assent to the amendment or to propose something else which will accomplish the same purpose. Manifestly the bill does not accomplish the desired end and was not intended so to do. If we are to legislate upon this question, why should we not attend to it at once? We shall not recur to this question again. If we do not protect these people now, they will not receive protection, but in the progress of the execution of the provisions of this bill they will be practically dispossessed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I wish to say a single word. I do not suppose there is any country in the world, either Spain, England, or any other, where an adverse possession of fifty years is not a good title. If there is, I have never read nor heard of it. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas simply proposes to affirm that fact as a proposition of law. I think it ought to be sustained. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. PLUMB. At the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] I will amend my amendment by inserting after the words "New Mexico," in line 3 of the first proposed section, the words "and in the State of Colorado;" so as to read:

That all the right and title of the United States to the land in the Rio Grande Valley and elsewhere in the Territory of New Mexico and in the State of Colorado, occupied and possessed by persons, &c.

His statement to me was that there are, and I have no doubt there are, a large number of people in the State of Colorado similarly situated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to amend his amendment as will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 3 of the first section of the proposed amendment, after the word "New Mexico," insert "and in the State of Colorado;" so as to read:

That all the right and title of the United States to the land in the Rio Grande Valley and elsewhere in the Territory of New Mexico and in the State of Colorado occupied and possessed by persons who or whose ancestors or grantors became citizens of the United States by reason of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo be, and the same are hereby, relinquished and granted to the person or persons who have been in actual bona fide occupancy or possession of said land, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas to his own amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MAXEY. I would suggest to the Senator from Kansas, in line 9 of his amendment, between the words "grantors" and "for," to insert "continuously." That would leave it beyond all doubt.

Mr. PLUMB. That is entirely acceptable.

Mr. MAXEY. The object I have in view is that the possession spoken of shall be continuous possession.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Kansas by inserting after "grantors," in line 9, "continuously."

Mr. MAXEY. I would also add it, if the same amendment is necessary, to make the language harmonious in another part of the section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will examine that for himself. The Chair is hardly authorized to direct such a correction. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, irrespective of the merits of this proposition, which, as I said before, has been submitted to the Senate and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims as Senate bill 1209, which is now pending before the committee and being there duly considered, I object to its being ingrafted upon the present bill. We are simply here providing legal machinery for testing the right in judicial tribunals of every claimant, great or small, providing for absolute equality before the law, giving the opportunity for the first time sn the history of this country's legislation with regard to this class of property for the private claimants to intervene in all cases to protect their interests.

I have here on my table a statement made by a party in interest before the public land commission of the United States in which he says that:

> The Government should enforce the construction of the laws in conflict with private grants by allowing settlers to intervene. The settlers are always posted in regard to getting testimony; but if the settlers are ruled out of court all sorts of perjury will be committed against the Government. Settlers who cultivate the soil can not fight unscrupulous speculators in the courts at their own expense, as they have all they can do to improve their farms to raise a scanty living for their families through hardships from early settlement. Speculators always reside in towns and cities, who care nothing for the settler except to sponge the price of the land out of him without any right or equitable title.

This man is one of the many who have complained, and it is in response to what I believe to be the just demand of this class of claimants that this bill has been framed. Now comes the proposition of the Senator from Kansas without any regard to the framework of this bill and proposes to ingraft a statute of limitation to quiet what? Not to quiet titles under the treaty, but simply to quiet possessory titles by raising the bar of the statute against the Government of the United States itself or those claiming under it. I hope the Senate may see that it is inconsistent, incongruous with the measure now before the Senate to ingraft this provision upon it, and that the question is a very serious one whether you will now reverse that policy of this Government and I say of all civilized governments heretofore pursued, and that is not to let the bar of the statute run against the Government.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, twenty years' actual continuous possession even at common law raises a presumption of right, and in sixty years raises a conclusive presumption of right. Twenty years' possession is good against a writ of possession, and sixty years against a writ of right. So far, the common law. But it has been said that no time runs against the king. That is perfectly true; but I ask here where we are making a statute and a man has been in the continuous actual possession of the survey on which he is, he and those under whom he claims for fifty years peaceably occupying it without let or hinderance on the part of the Government or anybody else, is it just and fair on the part of the Government on a mere naked legal title to turn that man out?

This bill all the way through and the entire argument all the way through refers to grants, and the treaty refers to grants and says grants shall be confirmed. In the case which I put the other day and in many other cases where the title by long occupation and use and possession would be in any court regarded as a good title there is not a grant, because the Government has not technically parted with the legal title; and it is to reach that class of cases that the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is presented, and I think properly. It will save hundreds and thousands of the small settlers who have taken up parts of an eleven-league grant, for example, where the out-boundary has been made and it turns out to cover more than eleven leagues. There has been no actual parting with the legal title by the Government; and inside of the exterior boundaries of the grant have grown up villages and farms, the holders all claiming under that eleven-league claim. They have had possession not only for fifty years but from that up to one hundred and two hundred years; and yet on the theory of the bill these honest men are turned out and the rest of the land goes to some speculator who is waiting to grab the hard earnings of those who with their ancestors have been on the land for two or three centuries. I do not think that is right. While I am as much in favor of striking at fraudulent claims as any man can be and believe that fraud ought to be cut up by the roots, yet there is no reason for striking down the just with the unjust. If you can find men who are honestly entitled to have their homes and the roofs over their heads protected, protect them, and now and here is the right time and place, in my judgment, to do that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I feel that I owe an apology for occupying any time on this question, but I do want to state briefly what seems to me to be the true aspect of the question.

By this bill we have proposed to subject to the severest scrutiny all of these Mexican and Spanish grants; we have provided every means known to the law for testing these grants, so that none of them shall be confirmed except those that are bona fide grants from Mexico or Spain. We have provided the means for ascertaining the bounds of the grants so that they may not be spread over territory not originally fairly included within the descriptions contained in the grants. Now, when under this bill any grantee from Spain or Mexico has established his claim to a particular tract of land under the treaty, I insist we have no power to say as against that claimant and grantee that any occupier or squatter upon any part of his grant shall control or have the land he is residing on. We have no more right to do it than by bill to establish the claim of any interloper or squatter upon the land of any Senator. We must leave the question between those occupiers of land which may be confirmed under any grant to litigation between those persons and the person in whose behalf the grant is confirmed. If as against the owner of that grant there has been such adverse possession as the courts would recognize, then that party will be secure in his holdings under the protection of the statute of rest; and if he has not been holding adversely, but has been holding under the grant, then the confirmation of the grant secures his title which is held under the grantee. So that as to any of these settlers who may find themselves upon grants which are confirmed by the court after these adverse proceedings have been instituted and been brought to a determination, I submit that Congress has no power to change the legal relations of the grantee and that person occupying a portion of the land.

But as to the public domain of the United States which is not found to be included in any of these grants, if there shall be upon that domain any bona fide settlers who under the loose laws of Mexico or Spain went upon this property supposing they had a right to make a home upon it and have dwelt there for the period mentioned in the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, for one I am in favor of releasing the rights of the Government of the United States to those persons. I am told there are many such men who have twenty or forty acres of land upon which they have a little vineyard. I think it would be unbecoming in the Government of the United States to set up title against these poor people. Therefore, as I said yesterday, if the Senator from Kansas will so amend his proposition as that it shall be distinctly limited to the public lands of the United States which we have a right to dispose of, to give or sell as we may please, and shall instead of establishing present title in these people simply secure them against the intrusion of any person who attempts to come in under the laws of the United States and jump their claims until we can have a report from the surveyor-general as to the rights in the particular case—that sort of a proposition I think would meet with general approval. It protects everybody that we have a right to protect, every one who is upon any land which the Government owns; but the question is whether this amendment may not extend, if it is carried in the form proposed, to the grants which are confirmed which are decided to be private property and to have been private property since the original grant, and certainly we can not honestly undertake to give away any portion of the grants which are thus confirmed. But as to the public lands, as I have said we have a right to say that as to those bona fide settlers who have dwelt so long upon the land that no intruder shall disturb their possession and when we have secured from the surveyor-general a report we shall then be in a position to pass a law which shall confirm to those of them who show an equitable right these little holdings which they have been possessed of so long.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Indiana could have no doubt about the amendment which I proposed covering just precisely the land he speaks of and no other, because the very first words are "that all the right and title of the United States to the land," &c., not purporting to grant any other title except that which the United States has.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to the Senator that this bill deals with some cases, or it has been said to deal with some cases, where the title of the claimant is an equitable one, where it might be held that the fee was in the United States; and, if so, certainly this language might be construed to pass that title of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senator from Indiana will agree that a measure of that kind should not be ingrafted upon the present bill. It is perfectly competent to make a separate and a carefully drawn measure that will meet this class of cases; but we are really now passing upon a different subject. The suggestion of the Senator from Indiana should be properly framed and can be properly framed in a separate measure. This amendment now of the Senator from Kansas in the shape of a separate measure is before the Committee on Private Land Claims, and it only went there two weeks ago.

Mr. HARRISON. I would say to the Senator that it does not seem to me that the objection of irrelevancy lies to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas. We are dealing here with lands derived from Mexico under the treaty; we are assuming to confirm lands which were granted under the treaty. Now, in connection with that we find certain Mexican citizens, who came to us with the land, in the possession of certain small tracts of land. It seems to me that it is germane; and as the fate and final result upon a bill which is yet to be reported may be quite uncertain in this Congress, for one, being friendly to the bill as I have shown in what I have said upon it from the beginning, I would be willing to ingraft such an amendment as I have suggested.

Mr. MAXEY. The amendment of the Senator from Kansas, in my judgment, is not only strictly germane, but is proper to go on this bill. Why? The bill relates to grants, and I beg Senators not to become confused about the meaning of the word "grants." The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo refers to "grants." Of course, every lawyer will concede that whatever title the private citizen had when Augustin Iturbide overturned the Spanish Government in 1821 remained in the citizen under the Iturbide government, and when that in turn was overturned by the republic in 1824 the precise character of title that the citizen had in his land remained in him; and when, on the 2d of February, 1848, that country passed to the United States, whatever character of title the citizen had under the Mexican laws remained in him under the laws of the United States.

Now suppose that the citizen had acquired an equitable title from the Mexican Government—and that is the very class of cases I am trying to protect—suppose he had filed his petition, his land had been surveyed, he had been put in the actual possession of that land, but a grant had not passed from the government; the legal title was still in the government. In that condition the rights of Mexico ceased because the country had become the property of the United States; the equitable title of the occupant remained in him under the laws of the United States, but the legal title passed to the Government of the United States from Mexico.

The object of the Senator from Kansas, as I understand it, is that the United States shall be divested of any claim of title that she may have for the class of people who have been in the continuous, actual, peaceable, undisturbed occupation of their soil for fifty years under their claim. Is not that right? You may talk to me about no time running against the king, but I say that no government on this earth would be just to its citizens that would avail itself of mere naked technicalities. It is not the case of a squatter; it is the case of a man who has an equitable claim to the land, and who is in possession under an equitable claim with the legal title only remaining in the Government; and it would be unjust on the part of this Government to assert its naked legal title to strip him of land which he had been honestly occupying for fifty years under a survey and under a claim from the former government, emanating under the laws of Spain or Mexico as the case may be. I say it would not be just to the man to strip him of this land because there happened to be a little surplus in the quantity included between the exterior boundaries of his grant. But that is the effect of this, because this bill says in terms that no claim shall be allowed for a larger amount than eleven leagues, and it is true that in many instances men were in the honest occupancy of a survey which was more than eleven leagues long under an eleven-league claim. They have been there for fifty years constantly occupying it, and no one has interfered with them. The Government of Mexico has not interfered with them. The Government of the United States has not interfered with them up to the present time. Now, what will you do? Railroads have made the land valuable, and you propose to strike at the just with the unjust, you propose to strike down the honest poor man along with the fraudulent thieves and scoundrels who have been moving out their lines and making eleven leagues cover two million acres. Sir, while you strike at them, let an honest and upright Government protect the poor man. The amendment does it, because if a man has been in the actual undisturbed possession and occupation of the soil under his marked bounds for fifty years he ought not to be interfered with, and the amendment is not only germane but in my judgment it is honest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I may be excused for saying a single word (which I am sorry to feel it a duty to do) on this main amendment, I should like to call the attention of the Senate again to what my friend from Indiana has referred to, that this amendment as it stands will clearly oust the Mexican grantee or the Spanish grantee from his possession that we are bound to make good under the treaty against a fifty years' occupation of somebody who may have trespassed upon his lands, which is undertaking to determine by an act of Congress questions of private rights between two citizens.

I hope for that reason as well as for others that I might suggest in regard to dangers even as to the public lands that my friend from Kansas, whose good wishes to these settlers the Committee on Private Land Claims sysmpathize with most earnestly, will allow this matter of the Mexican grants per se to be disposed of by itself, and that we immediately proceed—for I am sure the committee will report in a week or two upon the other branch of the question about these settlers on the public lands or those that turn out to be public—to leave that to be carefully considered by the committee with such assistance as we can get from my friend from Kansas and others who are acquainted with the matter, and not in the haste of considering amendments that are offered in the Senate that have not been carefully talked over in a committee embarrass us and do injury where we are trying to do good.

Certainly I am confident on the first point I have made that it would be extremely unjust as well as dangerous to agree to the amendment in the form in which it now stands.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I now offer an amendment to come in at the close of the bill as a separate section.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

SEC. —. That all the public lands of the United States in the Rio Grande Valley and elsewhere in the Territory of New Mexico and in the State of Colorado, occupied and possessed by persons who, or whose ancestors or grantors, became citizens of the United States by reason of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and occupied by any person or persons who have been in the actual bona fide occupancy or possession of said land, by themselves or their ancestors or grantors, for fifty years next preceding the date of the passage of this act, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from entry and sale under the laws of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of New Mexico to hear and determine the rights of the parties claiming such parcels of land, and to report all the facts to the Secretary of the Interior. Said surveyor-general shall have power to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony relative to such occupancy or possession: Provided, That all claims under this act shall be filed with the said surveyor-general within two years after the passage of this act: And provided further, That no claim shall be so heard or examined exceeding eighty acres in quantity.

Mr. BAYARD. I will merely say that that is to-day the subject of a separate bill now pending before the Private Land Claims Committee, who are disposed to give it early and as far as I know favorable consideration; but I am not prepared upon a measure of this kind to accept such an amendment. I hope therefore it will not be adopted.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas, as well as I can understand it from the reading of it, is in the line of the suggestion I have been making once or twice. It does not undertake to confirm title in anybody. It would not make any difference if by its terms it extended to all the land that may be covered by these grants, because it simply says that the lands are reserved from sale—that is all—and directs the surveyor-general to inquire into and report as to the equitable right of the class of persons described in the amendment. It parts with no title, it interferes with nobody's title, but simply says that intruders shall not jump these little claims, and that it is reserved for the future consideration of Congress after we have the report of the surveyor-general.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when Mr. KENNA's name was called). I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. KENNA] with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CALL. I am requested by my colleague [Mr. JONES, of Florida] to announce that he is detained from the Senate by sickness.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 23; as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. LAPHAM. I offer a substitute for section 11, which I send to the desk.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 11 and to insert in lieu thereof:

All claims which may be prosecuted under the provisions of this act shall be forever barred unless a petition shall have been filed as hereinbefore provided within three years after notice on the part of the United States to the claimant requiring such claimant to institute proceedings as aforesaid: Provided, That minors, married women, and persons non compos mentis shall have three years after the removal of their respective disabilities in which to make their claims under the provision of this act after such notice.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. President, I am in full sympathy with the purpose of the Committee on Private Land Claims in providing some mode of quieting these titles, and I should be glad to see the provisions of this bill in such a form as to be able to support it. I can not do it in the present condition of the measure. The common-law bill, the bill to quiet titles, as it is termed, was a remedy for the repose of titles. In the State of New York we have dropped all those proceedings; we have a statutory provision which was framed by the late John C. Spencer, which has been in operation in that State since the year 1830. It provides in the main, as this bill is designed to provide, for a party in possession of real estate summoning all claimants in hostility to his title to come into court and have the question tried. It is denominated—the title of the law in that State is "A proceeding to compel the determination of claims to real property." It is a somewhat summary proceeding in the State of New York, although after the parties are all brought into court the provisions of the statute relating to actions of ejectment are made applicable to the trial and determination of the case. If this bill were designed, although in the form of a proceeding in equity, to reach the same result in a somewhat summary way, I should have much less difficulty with it than I have now and I should be able to give it my cheerful support.

I have been looking at the first section of this bill to see if I could determine upon whom it is operative, and the best interpretation I can give to it is that every person in possession of land under a claim of title from either the Mexican or Spanish Government whose claim has not been confirmed by act of Congress or otherwise finally decided upon lawful authority is bound to institute a legal proceeding under this act under the peril of losing his land.

Now, Mr. President, we see at a glance the magnitude of the scope of this bill thus interpreted, and I can give it no other interpretation. It has been said in the course of this discussion that more than a thousand claims have been presented under the laws of Congress, and to a certain extent adjudicated, the boundaries ascertained; the public officers have reached their conclusions, and reported them. But all those claims, as appears by the later provisions of the first section, are not to be regarded as in any way determining the right of individuals in possession of those lands. The petition is to state "whether the said claim has heretofore been confirmed, considered, or acted upon by Congress." Why should a person come into court under this bill on a petition stating that his claim has been confirmed by an act of Congress when the preceding provision of the bill expressly stipulates that those whose titles have thus been confirmed are not to proceed under this act? The petition is to state—

Whether the said claim has heretofore been confirmed, considered, or acted upon by Congress, or the authorities of the United States, or been heretofore submitted to any authorities constituted by law for the adjustment of land-titles within the limits of the said territory so acquired, and by them reported on unfavorably or recommended for confirmation, or authorized to be surveyed or not.

So it will be seen that a thousand claims, and probably five times a thousand claims, will be required to be prosecuted under the provisions of this act if it shall become a law. We have knowledge of the fact that of the thousand claims unacted on only seventy-one or seventy-two come within the term of having been finally decided or confirmed by act of Congress. Therefore all the rest of these claims are open for litigation.

To whom does this statute address itself? To every one of the claimants to land under grants from either of the governments who were parties to the treaties. They are all obliged to go first into their local courts; from there, if it be a Territorial court, they are obliged to go to the circuit court, and from the circuit court they are to come to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States, the United States being a party to every one of these proceedings, and having the right to come here by appeal, is to take jurisdiction of them as an original action, to retry them all upon both the questions of fact and the questions of law.

Why, Mr. President, you pass this bill in its present form with this right of appeal to the court of last resort, and there is no man living who will see the end of the Calendar in the Supreme Court of the United States; our grandchildren would not live to see it. Think of bringing witnesses from all these Territories to the city of Washington to testify before the Supreme Court upon these issues as to title! That is what this bill provides for. These questions are all to be opened as original questions; they are all to be retried here. I am sure in this respect this bill ought not to receive the favorable consideration of the Senate.

To whom, then, I repeat, is this proposition addressed? It is addressed to that class of land-holders who have been in possession of grants from the Government of Spain or the Government of Mexico almost time out of mind, men who have been reposing upon their titles for centuries. They are all invited by this bill to come into court, and obliged to come into court at the peril of losing their titles unless they do so, and have them established.

The amendment I have offered is designed to remedy the difficulties of this bill in one respect. It relates to the statute of limitations that is proposed to be interposed by the eleventh section. That section as recommended by the committee absolutely bars every claim to lands in these Territories and States unless petitions are filed within three years after the passage of this act. Here are persons who have been, as I have said, and their ancestors, occupying these lands for centuries, or for half a century or quarter of a century. They know nothing of the passage of this law; they may not even hear of the passage of the law within the three years; they are in remote sections; they are living in the confidence that they are safe; that their title is good, nobody has ever questioned it; and yet there may be an antagonism to the title which, after the lapse of three years, by this section as it is proposed, would cut them off forever.

The amendment I have offered is designed to require the United States to be the mover in this matter and to call upon every person in possession of the land to come into court and commence his proceeding, and if after notice to do that, after being required to do that, he refuses for three years to do so, then his claim shall be barred. It seems to me this is not unreasonable. We are passing this law for the purpose of ascertaining what proportion of these lands are the public domain. We are acting to a certain extent in hostility to the land grants secured by the treaty, and therefore, if we desire to shut out any claimant as against the United States from holding his land, we should move upon him and give him notice of this law and of the requirement that he shall institute proceedings under it.

I may not have exactly the appropriate language to accomplish what I have in view, but my idea is that before this bar shall commence to operate the Government shall advise the occupant that his title is in peril or may be in peril. Let the Government say to the occupant, "You must commence; we have passed a law to enable the courts to determine as between you and us, and as between you and anybody else, whether your title is valid or not; we have passed a law the design of which is to be a statute of repose as to all these titles; now we call upon you to avail yourself of the provisions of the law, and unless you do it within three years the doors of the courts are to be barred forever against you." What harm is there in requiring this much on the part of the Government? Why should not something of this kind be done before the statute of limitations begins to operate upon the occupants of these lands?

I do not wish to occupy time, there has been so much time consumed in the discussion of this bill. I have thus stated briefly the difficulties of the bill as they occur to me and the reasons why I suggest this substitute for the eleventh section. The latter part of my amendment is the clause introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] yesterday and adopted by the Senate. That is the exception of minors, married women, and persons non compos mentis. The Senate has passed upon that portion of my amendment. My amendment is designed to provide that the statute shall not commence to operate as a statute in bar of a claim until the Government has given notice to the occupant to institute proceedings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM].

Mr. BAYARD. I will merely state that the bill already provides a reasonable and well-guarded statute of limitation with the usual exceptions in favor of persons under legal disabilities.

These claims, it seems to me the Senator has forgotten, are thirty-six years old under the treaty or thirty-one years old under the Gadsden purchase. It is not the case of a sudden interposition of the bar of the lapse of time upon an unconsidered class of claims, but for more than a generation these claims have been well understood, have been pursued, have been acquired, and are thoroughly well understood in the public mind. The land commission have expressly stated as one reason for the growth of difficulty on this subject the lack of a bar of limitation upon such suits.

The committee carefully considered this point. They reported a reasonable and just period of delay, up to the beginning of which every man having a claim could readily present it in an inartificial, simple, easy manner. What is the reason that this is not sufficient? The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] suggested that persons non compos mentis, of nonage, under legal disability, should have the usual time after the expiration of the three years within which to bring their claims, and the Senate has adopted that amendment.

What, then, is the present idea of compelling the United States to give a notice? A notice to whom? To these parties, who may or who may not be ascertainable. The bill permits any man or set of men, owning or claiming much or little, to prefer their claim in their own way, setting it forth truly before a court of the locality, and it then gives them more than usual opportunity for the expedition of the final hearing of their case.

I submit that this being thoroughly provided for, the rights of infants, married women, and persons non compos mentis having been protected by the amendment of the Senator from Texas, there is no longer any necessity for further amendment in this case, and I trust the Senate will not agree to it.

Mr. LAPHAM. It seems to me that the honorable Senator is not quite right in saying that this is not a statute of limitations sprung suddenly and for the first time. The occupants of these lands have never had any notice or any reason to suppose that action hostile to their rights in the nature of this statute of limitation was contemplated by the Government. The very fact that they have been allowed for half a century to occupy those lands without any effort to establish their title or to defeat their title leads to the very opposite results. They are in repose; they are quiet; they are unaware of what is going on and of the hazards which this bill throws in the way of their claims.

What harm is there in requiring that this notice shall be given? Half of these occupants, perhaps two-thirds or three-fourths of them, could not read this bill if it were enacted into a law unless it should be translated into the language with which they are familiar. Men may lose their titles under the eleventh section of the bill, as the committee have proposed it, in utter ignorance of the opportunity furnished by it to come into court and to establish their titles.

There certainly is no harm in requiring the Government which institutes these proceedings to give notice to a claimant that he must proceed if he wants to save himself. It is a very simple thing to do. That is all my amendment provides, and all that I think is necessary to make this proposed statute (which as I said at the outset is a statute of repose) operative after three years upon all those who do not come into court after they shall have had notice and an opportunity to do so. To cut them off without that is conduct on the part of the Government which I think is to be severely censured.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM].

Mr. BAYARD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. Let the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out section 11 and to insert in lieu thereof:

All claims which may be prosecuted under the provisions of this act shall be forever barred unless a petition shall have been filed, as hereinbefore provided, within three years after notice on the part of the United States to the claimant requiring such claimant to institute proceedings as aforesaid: Provided, That minors, married women, and persons non compos mentis shall have three years after the removal of their respective disabilities in which to make their claims under the provisions of this act after such notice.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask the Secretary to read the text of the bill which it is proposed to strike out.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That all claims which are by the provisions of this act authorized to be prosecuted shall, after three years from the taking effect of this act, if no petition in respect to the same shall have been filed as hereinafter provided, be deemed and taken, in all courts and elsewhere, to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred: Provided, That minors, married women, and persons non compos mentis shall have one year after the removal of their respective disabilities within which to make their claims under the provisions of this act.

Mr. LAPHAM. The Senate will see that there is only one point of difference between my amendment and the section as it now stands. The section as it now is makes this statute operative from the day we pass the law, while my amendment makes the statute operative from the day the occupant is given notice of the existence of this law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM], on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 17, nays 26; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CALL. I move to add as additional sections to the bill the following:

SEC. —. That no confirmation under the provisions of this act shall affect an actual adverse possession for ten years next preceding the commencement of proceedings under this act of any part of a grant.

SEC. —. That on the filing of a petition, under oath, alleging an actual adverse possession of any grant, or part of any grant, for ten years next preceding the filing of said petition, in any case under this act where the title to said land so held in adverse possession may be affected by the decree rendered therein, the court shall take jurisdiction of the same, and on proof of such actual adverse possession shall order a survey of said land so held in actual adverse possession, which survey shall be made by the surveyor-general of the United States; and the said land so held in actual adverse possession shall not be included in said decree and shall not be affected by it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. CALL. I shall not detain the Senate any further than to say that the amendment provides an exception or saving from the operation of the act of all persons in actual adverse possession for ten years preceding the commencement of proceedings, and provides that not being parties to the decree, they are not affected by it. That would be the law without this amendment; but presumption rises to a title. These poor people are as they were in my own State, where a large and extensive grant was confirmed in the grantee, but there was a presumption of title, and without saving it in the inferior courts to which they have access in trials of possessory right they will be uniformly deprived of that possession.

The other section of the amendment provides that by petition they may intervene and become parties, and if they establish to the satisfaction of the court an actual adverse possession for ten years preceding the commencement of the proceedings, their land may be surveyed by the authority of the United States and be excepted from the operation of the decree confirming the entire grant.

I have nothing further to say in defense of this amendment except that it is manifest to me that it is one for the protection of the poor people who occupy these large grants.

Mr. BAYARD. I will simply state that the amendment is directly in the line (except that it is more objectionable than that in my view) of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which has been already disapproved by the Senate. I trust that the amendment will not be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. In section 1, lines 9 and 10, I move to strike out the words "such lawful incomplete Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey as," and to insert "any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government which;" so as to read:

That it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons or corporation or their legal representatives, claiming lands within the limits of the territory derived by the United States from the Republic of Mexico, and now embraced within the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, or Utah, or within the States of Nevada or Colorado, by virtue of any right or title derived from the Spanish or Mexican Government which the United States are bound to recognize and confirm by virtue of the treaties of cession of said country by Mexico to the United States, &c.

The object of this amendment is that the court may be called on to pass upon every title and every right which the United States were bound to recognize and confirm by virtue of the treaty, and not put it within the narrow limit which the bill does of incomplete grants. Expressing what I at least can say for myself, I have very great doubt as to what the meaning may be.

The language which I propose is the language that was used in the law which created the commission for the settlement of similar grants in the State of California. It has had, therefore, a construction put upon it; we know what its action is. It is useless to pass a bill which shall take up one class of rights and leave another class entirely undisposed of.

There can certainly be no objection to this amendment, I think, unless it may be on the part of some one who is especially anxious that the bill shall go through in the precise form in which it came from the committee. This court ought to take into consideration all the question of right and of title which the Government of the United States bound itself to protect and preserve by the treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. BAYARD. This is but a repetition of the debate on questions raised a week ago in the discussion of this bill. I then explained, I thought satisfactorily, under question and answer, that this bill necessarily relates only to those incomplete grants and titles which it is the duty of the Government of the United States under treaty stipulation to consider and to perfect.

Yesterday in the course of the debate the language of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The United States vs. Wiggins, in 14 Peters, was cited by me to explain the difference between the duty of the United States under a law like this and the result of the treaty itself. Said the court:

> That the perfect titles made by Spain before the 24th of January, 1818, within the ceded territory are intrinsically valid and exempt from the provisions of the eighth article is the established doctrine of this court, and that they need no sanction from the legislative or judicial departments of this country. (The United States vs. Wiggins, 14 Peters, page 351.)

We are in this present case not dealing with perfect titles. They are, as the court say, "intrinsically valid and exempt;" "they need no sanction from the legislative or judicial departments of the country." It is, therefore, but repeating the statement made in the course of this debate over and over again of the object for which this bill was designed, and it would be in vain I think by repetition to strengthen the statement. The Senate I think must understand that the bill is designed to execute what remains to be executed of our treaty stipulations with the Government of Mexico in regard to the claimants of these lands. If they have a valid and intrinsic title, it is theirs, and, the Constitution being extended over that country, they have every legal right for its enforcement already. This law is not meant for such a case; it does not express itself as being meant for that; and to extend it to that would simply be to create an entirely new law from that which the Senate has been considering now for a week.

Mr. LAPHAM. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Who is to determine whether the title has become complete and perfect within the language of the fifteenth and sixteenth lines of the first section?

Mr. BAYARD. I suppose the court before whom the suit is brought are to test this. If the Senator will read further, and see what the judgment of the court is to be, he will not be in doubt upon that subject.

Mr. LAPHAM. But suppose the occupant determines that his title is perfect; if he makes a mistake, then your eleventh section cuts him off forever. You put upon the occupant the peril of determining the question whether he has any defect in his title or not. That certainly ought never to be the law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLUMB. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Bowen,	Jones of Nevada,	Palmer,	Wilson.
Call,	Lapham,	Plumb,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOWEN. I inquire of the Chair whether there are any further amendments to be offered to the text of the bill. If not, I desire to offer at this time my amendment as a substitute for the substitute offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

Mr. CONGER. The amendment which I had offered is pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] gave notice of an intended amendment, as did also the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. CONGER. I have from time to time offered a substitute, but it was said that the text of the bill as it was should be perfected first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In that case the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan will be first considered. The Chair, according to custom, therefore (the Senator from Michigan having first given notice of his motion to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert), will submit the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan. It will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert in lieu:

That it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons, or their legal representatives, claiming lands within the limits of the territory derived by the United States from the Republic of Mexico and now embraced within the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, or Utah, or within the States of Nevada or Colorado, by virtue of such lawful Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey as the United States is bound to recognize under the treaties of cession of said country by Mexico to the United States, which at the date of the passage of this act have not been confirmed or rejected by Congress, or otherwise decided upon by lawful authority, to present an application in writing to the commissioners hereinafter provided for, setting forth fully the nature of their claims to the lands, and particularly stating the date, form, and nature of the grant or concession under which they claim, by whom and under what authority, and to whom or for what use or benefit the same was made, with a reference to the documentary or other evidence upon which the claim is founded, and a statement of the facts relative to possession by grantees and their successors of the lands claimed, the name or names of any person or persons in present possession of the same, or of any part thereof, or claiming the same, or any part thereof, otherwise than by lease or permission of applicants, a deraignment of applicant's title, or proof of his authority to represent the claim, and also the quantity of land expressed in the grant or concession, or claimed thereunder, where situate, and the exterior boundaries thereof, with a map showing the same as near as may be, and whether said claim has heretofore been confirmed, considered, or acted upon by Congress or other authority of the United States, or been heretofore submitted to any authorities constituted by law for the adjustment of land titles within the limits of said territory so acquired, and by them reported on unfavorably or recommended for confirmation, and asking in such application that the validity of such title or claim be inquired into and determined.

SEC. 2. That all unsettled claims as aforesaid which have heretofore been submitted to Congress, or transmitted by surveyors-general to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, or remaining on the files of the surveyors-general, shall be remanded to the commissioners for examination and settlement, as provided in this act.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of ascertaining and settling private land claims as aforesaid in the States and Territories hereinbefore mentioned three commissioners shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose duty it shall be to thoroughly investigate and examine all claims brought before them as provided in this act, and to ascertain the authority and validity thereof, under the laws of Spain and Mexico and the treaties between the United States and Mexico, and the sufficiency of such claims to constitute property rights to the lands claimed under said laws and treaties at the date of the cession of territory as aforesaid; and said commissioners shall have power to compel the attendance of witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony, and to do all and singular the acts and things necessary to be done to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 4. That all claims not heretofore filed with the surveyor-general of the State or Territory in which the land is situated shall be presented to the commission hereby constituted within the period of two years from the date of the passage of this act; and all claims not presented within said period shall be deemed and taken in all courts and elsewhere to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred, and the lands claimed shall forthwith, upon the expiration of said two years, be deemed public lands of the United States, and be subject to settlement, and, when surveyed, to entry under the public-land laws, without further action by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SEC. 5. That the commissioners shall give due and public notice of the time and place for filing claims and of holding their sessions in each State and Territory. They shall appoint a secretary, skilled in the Spanish and English languages, who shall keep a permanent record of their proceedings; and all books, records, documents, and papers of the commission shall, upon the termination of the commission, be deposited in the General Land Office.

SEC. 6. That such clerks as may be necessary, not to exceed five in number, including two competent stenographers, shall be appointed by the commissioners, who may from time to time designate their secretary or either of their clerks to act as interpreter. Such special assistance shall also be employed by the commissioners from time to time as the nature of the service to be performed may require, and as may be authorized by the appropriation made by Congress for the expenses of the commission.

SEC. 7. That the commissioners, and all persons appointed or employed by them, shall, before entering upon their respective offices, take an oath to faithfully discharge the duties imposed by or under this act.

SEC. 8. That all process and subpœnas shall be issued by the commissioners, or a majority thereof, and shall run in the name of the United States, and be directed to the marshal of the United States for the proper judicial district; and the marshal shall appoint one or more deputies, who shall attend the sittings of the commissioners and execute all process issued by them, and shall receive the same compensation as allowed to the marshal for his attendance upon the district court and the performance of like services therein.

SEC. 9. That witnesses subpœnaed on behalf of the United States who shall testify before the commission shall be allowed the same per diem and mileage as witnesses in the district court of the United States, to be paid by the marshal in like manner, upon the certificate of the commissioners.

SEC. 10. That the President of the United States is authorized to appoint a law agent and an associate law agent, one of whom shall be skilled in the Spanish language, whose special duty it shall be to appear in behalf of and to represent the United States before the commission, and to collect evidence in behalf of the United States, to attend the sessions of the commissioners, and to be present on all occasions at the taking of testimony by or in behalf of claimants before the commission.

SEC. 11. That no decision shall be rendered in any case until all documentary evidences of title presented shall have been scrutinized, and the claim fully investigated, and parties and adverse claimants and protestants heard. Testimony shall be taken upon or in the vicinity of the land claimed in respect of all facts touching matters of original and present possession and occupation of the land claimed and of boundaries and limits; and such testimony shall be taken by the commission, or by one of the commissioners duly authorized so to do by the commission, in which case the commissioner taking the testimony singly shall be accompanied by a clerk, acting as assistant secretary, and by an interpreter, and the law agent or associate law agent, and by a surveyor appointed and employed by the commission.

SEC. 12. That the commissioners shall have the power and authority, upon the hearing, proofs, and examination of claims, as provided in this act, to determine conclusively all questions of fact arising in said cases, and to finally decide upon the validity of the title under the grant or claim, and the stipulations of the eighth and ninth articles of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Republic of Mexico at the city of Guadalupe Hidalgo on the 2d day of February, in the year 1848, or the fifth and sixth articles of the treaty concluded between the same powers at the city of Mexico on the 30th day of December, in the year 1853; and either party against whom a final decision shall be rendered as aforesaid may remove the case in the manner hereinafter provided, if in a Territory, to the supreme court of such Territory, and if in a State, to the circuit court of the United States; and said supreme and circuit courts may thereupon review and affirm or reverse the decision of the commissioners.

SEC. 13. That any final judgment rendered in any case brought under the provisions of this act before the supreme court of a Territory, or before a circuit court of the United States, wherein the judges of such supreme court, or the judges sitting as a circuit court, certify, as provided by law, that their opinions were opposed upon any question which occurred on the hearing of said case, may be reviewed and affirmed or reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States, in the manner provided by law for the review of decisions of circuit courts on certificate of division of opinion.

SEC. 14. That in every case in which the commissioners shall render a final decision they shall file with the clerk of the supreme court of the Territory when the case is in a Territory, and with the clerk of the circuit court of the United States when the case is in a State, an authenticated transcript of their proceedings and decision, and of the papers and evidence on which the same were founded, and shall at the same time transmit a similar transcript to the Attorney-General of the United States. Either party may file in the proper court a petition, which shall be entitled "Petition in error," setting forth the errors complained of, and praying a reversal of the decision made by the commissioners. If the plaintiff in error shall be the private claimant, he shall be required by the clerk of the court, under the direction of a judge, to give reasonable security for all costs and charges which may accrue in prosecuting the petition in error to effect. Upon the filing of a petition in error as aforesaid, citation to the adverse party shall be issued by the clerk of the court, and be served, or publication made, as in the commencement of an action. A petition in error under this act shall operate and have the same effect, and be prosecuted under the same rules and regulations, as a writ of error sued out of circuit courts to district courts of the United States; but no decision of the commissioners shall be reviewed in the supreme court of a Territory or a circuit court of the United States unless the petition in error is filed within six months from the date of the filing in said court of the authenticated transcript of the record of the original case as hereinbefore provided.

SEC. 15. That proceedings in error shall be taken and prosecuted in behalf of the United States by direction of the Attorney-General, whose duty it shall be to take care that the interests of the United States are properly protected and defended in all cases in which the decisions of the commissioners shall be against the United States or in which the United States shall be the defendant in error.

SEC. 16. That the commissioners shall cause a limited number of copies of their proceedings and decisions to be printed and furnished for the use of claimants and adverse parties, the Attorney-General of the United States, the United States attorney for the proper Territory or district, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the surveyor-general for the State or Territory in which the land is situated.

SEC. 17. That when no petition in error shall be filed by either party within the period of six months from the date of filing in the proper court of the transcript of the decision of the commissioners in any case, such decision shall become final and conclusive; and it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court, at the expiration of said six months, to notify the Commissioner of the General Land Office that no petition in error has been filed in said court within the prescribed period, and to transmit to said commissioner a duly certified copy of said decision; and upon the final decision of any case taken into the supreme court of a Territory or a circuit court of the United States, or brought up to the Supreme Court of the United States, as provided in this act, it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court in which such decision shall become final to transmit to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a duly certified copy of such final decision.

SEC. 18. That upon the final rejection of any claim, and the filing in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as provided in the preceding section, of a certified copy of the final decision or decree in the case, the lands theretofore included in such claim shall be relieved from any and all reservation on account of such claim, and shall forthwith become subject to appropriation and entry as other public lands of the United States.

SEC. 19. That upon the final decision of any claim in favor of the claimant, and the filing in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office of a certified copy of the final decision or decree in the case, it shall be the duty of the Commissioner to direct the surveyor-general of the proper State or Territory to cause the quantity of land so finally confirmed to the claimant to be surveyed and set off conformably to such final decision or decree at the expense of the United States. In the location of such quantity the right of segregation shall remain with the United States, to be exercised in accordance with the election of the claimant, as near as may be, without interference with adverse rights or claims or the equities of bona fide inhabitants. Such location shall be made as nearly as practicable in one body of contiguous lands, if the quantity to be surveyed can be so found within exterior boundaries; but if intervening grants or other good cause render the location in one tract impracticable, then each separate location shall be made as nearly as practicable in compact form, and it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of the General Land Office to require due compliance with the provisions of this section.

SEC. 20. That whenever a survey shall have been made and platted, the surveyor-general shall give notice thereof, by publication once a week for four successive weeks in two newspapers having a general circulation, one published at the capital of the State or Territory and one nearest the land in question, and shall retain the survey and plat in his office for public inspection, and the filing of objections thereto, for the period of ninety days from the date of the first publication of notice as aforesaid; and if no objections are made to the survey within said period, he shall, upon his approval of the same, transmit a plat and descriptive notes thereof to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for his examination and approval or further direction. If objections to the survey shall be filed within said period of ninety days, the surveyor-general shall transmit the same, together with the plat and field-notes, and a report upon the case, to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who may, if in his opinion the ends of justice would be subserved thereby, order a hearing upon said objections, or he may, in the case of any survey, require further report from the surveyor-general touching the matters indicated by him, or proof to be taken thereon, or may direct a new survey and plat to be made, or may overrule the objections filed. An appeal shall lie to the Secretary of the Interior from the decision and action of the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to such survey, except orders for a hearing on other matter resting in the discretion of the Commissioner. Whenever the objections and appeals are disposed of, and a plat of survey approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the President of the United States shall issue a patent to the claimant, subject to the provisions of this act; and the record of such patent in the General Land Office shall be deemed in law the delivery thereof to the party entitled thereto. The final approval of the survey and plat and issue of patent thereon shall operate as a release from reservation of all lands within the exterior boundaries of said claim not included in said survey and patent, and the excluded lands shall thereupon be subject to appropriation and entry as other public lands of the United States.

SEC. 21. That the claim to any lands granted for the establishment of a city, town, or village shall be presented by the corporate authorities of the city, town, or village, if incorporated; or if not incorporated, the claim may be presented by trustees for the inhabitants occupying and holding under such grant, or by the heirs or legal representatives of the respective grantees, according to the possession delivered under the grant by the Spanish or Mexican authorities, conformably to the laws, usages, and customs of said governments.

SEC. 22. That all the foregoing proceedings and rights shall be conducted and decided subject to the following provisions, as well as to the other provisions of this act, namely:

First. No claim shall be allowed that shall not appear to be upon a title lawfully and regularly derived from the Government of Spain or Mexico, or if incomplete, one that at the date of the acquisition of the territory by the United States the claimant would have had a lawful right to make perfect had the territory not been acquired by the United States, and that the United States is bound by the provisions of the treaty of cession to respect and permit to become complete and perfect.

Second. No claim shall be allowed that shall interfere with or overthrow any just and unextinguished Indian title or right to any land or place.

Third. No claim shall be allowed for any land the right to which has hitherto been lawfully acted upon and finally decided by Congress or under its authority.

Fourth. No proceeding, decision, decree, or act under this act shall conclude or affect the private rights of persons as between each other, all which rights shall be reserved and saved to the same effect as if this act had not been passed; but the proceedings, decisions, decrees, and acts herein provided for shall be conclusive of all rights as between the United States and all persons claiming any interest or right in such lands.

Fifth. No decision or decree concerning any claim under this act shall in any manner operate or have effect against the United States otherwise than as a release by the United States of its right and title to the land confirmed; nor shall it operate to make the United States in any manner liable in respect of any such grants, claims, or lands, or the disposal thereof, otherwise than as herein provided.

Sixth. No claim shall in any case be allowed or patent issued for a greater quantity of land than the quantity mentioned in the grant or juridical possession, nor for more than eleven square leagues under any one grant or concession, nor in any case for a greater quantity than was authorized by the respective laws of Spain or Mexico applicable to the claim; nor shall the exclusive claim of any individual or individuals under a grant for the colonization, settlement, or use of a town, village, or community be allowed or patent issued to such individual or individuals for a greater proportion of the allotted or common lands than the distributive share, according to the possession of the respective grantees from whom such individual claim is derived.

SEC. 23. That actual settlers on lands within the limits of rejected claims, or on lands excluded from the final survey of approved claims, shall have the exclusive right, for twelve months from date of such final decision, to enter under the homestead, pre-emption, timber-culture, desert-land, or town-site laws of the United States, as the same may be applicable thereto, in quantities authorized by said laws respectively, in the same manner as if no reservation under such claims had existed.

SEC. 24. That the commissioners appointed under this act shall be entitled to a salary of $5,000 a year each; the secretary of the commission shall be entitled to a salary of $3,000 a year; three of the clerks hereinbefore provided for shall be entitled to a salary of $1,800 a year each, and two shall be entitled to a salary of $1,200 a year each.

SEC. 25. That the actual traveling expenses of the commissioners, law agents, secretary, and clerks, including a per diem not exceeding $4 per day each, together with the general and incidental expenses of the commissioners, shall be allowed and paid by the Secretary of the Interior, on vouchers approved by the commissioners; and the Secretary of the Interior may detail a clerk from his Department to act as disbursing agent for the commission, who shall be entitled, in addition to his official salary, to his actual traveling expenses and per diem as herein provided.

SEC. 26. That section 8 of the act of Congress approved on the 22d day of July, 1854, entitled "An act to establish the offices of surveyor-general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes," and all acts amendatory or in extension thereof or supplementary thereto, and all provisions of law inconsistent with this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. CONGER. On page 2, line 17 of the proposed section 1, the words "or title" should be inserted after the word "concession," and the word "or" should be stricken out before "concession;" so as to read:

And particularly stating the date, form, and nature of the grant, concession, or title under which they claim.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made. The Senator from Michigan has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. BOWEN. I wish to offer my amendment at this time in the nature of a substitute for the substitute offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado moves to amend the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan by striking out the whole of the same and inserting what will now be read:

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That any person or corporation who claims or may claim title to any real estate to which the United States has not issued a patent may commence in any court of competent jurisdiction and prosecute to final decree a cause in equity to quiet title to such real estate, to define and settle the extent and boundaries of the same, and to determine the nature of such title, as to whether the same includes agricultural or mineral rights or both.

SEC. 2. That in all causes which may be commenced and prosecuted under the preceding section the United States may be made party respondent, and all proceedings shall be conducted, as near as may be, according to the practice and rules of courts of equity in the States or Territories where such causes may be commenced, except that the answer of the attorney of the United States shall not be required to be verified by his oath.

SEC. 3. That appeals may be taken by either party from the decree of the court of original jurisdiction which may determine any cause under the provisions of this act, and in which the United States is a party, directly to the Supreme Court of the United States; and in all cases where such decree is adverse to the United States the same shall be deemed and held to stand appealed to said Supreme Court without any act on the part of any one. All other decrees may be appealed from, within one year from the date of their entry, in the same manner provided for by law and the rules of courts in other causes; but no bond shall be required except for costs.

SEC. 4. That all causes which may be commenced and prosecuted under the provisions of this act in which the United States is a party shall take precedence to time of hearing over all other civil causes on the dockets of all courts of original jurisdiction, as well as in the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 5. That any person in whose favor a final decree shall be entered by the Supreme Court of the United States, under the provisions and in pursuance of this act, shall be entitled, upon payment of usual and lawful fees, to one or more copies of such decree, duly certified under the hand and seal of the clerk of said court, and may file one of such certified copies in the office of the Commissioner of the General Land Office; whereupon the President of the United States shall execute and deliver to said person, his heirs or assigns, a patent for the real estate described in such decree; and if for any cause such patent shall not be so executed and delivered, such decree shall be received as evidence in all courts of a title in fee-simple.

SEC. 6. That no decree entered under the provisions of this act shall conclude or affect the private rights of persons as between each other, except such as may elect to and do become parties to the record in causes where such persons bring themselves in, by cross-bill or otherwise, for the purpose of having their rights determined, but such decrees shall be conclusive as between the United States and all persons whose rights are litigated and determined as parties to the record.

SEC. 7. That in all causes commenced and prosecuted under this act the complainant's bill shall except all lands lying within the boundaries of his claim held by private persons under the homestead, pre-emption, or mining laws of the United States, and shall expressly waive all claim and right to such lands so held, and all final decrees in favor of complainants shall except such lands so held from the operation thereof, as shall likewise all patents issued in pursuance of such decrees; but the complainant shall nevertheless be entitled to a money decree for an amount equal to the Government price of such lands so excepted, which money decree shall be paid to the claimant, his heirs or assigns, by the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon presentation to the proper officers of the Government of a certified copy of the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States.

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall prevent claimants of real estate who have proceeded under existing laws of the United States, and who shall, at the date of the passage of this act, be applying to Congress, by bill, for confirmations of grants of the character provided for in the treaty concluded between the United States and the Republic of Mexico at the city of Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d day of February, A. D. 1848, or the treaty concluded between the same powers at the city of Mexico on the 30th day of December, A. D. 1853, from proceeding in their efforts to procure such confirmations. Any of such claimants may, however, avail themselves of the benefits of the provisions of this act either before or after failure to secure such confirmations. All other of such claimants shall be entitled to proceed under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States to commence and prosecute, in the name of the United States, proceedings to reform the boundaries of any grant of land heretofore confirmed by Congress, upon being satisfactorily informed that such boundaries were unlawfully or fraudulently extended beyond the area described in the original grant before such confirmations were had.

SEC. 10. That section 8 of the act of Congress approved July 22, A. D. 1854, entitled "An act to establish the offices of surveyors-general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes," and all acts amendatory or in extension thereof or supplementary thereto, and all provisions of law inconsistent with this act, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. The Senator from Colorado yields the floor that I may move that the Senate do now adjourn, which motion I submit.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 7, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STORM for the remainder of the week.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and ordered to be printed:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a communication, under date of the 2d instant, from the Secretary of the Interior, and the accompanying last annual report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 6, 1884.

NEW YORK SHIPPING COMMISSIONER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives passed February 4, 1884, communicating a statement of the sum paid into the Treasury by the shipping commissioner of the port of New York under the act of Congress passed June 7, 1872; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK DETAILED FOR COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, informing the House that in compliance with a joint resolution approved February 1, 1884, Mr. Alexander Vangruder, a chief of division in the Pension Office, has been detailed to act as assistant clerk to the Committee on Invalid Pensions during the remainder of the present Congress; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

STAR-ROUTE INVESTIGATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in reply to a resolution of the House of Representatives of January 30, 1884, directing reports made by special agents during the year 1881 having reference to the star-route investigations to be transmitted to the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MONEY. I ask an order of the House at this time to print a communication from the Postmaster-General, which was referred the other day to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, but not then ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The substance of the communication will be read, so that the House may understand the request.

The communication was a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting the following reports; which were referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

1. Offers accepted and contracts awarded for carrying the mails under advertisements of October 16, 1882, January 15 and March 1, 1883;

2. Report showing the land and water mails established during the year ending June 30, 1883, other than those let by contract at the annual letting;

3. All allowances made to contractors during the fiscal year 1883 above the sums originally stipulated; and

4. Report of curtailments in the service and pay of contractors.

The SPEAKER. The Chair believes that it has been usual to direct the printing of these documents. When the document just read was laid before the House some days since, by omission no order was made for its printing. If there be no objection the order will now be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

THE NATIONAL LA FAYETTE BANK.

Mr. FOLLETT. I ask consent to take from the House Calendar for consideration at this time House bill No. 2555, to change the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce" to that of "The National La Fayette Bank." There is no objection on the part of the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House or the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. MILLS. Has that bill been reported from a committee?

The SPEAKER. It has been, and is now on the House Calendar.

Mr. WELLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLER. Does that bill refer to a national banking association?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WELLER. Then I object, on the ground that it may possibly refer to one.

Mr. FOLLETT. It simply refers to the change of name.

Mr. WELLER. I am informed that it simply refers to the change of the name of a bank.

Mr. FOLLETT. That is all.

Mr. WELLER. Then I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Objection being withdrawn, the bill is before the House, and will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of "The National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce," a corporation transacting business in the city of Cincinnati, county of Hamilton, and State of Ohio, shall be changed to "The National La Fayette Bank," whenever the board of directors of said bank shall accept the new name by resolution of said board, and cause a copy of said resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act, and that all the expenses incident to such change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank.

SEC. 2. That the debts, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of the said National La Fayette and Bank of Commerce shall devolve upon and inure to the said National La Fayette Bank whenever such change of name is effected.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as in any manner to release the said bank from any liability or affect any action or proceeding in law in which said bank may be or become a party or interested.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. FOLLETT. The sole purpose of the bill is to change the name of a bank so as to shorten that name. The form of the bill is in exact accordance with forms approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, and has met the approval of the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill; and, being taken by a viva voce vote, the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WELLER. I demand a division.

The House divided; but before those in the affirmative were counted,

Mr. WELLER said: I perceive that the majority are opposed to me, and I withdraw the demand for a division.

So (no further count being called for) the bill was passed.

Mr. FOLLETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RUDOLPH JOHN MARTI.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4697) for the relief of Rudolph John Marti; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SARAH LUFTON MERCHANT.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4698) for the relief of Sarah Lufton Merchant; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTING FOR COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to submit, from the Committee on Accounts, a privileged report, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution, namely:

"Resolved, That the positions of stenographers of committees of this House be, and they are hereby, declared vacant; and hereafter, upon the request of a committee, the Speaker shall employ a reporter or reporters to report such proceedings as the committee may deem necessary, at a compensation to be fixed by the Committee on Accounts, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House"— having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

That on the 5th of January, 1865 (second session Thirty-eighth Congress), the House by resolution authorized the Speaker to appoint a stenographic reporter, to continue in office until otherwise ordered by the House, whose duty was to report in shorthand, on the order of any committee of the House, such of its proceedings as were deemed necessary. On the 25th of July, 1866, the Speaker was authorized to appoint an assistant official reporter to the committees of the House; and on the 6th of March, 1867, it provided that the said assistant should continue in office until otherwise ordered by the House.

Under authority of the resolution of January 5, 1865, the Committee on Appropriations included in the legislative, &c., act, an item appropriating $3,650 as the annual salary of such stenographers (see Statutes at Large, volume 14, page 192), and in the following Congress (Fortieth) the legislative, &c., appropriation act made provision for both stenographers, their salaries being increased to $4,380 each. (See Statutes at Large, volume 15, page 93.)

In the Forty-second Congress the salaries of the stenographers was increased to $5,000 each per annum, which has since been their annual compensation.

Your committee are of the opinion that the present system of stenographic service for committees is wrong, and that it should be so changed as to provide payment for service actually rendered committees, the stenographer in each case to be employed, as now authorized by Rule XXXVI, by the Speaker, and the compensation to be fixed by the Committee on Accounts, and paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

For these reasons your committee recommend the adoption of the resolution as referred, believing that it is in the interest and direction of economy.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I have been directed by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Accounts to report favorably the resolution which has just been read at the Clerk's desk. The committee are of opinion that this resolution is in the direction of economy and will result in a considerable reduction of the expenditure necessary to report the proceedings of committees. Whether this expectation and desire of the committee shall be realized or not remains to be seen, but we feel safe in commending the resolution, because it proposes to pay only for actual service rendered to committees, not a dollar in excess of the work authorized and directed by the House. I hope the resolution will prevail.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to inquire of the gentleman who presents this report whether he desires to have a vote at once upon the resolution. I have been under the impression that the stenographers of committees had in some way become a part of our permanent law, not merely a matter of arrangement by the House, inasmuch as we have fixed their salaries by law. As this is a rather important question and is suddenly presented, I should be glad if the gentleman would allow it to go over until to-morrow, so that we may see the report in print and have time to examine the law.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that I held back this matter yesterday at the request of some gentlemen. The report states what is the fact, that these stenographers are authorized simply by resolution of the House, not by law.

Mr. KASSON. Has the report been printed? I was absent from the city yesterday.

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir; the report has just been submitted and read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Does it apply to the regular corps of official reporters at the desk here?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. How much will this save to the Treasury?

Mr. DOCKERY. It is believed by the Committee on Accounts that it will save fully $5,000 during the present session.

Mr. COX, of New York. I see no reason why the resolution should not pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it the object of the resolution to abolish these offices or simply to provide that the compensation shall be fixed by the Committee on Accounts, the reporters still being appointed as they are now?

Mr. DOCKERY. The answer to that question is contained in the resolution which has been read.

Mr. HAMMOND. Why not let the matter go over until to-morrow, so that we can all read the resolution in the RECORD and know what it means?

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well.

Mr. KASSON. I think it had better take that course.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that to-morrow will be private bill day, but it may be understood of course that this resolution shall be called up then.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman can call it up as a privileged question.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I think some action by the House or some one else is necessary in the matter of these committee reporters; and I desire to state why. During the last Congress we had a person sent to us in the Committee on Commerce to take down the discussion of a most important question, the report of which the House had authorized to be printed. The person who came there could not report, and we had to get along as best we could until we could obtain a competent reporter. Again in the present Congress the committee has been engaged in a hearing upon the same important subject; and the House has given the committee the discretion of having the examination printed. A person came before us to report, but in trying to revise the colloquial parts of a discussion in which I participated I was obliged to throw those notes aside. I could not understand the report furnished, and could not remember what had actually been said. And to-day I have received from Mr. Fink, who made an elaborate argument before us, a letter stating that he can not revise the report furnished, because it is unintelligible, and he asks permission to substitute the report made by his own reporter.

I state these things to show that something ought to be done. There ought to be a power somewhere which would enable us, when we require reporters, to obtain those who can do the duty which they are employed to perform.

Mr. DOCKERY. If it be the general understanding that this matter shall be taken up to-morrow, I do not object to its going over.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged matter on which the gentleman is entitled to call for immediate action, or it can be understood by unanimous consent that it shall be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. BAYNE. I object, unless Saturday be fixed instead of to-morrow. I think that the consideration of private bills should not be interfered with.

Mr. REAGAN. Why not put it through now? Nobody wants to delay it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let us dispose of it now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] objects to an order being made now by unanimous consent that the report shall go over and be considered to-morrow, but suggests that it go over until Saturday, as to-morrow is private bill day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the resolution from the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let us dispose of it now.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for.

Mr. DOCKERY. I insist on action on the resolution at this time.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will again be reported to the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has stated that the regular order is the consideration of the resolution now before the House.

Mr. KASSON. I ask for the reading of the resolution again.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution just read.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUPERVISORS OF TENTH CENSUS.

Mr. PEELLE, of Indiana (by request), by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4699) for additional compensation to the supervisors of the Tenth Census; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

E. H. GEORGE AND H. W. WALKER.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I rise to submit a report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Is it a privileged question?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I ask to present it now for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 152) for the relief of E. H. George and H. W. Walker.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to E. H. George the sum of $125 and to H. W. Walker the sum of $250 in full compensation for services rendered by them in closing and opening new books in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives and preparing mileage reports for payment.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. On last Monday——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. Does it come from the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. It does. Last Monday I was instructed by the Committee on Accounts to report a resolution authorizing the payment of this money out of the contingent fund of the House. It was passed by the House without an objection; but the Comptroller of the Treasury says the money can not be paid out of the contingent fund, and that to do so will require the passage of a joint resolution. I therefore ask the passage of this joint resolution for that purpose.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On what grounds does the Comptroller decide this can not be paid out of the contingent fund?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I have not seen his opinion, but as the original resolution was in my charge as it passed the House, I was informed by those who are in interest that he has so ruled. I was also requested to ask that this resolution be substituted for the one passed on Monday.

There was no objection; and the joint resolution was received, read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANTS, HOUSE POST-OFFICE.

Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey, from the Committee on Accounts, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the following resolution of Mr. S. S. Cox: "That the Postmaster of the House of Representatives be authorized to employ four more assistants," respectfully report, that they have carefully considered the same, and ask its adoption with the following amendment, namely:

Add to the end of the resolution the following:

"During the present session only, at the rate of $100 per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution recommends the employment of four additional persons. I had supposed, owing to the increase in the number of members and in consequence of the additional labor performed by the House post-office, perhaps the addition of one or two persons would be all that would be required in order to make that service effective. An increase of two would certainly be ample.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will my friend allow me to say a word?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. COX, of New York. Only two more are ordered by this resolution than were in the last House, although the increase seems to give the Postmaster four. They are all needed by the increase of the area of the delivery by the increased number of members and by the increased work downstairs, and I hope my friend from Indiana will assist his friend. I ask attention to the following table of the force in the House post-office during the preceding Congresses:

Forty-first Congress, messengers	9
Forty-second Congress, messengers	12
Forty-third Congress, messengers	14
Forty-fourth Congress, messengers	14
Forty-fifth Congress, messengers	13
Forty-sixth Congress, messengers	13
Forty-seventh Congress, messengers	13
Forty-seventh Congress, messengers (by resolution)	2
Forty-seventh Congress, laborer	1
Forty-eighth Congress, messengers	13
Forty-eighth Congress, laborer	1

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Allow me to put in a word there.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know the efficiency and competency of the Postmaster of the House as well as my friend from New York, but the consideration which he would seem to indicate certainly would not justify any increase of the force in his office beyond what is absolutely necessary.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. It is utterly impossible to hear at this part of the Hall the interesting colloquy going on between the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from New Jersey will modify this resolution to provide for an increase of only two persons in the post-office of the House, as I think that number will be found entirely sufficient.

The increased number of the membership of this House does undoubtedly increase to a considerable degree the amount of labor devolving upon the Postmaster and his employés. But I know very well that the gentleman who now occupies the position of Postmaster of the House would not require or ask the House to grant any increase of his employés beyond what is imperatively demanded by the needs of the service to be performed. I trust that the increased membership of the House will not be urged therefore as a reason for increasing largely beyond the needs of the service the employés of the House. I would rather, in fact, see the officers of the House somewhat cramped and pressed in their work than to find that we have been creating supernumeraries and adding unnecessarily to our employés. If, sir, we are to urge retrenchment in the expenditures of the public service of this country we had better agree to let it begin right here under our own eyes.

Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me, I wish to say that this is a unanimous report of the Committee on Accounts, made after careful consideration, after looking thoroughly into the matter, and further that it is but an increase of two in this force over what we had during the last Congress. And further, as a reason why it is necessary to grant this increase of force, I ask to have read a letter from the Postmaster of the House, which will explain the whole matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 21, 1884.

GENTLEMEN: In asking for an increase of messengers for this office, I respectfully submit the following reasons in favor of the resolution now before your committee:

First. The increase of membership, by the addition of thirty-two members.

Second. The increase of mail matter (which I am informed by the city postmaster amounts annually to 33⅓ per cent.).

Third. The expansion of territory by the growth of the city, requiring more time for the delivery of the mails.

For this increase there has been no provision, although the work is much greater than at any time in many years.

At this time I have one distributor at the city post-office, when there should be three, in order to insure accurate and early deliveries. There is but one distributor in the House office; it is impossible to get along with less than three, one of which should have exclusive charge of registered matter and the sale of stamps. The total increase will be four for the session. With this I am sure the work can be performed in a satisfactory manner.

Very respectfully,

L. DALTON,
Postmaster House of Representatives.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Speaker, it must be evident to us all that the increased membership of the House has imposed a large increase of labor upon the post-office of the House, larger in that direction, indeed, than in any other branch of the service connected with the House. I know an instance which comes within my own knowledge where a man who is employed in that department is absolutely overworked, and who is doing now a service fully equal to that which is performed by two clerks in the department. He is the only one of the employés of our post-office who is located at the city post-office. He receives the entire mail for the House. His duties require him to be in attendance there during the whole day. I know there have been occasions when he has been on duty from 5 in the morning until 11 o'clock at night in order that he may receive the mail of members as it arrives and distribute it at the earliest possible moment. It is absolutely necessary to have an increase of the clerical force of our House post-office at the city post-office, and if it is not done our mail will be delayed in its delivery to us, as has been frequently the case in times past. It is a physical impossibility for the one man who is now employed there to discharge the duty which is required of him.

During the last Congress there were two men up there, and I do not know why there should not be the same force employed now, when the work is certainly largely increased. At present, owing to the limited force at his disposal, the Postmaster of the House preferred to employ but one person, who, as I have said, has to do the work of two clerks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have already said that I thought an increase of one was necessary perhaps at the city post-office.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I am not aware of the necessity which exists elsewhere. I have no doubt, however, it is urgent. But in the case I have mentioned I know it is absolutely demanded.

Mr. BREWER. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. If in order I move to amend by inserting "two" instead of "four."

The SPEAKER. That is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MOULTON. Let the amendment be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 114, noes 9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, is this proposition subject to the same rule as a bill with reference to the motion to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I wish to move to recommit this report to the Committee on Accounts, with instructions to reduce the number to two.

I think it will be found that our present Postmaster, who is a very efficient officer, will be enabled to get along with the increase I propose.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I hope my colleague will withdraw that motion.

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman from Indiana has debated it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman has submitted a motion.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire only to say that we now have but two more than last year.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to recommit the report to the Committee on Accounts with instructions.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana a question?

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to know simply whether they are to be selected by competitive examination, under the direction of the Civil Service Commission——

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana.

The motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the resolution as amended, it was agreed to.

Mr. BREWER, of New Jersey, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SIMON E. LEWIS.

Mr. STRUBLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4700) granting a pension to Simon E. Lewis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS IN GEORGIA.

Mr. HAMMOND (by request), by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4701) to change the times of holding the district and circuit courts of the United States in the northern district of Georgia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF SPIRITS FROM WAREHOUSE.

Mr. HAMMOND also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4702) to authorize the withdrawal from distillery warehouse without tax of alcohol and other spirits to be used in manufacturing or preparing drugs, medicines, and chemicals; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENDITURE REFUNDED TO GEORGIA.

Mr. HAMMOND also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4703) to require the payment in cash to the State of Georgia of $35,555.42 appropriated for said State by "an act to refund to the State of Georgia certain money expended by said State for the common defense in 1777," approved March 3, 1883; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. YORK. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. That can be done under the call.

REPORT ON COCHECO RIVER, NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Mr. HAYNES. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and hereby is, directed to furnish the House of Representatives with the report of Col. C. E. Blunt, of the Corps of Engineers, dated January 18, 1884, submitting results of recent examination of Cocheco River, New Hampshire, with estimated cost of further improvements, and papers accompanying the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I would like to have some explanation of it. It is the duty of the Chief of Engineers to transmit to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors all such information without the adoption of a resolution of this kind. What is the occasion of such a resolution?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHITE. I object unless some explanation is given.

REMAINS OF CAPTAIN CLIFFORD.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from the Committee on Military Affairs for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2309) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause the remains of Capt. Walter Clifford, deceased, to be transported to his late place of residence, and making appropriation therefor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the remains of Capt. Walter Clifford, late of Company E, Seventh Regiment United States Infantry, to be transported from their temporary place of interment at Fort Bridger, Wyo., to his late place of residence, at Charlevoix, in the State of Michigan; and for that purpose the sum of $300, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "Infantry," insert the words "together with the headstone erected over his grave."

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume there is a report accompanying the bill. I ask that it be read, inasmuch as I am not aware that that has been the practice of Congress heretofore.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I shall be glad to have the report read, the right of the gentleman from Indiana to object being reserved.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2309) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause the remains of Capt. Walter Clifford, deceased, to be transferred to his late place of residence, and making appropriation therefor, have had the same under consideration and report as follows:

Walter Clifford enlisted in the service of the United States March 19, 1860. August 18, 1863, he was mustered out and promoted second lieutenant Sixteenth Infantry. May 14, 1864, he was promoted to first lieutenant and transferred to the Thirty-fourth Infantry September 21, 1866. He was promoted to be captain July 31, 1867, and assigned to the Seventh Infantry. He was brevetted a second lieutenant for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Chickamauga. Captain Clifford remained in the service continuously, principally upon the frontier, until his death at Fort Bridger, Wyo., February 23, 1883, of heart disease.

Captain Clifford left surviving him a widow and three small children, 11, 9, and 1 years old, respectively, with no means whatever but her pension, which is wholly inadequate for her support. The remains of Captain Clifford were buried by his company and comrades at Fort Bridger, a post about ten miles from the Union Pacific Railroad. The cost to the Government of transporting the remains to Detroit, Mich., as estimated by the Quartermaster-General, as shown by his report, submitted herewith, would be about $70. The expense of transporting said remains to his place of residence at Charlevoix, Mich., would be not far from the same. The committee are informed that after his decease Captain Clifford's company erected a handsome headstone at his grave, which his widow is very anxious to have removed with the remains. As this could be removed as ordinary freight it would add but a few dollars to the expense. This officer devoted his whole mature life to the service of his country, and finally died in its service, leaving those dependent upon him unable either to visit his last resting place, or to remove his remains to a place where the hand of affection can perform the rites so dear to the bereaved. Had this officer been discharged at his post he would have been entitled to his travel-pay, and it would seem no more than simple justice to his family that his remains should be restored to them. The committee believe that $100 will cover the entire expense, and believe it will be a wise expenditure; therefore recommend the passage of the bill, amended so as to include the headstone erected over his grave.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I should be very glad if the gentleman reporting the bill would state what has been heretofore the practice of the Government in the case of an officer dying absent from home.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I am not myself personally aware what has been the general practice. But General MAGINNIS, of Montana, my associate on the committee, is prepared, I believe, to answer that question.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The general practice heretofore running through a large number of years has been to make an appropriation in the Army bill of about $5,000 a year, out of which fund the Secretary of War causes these removals and interments to be made. The committee of last Congress denied that appropriation, and the Secretary, having no fund, makes this request to the House of Representatives.

Mr. KASSON. It is a little thing. It ought to be done.

Mr. MAGINNIS. As the gentleman from Iowa says, this is a little thing; and it is but an act of justice to the memory of a gallant soldier who served his country all his life.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I wish only further to say that I called on the Secretary of War, who said he would be very glad to transport the remains of this officer, but he had no funds at his disposal for such a purpose.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CUTCHEON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STAR-ROUTE FRAUDS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw for a moment the call for the regular order that I may ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I hold in my hand. When the gentleman hears the resolution read I am sure he will withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Let the resolution be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. It modifies a resolution of inquiry heretofore addressed to the Postmaster-General.

The resolution was read, as follows.

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General, in complying with the request of the House of Representatives contained in the resolution of inquiry adopted on the 17th of January, and also the resolution adopted on the 30th of January, in reference to the correspondence between the Department of Justice and the Post-Office Department touching the prosecution of persons charged with frauds in connection with the star-route mail service, and the reports of special agents of the Post-Office Department relating thereto, is requested to withhold such parts of the papers called for the publication of which in advance of the commencement of suits may be, and probably would be, detrimental to the public interests.

The SPEAKER. Is the demand for the regular order withdrawn?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. It is.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection to the present consideration of the resolution the question is on its adoption.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection to allow me to give an explanation?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I withhold the objection for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will be recognized to make a statement, the right to object to the consideration of the resolution being reserved.

Mr. SPRINGER. This resolution is accompanied by a report from the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. That report is on the Speaker's table, and is made in reference to a letter sent to this House and referred by the House to that committee, in which the Postmaster-General advises the House that it would be against the public interest to publish certain parts of this correspondence and information. With a view to respond to the suggestion of the Postmaster-General the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice have instructed me to report this resolution.

The resolution simply asks the Postmaster-General to withhold such parts of that information as would, if published, be detrimental to the interests of the Government. There are numerous cases in the Post-Office Department in reference to the amounts that may be recovered of individuals for overcharges in the postal service. Those cases contain briefs of the names of witnesses, what they will testify, and where they reside. It was thought by the Postmaster-General that if this information was given to the public it would greatly embarrass the officers of the Government in their endeavors to recover the amounts which the Government expects to recover in those cases.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. As I understand the gentleman, if these facts are published it will simply advise parties and witnesses what is to be apprehended, and will give them an opportunity of getting out of the way of the process of the court.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the statement of the Postmaster-General, and in view of that fact the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice have recommended the adoption of the resolution which has been read. I hope the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] will withdraw his objection.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I regret that I can not withdraw my objection. I have had sufficient conference this morning with the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. MONEY], which committee reported this resolution to the House through me, to know that if he were present he would antagonize this resolution for reasons entirely satisfactory to him. For that reason I can not, in his absence, consent to the introduction of this resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman consent to have the resolution introduced and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice?

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I can not consent to that in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the resolution is not before the House.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I now renew and insist upon my demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports, and the morning hour will begin at five minutes past 1 o'clock.

Whereas it is alleged that fat and oils of hogs and cattle and of other animals, and also that vegetable oils are used in the making and compounding of suine, oleomargarine butter, butterine, and adulterated and imitation dairy products, and also that such fats and oils are used and are imported and are exported to be used for the making and compounding of such artificial, adulterated, and imitation dairy products, and that such adulterated imitation compounds are surreptitiously sold in this country and elsewhere in competition with genuine dairy products, greatly to the injury of the agriculturists and dairymen of the United States; and

Whereas it is alleged that the manufacture, sale, and exportation and disposition of said compounds, materials, and commodities is so conducted as to avoid general publicity and to prevent the obtaining of accurate or desirable statistics in relation thereto, and to mislead and deceive the consumer as to the actual character, composition, and ingredients thereof: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be, and hereby is, instructed to inquire into and investigate the said allegations and ascertain the facts relating thereto, and the facts and statistics of the adulterated and imitation compounds and mixtures of dairy products, and of the materials composing the same.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means.

They are as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Ohio Wool-Growers' Association, at Columbus, Ohio, January 15, 1884.

1. Resolved, That the reduction of duties on imported wools by the last Congress was an act of injustice to an important agricultural industry, which will, if it be not modified, result in paralyzing the business of sheep-breeding and wool-growing in the United States, and in transferring the same to foreign countries.

2. Resolved, That the flockmasters of Ohio, numbering 46,000, hereby earnestly protest against the injustice, and solemnly assure the wool-growers of other States of their readiness to unite with them in all proper and legitimate measures calculated to restore the wool tariff of 1867.

3. Resolved, That it is our sincere conviction that the late reduction of duties on wool was effected by means of an organized effort, having for its object the destruction of sheep husbandry in the United States, and the admission of wool from foreign nations free of duty; and against this effort it is the duty of the one million flockmasters engaged in producing wool to protest until their voice is heard in Congress and their rights respected by appropriate legislation.

4. Resolved, That it should be remembered that the United States now produce 300,000,000 pounds of wool annually, worth at least $100,000,000, and that so important an industry can not be seriously embarassed without injury to the general welfare. We denounce as unworthy of respectful consideration the fallacy and injustice of the manufacturers' claim that raw material should be free, and we ask with emphasis why is labor required to produce wool less worthy of protection than labor at the spindle or loom, where the raw material is converted into manufactured goods?

5. Resolved, That we solicit and entreat the wool-growers of other States to unite with us in the work of organizing the flockmasters of the Union into associations that shall be co-operative and harmonious, in order that we may be better able to contend with the manufacturers in the serious struggle that is upon us before the country and in the halls of legislation.

6. Resolved, That we tender our hearty thanks to such members of Congress and editors as have given us their sympathy and support in this struggle for justice, and we hereby solemnly declare that while prosecuting this effort for the maintenance of what is so manifestly right, we will at all times and in all places, without regard to former party predilections, do all in our power to secure a restoration of the wool tariff of 1867, believing and knowing as we do that any less protection than this will prove ruinous to our business.

7. Resolved, That the members of the Sixty-seventh General Assembly of Ohio are entitled to the thanks of the wool-growers of Ohio for the unanimity with which they adopted the resolution instructing our Senators and Representatives in Congress to vote for the restoration of the tariff on wool.

At the recent Ohio State agricultural convention, held in the city of Columbus, January 15 and 16, 1884, the subjoined resolutions were unanimously adopted and have been ordered forwarded to you:

"1. That the reduction of duties on imported wools by the last Congress was an act of injustice to an important agricultural industry, which will, if it be not modified, result in paralyzing the business of sheep-breeding and wool-growing in the United States and in transferring the same to foreign countries.

"2. That the flockmasters of Ohio, numbering 46,000, hereby earnestly protest against the injustice, and solemnly assure the wool-growers of other States of their readiness to unite with them in all proper and legitimate measures calculated to restore the wool tariff of 1867.

"3. That it is our sincere conviction that the late reduction of duties on wool was effected by means of an organized effort having for its object the destruction of sheep husbandry in the United States and the admission of wool from foreign nations free of duty; and against this effort it is the duty of the 1,000,000 of flockmasters engaged in producing wool to protest until their voice is heard in Congress and their rights respected by appropriate legislation.

"4. That it should be remembered that the United States now produce 300,000,000 pounds of wool annually, worth at least $100,000,000, and that so important an industry can not be seriously embarrassed without injury to the general welfare. We denounce as unworthy of respectful consideration the fallacy and injustice of the manufacturers' claim that raw material should be free; and we ask with emphasis, why is labor required to produce wool less worthy of protection than labor at the spindle or loom where the raw material is converted into manufactured goods?"

Respectfully,

JAS. W. FLEMING,
Assistant Secretary Ohio State Board Agriculture.

The Eastern Ohio Wool-Growers and Stock-Breeders' Association, in convention assembled, at Chesterfield, Ohio, on the 1st day of December, 1883, adopted the following:

"Whereas our last Congress in its action on the tariff reduced the rates of duty on imported wool to its present rate, causing a loss to the wool-producer of about 3 cents per pound, and making the production of the article not at all remunerative, and resulting in a general depression of the flock interests of the United States; and

"Whereas we believe the restoration of the tariff of 1867 on foreign wool will restore confidence to the sheep industry of the United States and put it on a firm footing: Therefore,

"Resolved, That we urge upon our Representatives in Congress, both in the House and Senate, that they use their best endeavors to restore the tariff on wools and woolens to the 1867 rates; and, therefore,

"Resolved, That hereafter we support those men for these offices who will take care of our interests in these matters.

"And be it resolved, That we indorse the recent action of the National Wool-Growers' Association in their deliberations at Chicago, and call upon the sheepherds and farmers all over the United States to co-operate with us in this contest for our rights and the good of the people.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the Ohio Farmer, Pittsburgh Stockman, and the county papers in each of the counties embraced in this association.

"W. R. GODDARD, Secretary."

I certify the above to be a true copy.

The farmers composing the lecture class at the Ohio State University, numbering one hundred members and representing forty counties of the State, adopted the following resolutions previous to adjournment:

"Resolved, That we look upon the act of the Forty-seventh Congress reducing the tariff on wool as unfair and unjust to the great agricultural interests of the State and as discriminating in favor of the manufacturers.

"Resolved, That we favor the restoration of the tariff of 1867.

"Resolved, That we will use all honorable means to influence our respective members in Congress to vote for the Converse bill.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, signed by the president and secretary, be forwarded to Hon. GEORGE L. CONVERSE."

JANUARY 25, 1884.

COSHOCTON COUNTY, OHIO.

Whereas the tariff act of 1867 gives to the wool-grower the only substantial protection which ever accrued to him under any tariff law; and

Whereas by an act of the last Congress the ad valorem duty is stricken off, thereby bringing very serious losses to us and in the end disaster and distress to the agriculturist: Therefore,

Resolved by the wool-growers of Coshocton County in convention assembled, That we hereby petition and earnestly request the present Congress to restore the 1867 rate on wool.

2. Resolved, That we will hereafter support only men for office who favor a just and ample protection to the wool-grower.

Resolutions adopted by the Columbiana County Sheep-Breeders and Wool-Growers' Association, June 26, 1883.

Inasmuch as we, the wool-growers of Columbiana County, Ohio, now in session, are fully aware of the great injustice done us by the members of the last Congress in the reduction of the tariff on wool: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That we, as wool-growers of this county, do agree to associate ourselves together and concentrate our influences, and pledge our honor that we will not give our influence or votes for any person for member of Congress in this district, regardless of party, who will not give us a proper guarantee that he will use his greatest influence and also vote for a proper protective tariff on the wool of our own country.

Resolved, That we cordially invite all the wool-growers of the United States to organize and join with us in this movement of self-protection, and show to our Representatives in Congress that the people are the sovereigns, and that we now, as wool-growers, demand that the great wool interest of this country shall not be sacrificed, but receive proper protection.

I hereby certify that the above is a true copy of the resolutions adopted by the Columbiana County Wool-Growers' Association.

Resolutions by the wool-growers of Fairfield County, adopted November 24, 1883.

Whereas upon the recommendation of the Tariff Commission, the last Congress passed a bill making a reduction of all the ad valorem duty on wools, which is equivalent to 3 to 3½ cents on competing Ohio wools; and

Whereas we were barely and scarcely protected under the tariff of 1867: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, as wool-growers, without regard to party lines, condemn the said action of last Congress.

Second. That we pledge ourselves to hereafter support only such men for office as we know to favor a just and ample protection to the wool-grower.

Third. That in our Representative in Congress, Hon. GEORGE L. CONVERSE, we have an able advocate, and an honest, capable exponent of the wishes and wants of the wool-grower.

PATENT ON GRAIN-SHOVELS.

Mr. HOBLITZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a short resolution of the Baltimore Corn and Flour Exchange protesting against the extension of the patent for grain shovels. It is very brief.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

It is as follows:

BALTIMORE, February 6, 1884.

Hon. F. S. HOBLITZELL,
Washington, D. C.:

At special meeting board directors Baltimore Corn and Flour Exchange this day the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas it has come to the knowledge of the Baltimore Corn and Flour Exchange that application has been made to Congress for an extension of the steam grain-shovel patents granted to George Milsom, Henry Spendelow, and George Y. Watson; and

Whereas the said patents have been in use for a long period, and have been an onerous tax upon the transportation of grain over the great water ways of the country, and have resulted in large profits to the owners of said patents. Therefore, in consideration of the largely increasing competition that the United States is experiencing with foreign countries for supplying grain to consuming markets,

Be it resolved, That this exchange respectfully protest against the extension of the above-named patents; and

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be telegraphed to the chairman Committee on Patents of the Senate and to our Senators and Representatives now in Congress.

WM. F. WHEATLEY, Secretary.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN PETITIONS.

Mr. WELLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the following soldiers' petition and soldiers' resolution. I do not ask to have the names printed, but simply the body of the petition and the body of the resolution. Both are very brief.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I object.

Mr. WELLER. I hope that the gentleman from Arkansas will withdraw his objection and let the soldiers of this country be honored by having a sample copy of their petitions printed in the RECORD. It comes from the Grand Army of the Republic, and it is only proper that they should have this honor while other resolutions are coming in day after day and being printed in the RECORD without objection.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I have no sort of objection to their having the ordinary hearing that is accorded to everybody else on the part of Congress. I am willing that the soldiers shall always have that fair hearing and ample consideration to which all persons are entitled, but if we are to put all such resolutions in the RECORD, it will very soon destroy its usefulness. I could almost fill the RECORD myself with petitions every day.

Mr. WELLER. I desire only to have a sample petition of the thousands that come to me printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I am only urging the objection which was made by the gentleman from Ohio who was a general in the Union Army. I refer to the chairman of the Committee on the Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay, of which I am a member. He made a similar objection a short time ago. I do not think we ought to undertake to print such matters, and I feel that I can make the same objection without impropriety or misconstruction.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. WELLER. I demand the regular order.

RULES.

Mr. BURNES. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for reference.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order is in the nature of an objection.

The regular order is the report from the Committee on Rules made on Monday and postponed until to-day for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the rules of this House have much to do with the comfort of its members as well as to do with their rights and those of their constituents, and I am anxious that reasonable debate shall be had in relation to the different suggestions as to amendments which have been made; that is, I have a proposition to make to the House, which I think fair and believe meets with the approval of the committee, that by unanimous consent there may be allowed five minutes for discussion on each amendment which has been proposed for information, four minutes of which time shall be under the control of the gentleman who may have presented such proposition and one minute simply reserved to the control of the committee in reply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow the Chair to suggest that the demand for the previous question is pending, and unless there be unanimous consent there can be no debate whatever on this report.

Mr. RANDALL. I am obliged to the Chair for the suggestion, because it goes to show the fairness of the proposition I have made.

There are ten amendments which have been introduced, and another I understand is to be offered by the gentleman from Colorado. We desire to have that come in under this proposed arrangement, making, I believe, in all eleven amendments, which would be fifty-five minutes of debate. It will thus be seen that before the previous question shall be ordered the House will have had the opportunity of debate on all these amendments, and will be better able to judge of the propriety of enforcing the previous question against these propositions or allowing them to come in and be voted upon separately.

In addition to that, when the five minutes' debate on each amendment shall have expired, then I suggest that the report of the Committee on Rules and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine shall be considered for thirty minutes for and thirty minutes against the report and the amendment, one-half of that time to be under the control of the gentleman from Maine, and the other within the control of the committee.

Mr. BUCKNER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose that the five minutes' debate shall only be for the mover of the amendment?

Mr. RANDALL. The time, for the sake of good order, has to be allotted in some way, and I do not know a better way to allot it than to give four minutes of the time to the gentleman who makes the proposition and one minute to the committee.

Mr. KASSON. I would like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that where a proposition goes to the change of the order of business in the House affecting the rights of committees it would hardly be possible in five minutes to do more than read the rule as it is. You can hardly in that time say a word beyond that.

Mr. RANDALL. What does the gentleman from Iowa suggest?

Mr. KASSON. I should ask for ten minutes on my amendment to Rule XXI, and that would be a very short time.

Mr. RANDALL. We had better in this matter treat all alike. Each of these amendments is of the same degree of importance to the member who may have offered it, and if the time is to be ten minutes on one proposition I think it had better be ten minutes on each and all of them.

Mr. KASSON. I have no objection to that, although I only spoke with reference to the proposition with which I am particularly concerned.

Mr. RANDALL. I shall modify the suggestion so as to make the time ten minutes on each amendment, allowing seven minutes to the advocates of the proposition and three to such members of the committee as may desire to oppose it.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman's proposition as now modified is a reasonable one.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that is fair.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire, with the consent of my friend from Pennsylvania, to offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an additional rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to include that amendment in his proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. I included that and so said in my remarks a moment ago.

The SPEAKER. The amendments sent up by the gentleman from Colorado will be read for the information of the House, as the other proposed amendments have been read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That each Representative, except the chairmen of standing or select committees which have a clerk, may appoint a clerk to serve during the session of Congress, who shall perform such clerical work as may be assigned by the Representative appointing him in aid of the discharge of his official duties, and shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the arrangement suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in relation to the debate upon these propositions?

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like the Chair to state what the proposition is.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the proposition it is that there be allowed ten minutes for debate on each one of the amendments which have been read for the information of the House, seven minutes in advocacy of the amendment and three minutes to its opponents; and after that is closed there shall be allowed one hour for debate on the report of the Committee on Rules and the amendments of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that hour being equally divided between the advocates and opponents of the report.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do I understand any amendment can be offered beyond those already pending?

The SPEAKER. There are none pending except those offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], and various amendments have been read for the information of the House, and which, under this arrangement, if it be assented to, will be discussed; after which the House, by the vote on the previous question, will determine whether it shall admit them to be voted on or exclude them.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the opportunity be afforded to other members to offer amendments?

The SPEAKER. Nothing has been said as to that.

Mr. SPRINGER. They are not excluded by this understanding.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the previous question is pending, which excludes all amendments except such as the gentleman from Pennsylvania in charge of the report may see proper to admit.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would that exclude amendments to these amendments?

The SPEAKER. The amendments are not now before the House for the purpose of being voted on.

Mr. SPRINGER. Are they to come in only by consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will again state the situation of the question. On Monday, when this report came in, various gentlemen asked leave to have read for the information of the House certain amendments which they designed to propose in case the previous question should not be ordered. Those proposed amendments were read and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, a demand for the previous question being then pending; and that is the situation to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. Are we to have a vote on each of those amendments?

The SPEAKER. Unless the demand for the previous question is voted down there will not be a vote on any amendments except those which have been offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to know whether it is understood in this unanimous consent that we are going to debate propositions not pending before the House.

The SPEAKER. The suggestion is made that, by unanimous consent, ten minutes be allowed for debate on each proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON], or rather to what I suppose is his object in making the inquiry, this arrangement is asked: First, that each member making a proposition shall have an opportunity of being heard, so that the House may be intelligently informed whether it is desirable to order the previous question to exclude in the aggregate these amendments which have been introduced and read for information, and whether the House will go directly to a vote upon the report of the Committee on Rules and the pending propositions of the gentleman from Maine. The House can, of course, if they desire to open the entire subject, vote down the previous question.

Mr. THOMPSON. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether that arrangement reserves the right to separate votes on the propositions.

Mr. RANDALL. That belongs to the House. The House can get a separate vote on every proposition as it is reached by voting down the previous question.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then there is no reservation in the unanimous consent asked?

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. If the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is agreed to, in what order will these amendments be considered?

Mr. RANDALL. In the order in which they appear in the RECORD, and I believe the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER] is the first amendment of that class.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I want to offer it; I want that understood.

Mr. RANDALL. I make this statement in reply to the gentleman.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Very well; if the understanding is that the amendment I offered is to be first considered, I am perfectly willing.

Mr. SPRINGER. But you can not get a vote on it.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Why not?

Mr. RANDALL. The House has the power to give a vote on it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Only by voting down the demand for the previous question.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Then let us vote down the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment in order of printing, the Chair understands, is the amendment submitted by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD], which is in substance the same as that of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. It is just the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] as stated to the House? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The first proposition of amendment to be considered is the one submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER], which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV additional clause as follows:

"When any public bill or resolution shall have been referred to a committee, and the committee shall fail or refuse to report said bill or resolution back to the House of Representatives, either favorably or unfavorably, for thirty days, it shall be in order for the member who offered the bill or resolution, on any Monday, immediately after the morning hour, to move to discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill or resolution, and the House shall then dispose of the bill or resolution by recommittal or by final action, such as a majority of the House may determine."

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER] as entitled to the floor for seven minutes in support of the amendment which has just been read.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, after the reading of the amendment which I had the honor to offer it would seem unnecessary for me to offer any argument in favor of a proposition so manifestly just, proper, and right, which is desired to protect not only the individual rights of every member but to protect the rights of a majority of this House.

No member will for a moment deny that the voice of a majority of this House ought to control in all matters of legislation. But, sir, let us look for a moment at the practical operation of the rules of this House. As soon as a bill or resolution is offered by a member it is immediately referred to a committee, and unless the committee reports it back to the House the House is powerless to act upon it, although it may be a public bill affecting the interest of the whole American people, giving them some proper relief which is imperatively demanded. But, sir, if a majority of the committee are opposed to the bill, they simply pocket it and refuse to report it back, and by their action prevent a majority of this House from voting for a public bill or resolution that a large majority may be in favor of.

One would hardly suppose that a committee would resort to this method to prevent action by this House; yet, sir, I state without fear of contradiction that it has often been done, and the fact is well known to every old member who hears my voice. None will deny it. Why, sir, the pending amendment is an illustration of the evil sought to be remedied. I have offered this amendment at the beginning of four sessions of Congress, and it has been referred to the Committee on Rules, and, sir, up to this day the committee has failed to make any report on this amendment, and now, when I am attempting to offer it, we are cut off by the previous question, which has been moved by the gentleman who has charge of the report of the Committee on Rules. It is true I have the poor privilege of seven minutes to offer reasons in favor of the amendment, but whether we are even now to be allowed a vote on the amendment I do not know. Why, sir, have not the committee reported back this amendment with a favorable or unfavorable opinion? Either would do, for it would give the House an opportunity to vote upon it. But, sir, they have held this proposed amendment in their possession session after session until Congress adjourned and thus prevented a vote on it.

So it has been with a great many public bills that I have seen offered in this House since I have been a member of Congress. Sir, is this right? Ought a majority of this House to be thus handicapped by seven men on a committee? Ought such an evil to exist without a remedy? I assert in the hearing of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the other members of the committee that there is no remedy under the rules to force a committee by a majority vote to report back a public bill or resolution to this House. A majority sits here powerless. I was told the other day that a motion might be made to discharge the committee and consider the bill; but this requires the vote of two-thirds, and, as the honorable Speaker said, there is not even a time for such a motion provided for, and it would require unanimous consent to make even that motion—one member could defeat it—and of course a member on the committee holding back the bill would object.

Sir, a majority of this House under the Constitution has the right to control legislation in this body. The Constitution does not require a majority of two-thirds to pass a bill—a majority has the right. No bad result could follow from the remedy I offer for this evil, for no member would resort to this remedy as long as a committee was in good faith examining the bill, for every member desires a favorable report, and it would only be resorted to when a committee refuses or fails to report back a bill after full time to consider it. If the committee are opposed to a bill let them report it back with an adverse report. That puts it before the House for a vote. I have confined this amendment to public bills, not to pension bills or private bills of any character.

I have offered this amendment not as a partisan, but in the interest of every member of this House. It is to assert the right of a majority to control. We live in a republican government, and a majority ought to control. I use the word "republican" in its broad sense as applicable to our form of government.

Mr. Speaker, I wish that we had a fair opportunity to discuss this amendment, that others who agree with me and who are far abler than myself could have an opportunity to be heard in favor of this amendment, so just, right, and proper, and in the interest of the whole people whom we are here to represent; as the rules now stand they enable a majority of a committee to exercise an unconstitutional power.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I think it is due to the Committee on Rules that I should explain the motives which actuated them in not reporting favorably the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER]. With the principle at the bottom of his resolution I have entire sympathy, which I have already expressed. But there are practical difficulties in the way which I want the House to consider before making up its mind.

As I said the other day, this House does only 8 per cent. of its business; and our whole legislation with relation to rules must hinge upon that important fact. There is no physical possibility of doing much more than 8 per cent. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky is that when any bill is not reported by any committee within a specified time it shall at once upon any Monday become a privileged bill; in other words, it shall become entitled to stop the other business of the House. This would have the effect of preventing on Monday the presentation of bills; for it would necessarily take the whole day.

Now here is a choice between evils. The question is, whether in order to remedy the evil of the non-action of a committee chosen by the House, and supposed to represent its views, you shall give to an individual member the right to make privileged nine-tenths of the business of this House, and to make such business privileged not because a committee recommends it, but simply and solely because a committee does not recommend it.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the rules provide that every bill introduced here shall be referred to a committee, the object being to hear from the committee, after they have examined the bill, a recommendation. This reference does not interfere at all with the consideration of a bill by the House, because even if reported negatively a single member can demand that it go upon the Calendar. The practical effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky would be to destroy the business of the first and third Mondays of each month, which are already allotted to motions to suspend the rules, and to destroy also the second and fourth, and, when it occurs, the fifth Monday, which it is in view to give to the business of the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on the Territories. The gentleman's amendment provides, as has been well said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that a bill which can not secure a recommendation from a committee shall be precipitated upon the House for a final vote, yea or nay.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. Debate on this proposition is exhausted. The Clerk will read the next proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule X by inserting, after the line "on Revision of the Laws, to consist of eleven members," the following, to wit: "on Political Rights of Women, to consist of eleven members."

The SPEAKER. This was proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE], who is entitled to the floor for seven minutes.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, ever since the organization of this House I have received petitions from my constituents in regard to this matter of the political rights of women, but under the action of the House in its organization there seems to be no committee to which they could properly be referred. A few years since, when this question of woman suffrage was submitted to the people in my State, more than 40,000 electors were in favor of it. I believe much more than that number are at the present time in favor of it. It seems to me, without putting ourselves on the question of political rights of women, it is but respectful to a very large number of people in all our States that there should be a committee to receive and consider and report upon these petitions which come to us from time to time.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, those who are engaged in the agitation of this question command my unbounded respect for their purity and high character, for the zeal and energy which they exhibit, and for the intellect that they possess. But I submit to the House that this is an adjudicated question by the House itself. On the 20th of December last the Committee on Rules allowed a report to be made without their recommendation; but, nevertheless, in order that the judgment of the House might be tested, a vote was taken upon that by "yeas" and "nays," and the record of that vote shows 85 in favor and 124 against this proposition. Therefore, recognizing the fact that the Committee on Rules is the mere voice of the House, as it should be, they have not felt it to be proper for them to proceed further in reference to this subject.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment, submitted by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIV be amended by adding the following words:

"Provided, That an ex-member of Congress, on and after the fifth day from his first admission to the floor of the House, shall only be admitted thereto during the remainder of that Congress by an order of the Speaker; nor shall the Speaker issue said order until such ex-member shall have certified upon his honor as a man that he is not personally, pecuniarily, or professionally interested, either directly or indirectly, in the passage or defeat of any claim, bill, or other measure pending before Congress or any of its committees; that he is not, either personally or professionally, in the employ, service, or interest, either directly or indirectly, of any railroad, telegraph, or other company, corporation, person, or combination of corporations or persons having a pecuniary interest in the passage or defeat of any claim, bill, or measure pending before Congress or its committees; and pledging his word that, while the House is in session, he will in no way communicate with a member thereof respecting any claim, bill, measure, or action which may affect the welfare of any railroad, telegraph, or other company, corporation, person, or combination of corporations or persons having an interest in legislation pending before Congress. The Committee on Rules, upon ascertainment of any violation of this proviso, shall immediately declare the offender forever deprived of the privilege of the floor as an ex-member of Congress."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, the object of this proposed amendment to the rule is perfectly clear. It seeks to recognize two facts: first, the extension of a courtesy, proper perhaps, to an ex-member of Congress; and, second and mainly, to prevent an ex-member of Congress from abusing the privileges of the floor for the purpose of influencing legislation as a lobbyist.

There can be no honor conferred directly by the people of the United States upon any man greater, in my judgment, than the honor which is conferred when the voters of a Congressional district of this Union select a given gentleman as the one who shall be their Representative in this body; and by that selection, under the Constitution as well as under the rules of the House, they give him full and absolute right to the floor of this House and to all of the privileges of the floor. When such a one has served his term and comes to our door and, because of the glory which has been conferred upon him, says to the Doorkeeper, "I am an ex-member of Congress," this House, recognizing the sheen of that glory as still adhering and inhering in him, and animated by that broad generosity which we all desire to exercise, extends to him all the hospitalities and privileges which we can possibly give. That, I think, may be right; and yet, gentlemen, it is not done by any parliamentary body, I believe, of any other nation on the globe. And the fact that a constituency have not re-elected a man is the best evidence that they do not send him here, but do clothe his successor with the privileges of the floor; yet, as an act of courtesy, we welcome him to our hospitality.

But now take a wholly different case. Suppose that a gentleman comes to yonder door and says, "I am an ex-member of Congress, and as such desire to avail myself of the courtesy of the floor and all its privileges." Because of that fact he obtains admission. But he has been sent here, we will suppose, by Mr. Huntington to do all in his power to prevent the forfeiture of railroad land grants; or he has been sent here by Mr. Jay Gould to prevent legislation injurious to some of his interests; or that he comes in the interest of the Western Union Telegraph Company to prevent if possible legislation detrimental to its monopoly; and he comes to the door and obtains admission as an ex-member. That qualification of ex-membership gives him entrance and the privilege of the floor. But as soon as he is inside he is not simply an ex-member nor chiefly an ex-member; he is chiefly a lobbyist.

Now, this proposed amendment to the rules makes a clear and explicit distinction between those two propositions—the extension of the rites of hospitality, all the courtesies of the floor, to an ex-member who comes in the capacity and true spirit of an ex-member, and, on the other hand, the same extension to the man who comes really as a lobbyist. But when a man undertakes to abuse that hospitality and the true privileges of an ex-member, and directly or indirectly seeks to influence legislation by this body, not as a member of the House, but as an ex-member acting in behalf, we will suppose, of some of the grasping corporations of the country (and we will suppose that he does not even do that directly, but that he does it indirectly), then he should not be admitted.

As an instance of this I might refer to a circumstance which occurred yesterday when the bill for the prevention of pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases of cattle was up, to which many gentlemen are opposed and for different reasons, some because of locality, some because of the sincere belief that the bill is wrong, and some others because it interferes with railroad interests. Now, then, suppose that some ex-member, in the interest of a railroad, comes on this floor and wishes to oppose that bill. He would not say outright that his opposition came from the fact that the bill interfered with the railroads, but would probably put his objection on the ground that the measure would necessitate a large increase of the employés of the Government, and for that reason, as was stated to me on yesterday by one gentleman, the measure was objectionable. His patriotic soul was cleft and riven by the danger that threatened the Republic if a few more employés were added to the roll for the protection of our herds against contagious diseases, and by that great danger alone! Did he suppose for an instant that I did not see through that ostrich pretense, and did not go behind the objection assigned to the real cause of his opposition to that bill? He was lobbying for the railroad interest all the same.

So this lobbying by ex-members may be done indirectly as well as directly, and all that this amendment proposes is that where a gentleman comes and says, "Gentlemen, I am here as an ex-member; I greet you as such; I desire to be greeted as such; by signing your pledge I have assured you that I am not here for any improper purpose;" then upon that statement he shall obtain admission. If I were an ex-member—and I do not desire to be one—but if I should ever come here in that capacity, I would a great deal rather come upon this floor, after having signed that statement and pledged my honor to it, than come in with every one of you wanting to know what I was after.

This rule proposes an ex-member may come for five days without such pledge, but that afterward, and where gentlemen undertake to avail themselves of this privilege and, although they seek admission as ex-members, yet really come to us as the attorneys of somebody for something, then those doors shall be closed against them and that we shall say, "As an attorney you shall not come upon this floor; you shall be put precisely upon the same level as other claim agents."

It appears to me the mere statement of the proposition is all the argument which is needed. That there have been improper practices history abundantly testifies.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Rules have not been deaf to complaints like those which have just been made by the gentleman from Kansas. They have in fact given serious consideration to the subject, but have reached no conclusion.

It is one of the most difficult questions that the Committee on Rules have had to consider how and where to draw the line between such ex-members of Congress as come here in the legitimate pursuit of their profession, and those who come here because of the pleasure derived from old associations among members and those memories which attach to the place itself. I think the Committee on Rules would as lief have the House try to reach an intelligent rule on this subject——

Mr. ANDERSON. I am willing to withdraw my amendment if the committee can frame a better one.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Kansas states he is willing to withdraw the amendment if the committee can frame a better one. I do not know that the committee can frame a more effective one.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is the point.

Mr. RANDALL. But they might find one that would not work hardship. For instance, an ex-member of Congress might come here in the pursuit of social pleasure and might want to stay over five days, as is provided for in the rule introduced by the gentleman from Kansas. I hardly know how to reach it myself. At a former time we had a rule, or practice rather, that ex-members of Congress signed a paper in which, on their honor, they said they were not interested in any legislation or employed to promote legislation, but that passed out of existence because it became a dead letter. Something no doubt should be done in this direction.

I should like to have an opportunity of inserting in the RECORD the history of the action of the House of Representatives in relation to this subject of admissions to the floor. It would be interesting reading, and it is not long—only about a page of the Digest.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania can insert in his remarks what he has indicated.

There was no objection.

The portion of the Digest referred to by Mr. RANDALL is as follows:

FLOOR, PRIVILEGE OF ADMISSION TO.

(See Rule XXXIV.)

The first rule for the admission within the Hall of other than members was adopted on the 7th January, 1802, and was confined to "Senators, officers of the General and State Governments, foreign ministers, and such persons as members might introduce." On the 11th January, 1802, an attempt was made to amend so as to exclude persons "introduced by members," which failed. On the 8th November, 1804, a proposition was made to confine the privilege to Senators, which also failed. On the 17th December, 1805, officers of State governments were excluded. On the 1st February, 1808, a proposition was made to admit ex-members of Congress and the judges of the Supreme Court. After a good deal of debate it was rejected. On the 11th February, 1809, the rule was enlarged so as to admit judicial officers of the United States, as also ex-members of Congress. On the 25th February, 1814, those who had been heads of Departments were admitted. On the 10th February, 1815, officers who had received the thanks of Congress were included; on the 12th January, 1816, the Navy commissioners; on the 21st February, 1816, governors of States and Territories; March 13, 1822, the President's secretary. On the 26th January, 1833, the rule was further enlarged by admitting "such persons as the Speaker or a member might introduce," and on the 10th December, 1833, the House, by a vote almost unanimous, rescinded that amendment. On the 23d of December, 1857, soon after removing into the new Hall in the south wing of the Capitol extension, the privilege of admission was restricted to "members of the Senate, their Secretary, heads of Departments, President's private secretary, the governor for the time being of any State, and judges of the Supreme Court of the United States." On the 19th of March, 1860, it was adopted in its present form, excepting the last clause, a proposition to admit ex-members having been rejected. The last clause, adopted March 2, 1865, was intended to prevent persons not entitled to the privilege of the Hall from occupying the cloak and other adjoining rooms. January 29, 1878, the House adopted the following resolution by yeas 155 to nays 92, namely: "Resolved, That the rule in regard to the admission of persons to the privileges of the floor be enforced, and the Speaker is requested to discontinue the practice of issuing passes, which has been indulged in by common consent." (See Journal, first session Forty-fifth Congress, pages 316, 317.)

[The Doorkeeper is required by Rule V, clause 1, to execute strictly the aforesaid rule.]

Mr. COX, of New York, addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There is one minute remaining for debate.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield that minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. I can only say in the minute allowed me that some five or six years ago the Committee on Rules, of which I was then a member and of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania was a member, reported a very stringent rule on this subject. We felt then there was a grievance and that it should be remedied. The trouble was not so much with governors of States, &c., as with ex-members of Congress, who came here and took up our time. They signed a paper as to non-interest in general claims pending before Congress, but they always had specific claims to look after on this floor. I have seen ex-members of Congress buttonholing members at their seats, laying before them facts as to railroad companies and other corporations requiring legislation in which they were interested.

That thing ought to be stopped somehow. I can not now indicate the mode of stopping it. I know at the time I introduced that report from the Committee on Rules the distinguished ex-Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, was one of the majority to report that rule to the House. And it only failed by a few votes because some of the gentlemen of the committee who authorized it at that time, and whom I shall not name, failed to sustain it on the floor of the House. There is a mischief which needs a remedy.

Mr. ANDERSON. Why not adopt this resolution?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The next amendment is that proposed by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS].

Mr. MAGINNIS. In accordance with the suggestions of some members of the Committee on Rules I offer a modification of the amendment which has been printed, and which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the amendment as proposed to be modified, as follows:

That the second, fourth, and fifth Mondays in each month shall be devoted to the consideration of reports of committees in relation to the business of the District of Columbia and of the Territories of the United States, not to include propositions for the creation of new Territories or the admission of new States.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Speaker, the amendment is so framed as not to admit under this head any of the things that were deemed objectionable by the Committee on Rules, and so framed that we can receive recognition of the House for the transaction of our business on the same footing and in the same line as the District of Columbia. The Territories are now large, rich, and powerful. There is a constant disposition against the admission of new States.

Scarcely any State in the Union has come in with a greater number of inhabitants than possessed by some of the smallest Territories that now exist. In many ways those Territories are dependent upon Congress in matters relating to their courts and one thing and another. We would be very well satisfied to take our chances with the Committee on the District of Columbia to secure a hearing of these matters.

Mr. RANDALL. The effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS], if adopted, would be to give to the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on the Territories the second, fourth, and fifth Mondays. The judgment of the Committee on Rules is already concluded as to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I think that in any event that committee will be given the second and fourth Mondays of each month for the consideration of its business. To add the fifth Monday would be to give another day in such months as have five Mondays for the consideration of business from the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on the Territories. Perhaps there might be some understanding between those two committees for the division of time so allowed, the Committee on the District of Columbia to have preference.

Mr. MAGINNIS. That would be quite satisfactory to us. There are matters affecting our Territories, the apportionment of the Territories for members of the Legislature and other things, which we must obtain action of Congress upon. Sometimes those matters go over without action. It certainly would be a great relief to the Speaker that we should not be compelled to stand in the area in front of his chair endeavoring to seek recognition for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to have some matter considered which is of importance to the Territories we represent.

Mr. RANDALL. I am advised that the Committee on the District of Columbia prefer to have the rule so framed that they shall have two days in the month distinct from any other committee. I ought to say that——

Mr. MAGINNIS. I know; but suppose they do want it in that way. The other Territories of the United States have almost the same claim upon the consideration of Congress as the District of Columbia. Of course the Territories are not represented here by individuals who can obtain the ear of the House, but they are just as much entitled to consideration as is the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman is a little too modest in that statement.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that such an arrangement as he suggests, which would give the Committee on the District of Columbia the second and fourth Mondays of the month and give to the Committee on Territories the fifth Monday in those months which have five Mondays, would be acceptable to us.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the business before the Committee on the District of Columbia is now accumulating very rapidly, and in the opinion of that committee two days each month will not be more than enough for the consideration of business to be reported from that Committee to the House.

Mr. MAGINNIS (to Mr. MULDROW). You would agree to letting us have the fifth Monday in each month that has five Mondays, as I have suggested?

Mr. MULDROW. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RANDALL. I think I can give the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] the assurance that the Committee on Rules will consider hereafter the propriety of giving a day to business from the Committee on Territories, with such limitations as I suppose the gentleman will agree to.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I think we had better settle the matter now while the subject is before the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the House taking a vote on every one of these propositions by tellers, not by yeas and nays—I want to save time—that too much time shall not be taken up in the disposition of these various propositions.

Mr. MAGINNIS. The proposition I have submitted excludes all questions relating to the admission of new States and the formation of States from Territories. It refers only to small matters of details which the House will generally pass by unanimous consent if we can only get them before the House; but they are matters which are of great importance to us.

Mr. CALKINS. Fix up a rule for that purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX, of New York). The next proposition in order will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 22, Rule XI, so as to read:

"To the improvement of the Mississippi River, its levees and tributaries, to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposition just read was submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL], who is absent on account of illness. If no other member desires to speak upon it, the next one will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XIV by striking out, wherever they occur, in rules relating to time allowed for debate, the words "one hour" and inserting "thirty minutes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This proposition was also submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL]. If any other member desires to speak upon it, the Chair will recognize him for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the last proposition read is one to abridge what is known as the hour rule, so as to make thirty minutes instead of one hour the limit of debate. The history of the hour rule in the United States, where I think it originated, both as applicable to parliamentary practice and to practice in the courts, is a very interesting subject. I regret that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] is not present so that the opportunity might be presented for discussing this question relating to the restrictions of debate in courts and in legislative bodies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the third paragraph of Rule XXI be amended by striking out all after the word "progress," in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "not including propositions for increase of salaries: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the recommendation of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the amendment proposed, the same being germane to the clause of the bill affected thereby;" so that, if amended as proposed, the rule will read:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, not including propositions for increase of salaries: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the recommendation of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the amendment proposed, the same being germane to the clause of the bill affected thereby."

The SPEAKER. This amendment was proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON].

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Speaker, this amendment deserves the attention of the House, as it involves so largely the rights of all other committees than the Committee on Appropriations in respect to amendments upon appropriation bills. By the present rule that committee may take charge of the business of almost any other committee by submitting a proposition involving a reduction of the amount appropriated by existing law; and the Committee on Appropriations may thus proceed to change a system of law which may even be at the time under consideration by another committee of this House, while the latter committee, having an amendment prepared which does not either retrench or increase expenditures, has no power to propose that amendment, although germane to the subject-matter of the clause of the appropriation bill under consideration. Under the operation of this rule, during the last Congress legislation was had which was directly against the recommendation—in one case the unanimous recommendation—of one of the committees of this House. I refer to the Committee on Foreign Affairs; and the same thing has happened frequently with regard to other committees. In this way portions of our system of laws are struck out or changed in their character without the measure having been considered by the committee charged by our rules with the consideration of the subject-matter. It is a continual evil in the administration of our rules that we have allowed committees other than the Committee on Appropriations to be divested of the right of proposing amendments of the laws touching matters within their jurisdiction; and we have given this right exclusively to the Committee on Appropriations, upon the single condition that the proposition submitted by them shall reduce to the extent of a dollar more or less the amount appropriated under existing law.

I have always been opposed to thus withdrawing from the functions of the various committees of the House the elements of their jurisdiction. It is a question that concerns us all. The Judiciary Committee, for example, may wish to change some part of the administration of the Department of Justice for which appropriations are made without increasing expenses at all. The committee may have solemnly deliberated upon the proposition and may desire to submit it as an amendment to a clause in the appropriation bill to which it is germane. They can not do it. But the Appropriations Committee, under cover of an amendment reducing by one dollar the appropriations called for by existing law, may present and have passed measures which change the entire system of judicial administration without consulting the Committee on the Judiciary at all. A similar statement might be made with regard to all the committees of the House. Complaint has heretofore been made in reference to this matter, and it will be made as long, probably, as this House continues in existence, unless the rule be changed.

The proposition which I have submitted provides merely that the proper committee of the House may propose upon an appropriation bill an amendment which is germane to the clause under consideration at the time. The power of proposing amendments to our general system of laws is thus given to the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and taken away from the Committee on Appropriations, which has not such jurisdiction.

In consequence of the present rule and the practice under it, we are at every session coming into conflict with the Senate, because of general legislation attached to appropriation bills under the rule as it now stands. The function of the Committee on Appropriations at the time it was formed was simply the examination of all the appropriations required to maintain the Government under existing laws and to carry on public works in progress. Under that authority the habit grew up of allowing propositions not only to reduce salaries, but to increase them. I desire that the right to increase salaries upon appropriation bills shall continue to be denied; and consequently it is a part of my proposition that the right of amendment under it shall not include any increase of salaries. But upon the other point, the question of jurisdiction, I desire distinctly to take away from the Committee on Appropriations the power of submitting amendments to the general law, and to confer that power upon the particular committee which under the rules of the House may be charged with jurisdiction of the subject-matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman propose that any committee of the House having jurisdiction of the subject may propose any general legislation upon appropriation bills?

Mr. KASSON. Not "any general legislation," but such as may be germane to the clause of the appropriation bill under consideration. So far as the Appropriations Committee now has the right to do this, I propose that the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter shall have the same right.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman might propose the whole consular and diplomatic system of the Government might be changed on an appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. As in the last Congress you did change it in part.

Mr. BLOUNT. A salary was changed here and there, but not the whole system.

Mr. KASSON. And it ought not to be so that the whole system can be changed. Under the present rule you strike at the whole system by making an appropriation which shall cost a little less, a thousand or a hundred dollars, as that gives the committee jurisdiction of the whole matter. The difficulty is, two committees are having control of all the business of the House, the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask a question.

Mr. KASSON. Every House ought to have an opportunity to consider the business before it. If the amendment of the gentleman from Maine be adopted it will give them that opportunity. There is also no opportunity to make partial amendments in respect to appropriations where under existing laws the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction. The committee having jurisdiction of the matter ought to have the right to propose an amendment instead of leaving it to the Appropriations Committee. That is the object of the rule, to restore to each committee its rights in that respect equally with the other committees of the House.

Mr. CANNON. I ask the gentleman whether or not the provision to Rule XXI does not give other committees more power than the Committee on Appropriations as to amendment of appropriation bills?

Mr. RANDALL. The last clause.

Mr. CANNON. It does not give them more power.

Mr. HOLMAN. This will enlarge the power of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. Of the necessity for the adoption of this rule and its usefulness the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is abler to speak than I am, as he originated it as it now exists. He had my full co-operation at the time, and I have never seen a day when I wanted to change that rule. I believe it to be directly in the interest of economy, and against extravagant expenditures.

Mr. HOLMAN. The last clause.

Mr. RANDALL. The last clause to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has referred gives to the committee full and ample power in that direction, while the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON], if I understand it correctly, destroys the rule in this particular, namely: that amendments shall not be in order even when we want to reduce the expenditures of the Government, and remits it back to the condition of things existing in the Forty-third Congress, when the then Speaker, resting on a decision of a former Speaker, decided that the rule as it then stood gave the right to the House to insert legislation in the direction of increased expenditure and denied the right to insert legislation showing economy on its face. The Forty-fourth turned Congress right-about face on that decision, and adopted the rule which has been continued ever since, and which, I think, is a wholesome one, and that everybody, without regard to political divisions, should want to keep in force.

Mr. KASSON. If the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has not expired I would like to say that in such bill—such question as appropriations for the Navy, for instance—the Appropriations Committee has a power which they exercised in the last Congress beyond that which the Naval Committee itself can exercise. And so, also, in reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, in regard to the employment of a consul. They can strike out of the bill the provision for the employment of a consul, but they can not add one. My object is to allow such committee, as the Naval Committee, for instance, to move an amendment providing for the construction of an additional ship, with proper provisions limiting the cost, if in their judgment such construction shall be deemed necessary, instead of leaving that subject to the Committee on Appropriations. My object is to allow the Committee on Foreign Affairs to ask an additional consulate when in their judgment it is needed, without leaving that to the Committee on Appropriations. They have the power now of knocking one out, but they have no power to put one in. And I exclude all matters relating to increase of salaries from my amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me read in this connection the proviso to clause 3 of Rule XXI:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. KASSON. Very well.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, the appropriation bills are in fact matters of legislation which relate to the expenditures of the Government, and I am perfectly willing to have incorporated legislation that will reduce expenditures, but am not willing for a moment, so far as my vote goes, to permit anything to go on an appropriation bill changing existing law which shall increase expenditures.

Mr. KASSON. However essential or important it may be?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CALKINS. I hope the Chair will indulge me for a moment in reply to the chairman of my committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair). The time has expired.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to have two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman from Indiana will be allowed to proceed for two minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, I commenced in the Forty-sixth Congress criticising this rule. I do not believe that the time will ever come when I shall change my opinion with reference to this subject, and I think the mistake made in framing that rule is the same mistake that we are now making in keeping it in force in this House.

I think the Appropriations Committee of this House should be stripped of all powers of legislation, not stripped of power to reduce expenditures, because it is in the power of the committee to report just such expenditures as it may think the Government should make——

Mr. RANDALL. I beg pardon there. There may be existing laws which are compulsory upon the committee and which require certain appropriations which the judgment of the committee does not indorse.

Mr. KASSON. Why not have the judgment of the House upon it?

Mr. CALKINS. I think the Committee on Appropriations should take a bold stand and refuse improper appropriations. But the mistake, as I have intimated, is in having any legislation whatever on appropriation bills.

[Here the hammer fell].

The Speaker resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee to ascertain the results of the Tenth Census be appointed, to have the same number of members, duties, privileges, and powers as the committee of the same name had in the last Congress, and that said committee be authorized to employ a clerk.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I proposed that amendment to be sent to the Committee on Rules; but at the instance of several gentlemen I have also presented it here for the information of the House.

I am not certain but that it would have been wiser to leave this matter to the Committee on Rules for their consideration. But I wish to place upon the record the reasons for the re-establishment of the Committee on the Census as contemplated by this amendment.

The census act of 1879 was a comprehensive law; not simply for political apportionment, not merely for the regeneration of our representative system, but for statistical information, for scientific purposes, for the enlargement of our interests, for the purpose of instructing in legislation as well as in social science. I happened to be connected with the Committee on the Census as its chairman, and reported the bill which is now the law. We limited the expenditures of that census to three millions of dollars. I know that we ran beyond that, but it was because of some misdirection or lack of judgment somewhere, for instead of publishing these various volumes, if I may so speak, in tandem, they were published or endeavored to be published all abreast, and therefore have been delayed in their publication. They have cost far more by reason of this delay. But in the law of 1879 there is one section which I would like to have read, and on which I would like to have a new committee to pass, as well as a new committee for the purpose of closing up the old business up to the present time. This section of the law, section 22, I will send to the desk and ask the Clerk to have read, and during its reading I ask the careful attention of the House to the subject. The section to which I refer was intended to provide a decennial or semi-decennial census of the States. The States were to take a census between the two decennial periods. They were to take a census the expenditure of which was to be borne by the Federal Government to the extent of one-half and the other by the States. It contemplated having the schedules of the States modeled on the plan of the Federal census, so as to permit a proper comparison between the two, for the purpose of giving the States their rights and information in order to the proper apportionment of their legislative systems.

Now unless something be done to carry out that twenty-second section it will fall as a dead letter. I desire to keep that section alive and to perfect it, if it be possible; and at the request of many scientific gentlemen, especially from the city of Philadelphia, I have reported a bill whereby we might remodel many of these schedules, cut off a large part of them, reduce them in many ways for the purpose of assisting in our fast-going, and get the intelligence to be sent out abroad throughout the land and the world more promptly than it can now be sent out by our decennial census merely.

Therefore I hope and pray this House, if they would perpetuate this unexampled system of census-taking, such as no other nation has ever had, will give us a committee for the purpose of carrying out this twenty-second section. I ask that it be read, that my remarks may be better appreciated.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 22. That if any State or Territory, through its duly appointed officers or agents, shall, during the two months beginning on the first Monday of June of the year which is the mean between the decennial censuses of the United States is by this act directed to be taken, take and complete a census in all respects according to the schedules and forms of enumeration in the census of the United States and shall deposit with the Secretary of the Interior, on or before the 1st of September following, a full and authentic copy of all schedules returned and reports made by the officers and agents charged with such enumeration, then the Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon receiving a certificate from the Secretary of the Interior that such schedules and reports have been duly deposited, pay, on the requisition of the governor of such State or Territory, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to fifty per cent. of the amount which was paid to all supervisors and actual enumerators within such State or Territory at the United States census next preceding, increased by one-half the percentage of gain in population in such State or Territory between the two United States censuses next preceding: Provided, That the blank schedules used for the purposes of the enumeration herein provided for shall be similar, in all respects of form and size of heading and ruling, to those used in the census of the United States.

Mr. COX, of New York. I beg to say to the House that the Senate have a special committee for this very purpose. I do not care so much about having a clerk to the committee. I do not know that that is needed. I know that I did all the work connected with this census business without the aid of a clerk, which the House very ungallantly refused at that time; and I think I could close up the business and save some money by doing without a clerk.

One word more. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], or some one, suggested to me the other day in conversation that this might tend to perpetuate the office of the Superintendent of the Census. It may have that effect or it may not, according to the decision of the House. But heretofore in all previous decennial periods there has been a clerk of the census at a salary, so that he might take care of this business until the proper time came for the enumeration.

I would provide to-day, if I had the power, for the continuance of this office of chief clerk of the census, abolishing the office of Superintendent, and simply keeping the business along as they do in France, Germany, and England, where a register's office runs all the time with a view to collecting, collating, and publishing proper statistical information.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. RANDALL. I think I may with frankness state the reasons which seem to operate on the minds of the members of the Committee on Rules in relation to this matter. The committee believed there was existing law sufficient, including that section of the law which the gentleman from New York has caused to be read, to execute everything that was essential in regard to the recent census; and therefore that a committee on the census, which was organized as a special committee and not as a permanent committee of this House, was unnecessary, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] is quite correct when he quotes me, and perhaps other members, as indicating that there was in the minds of some of the committee a belief that this would lead to the organization of a permanent bureau in the Government. We all know the tendency in that direction, and it needs no impulse at our hands. Hence the Committee on Rules, when the committees came to be fixed at the early part of the session, omitted the committee as to the census.

I now yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CHACE], who desires to ask a question.

Mr. CHACE. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York to explain fully what he means by the language he uses in his amendment:

To have the same number of members, duties, privileges, and powers as the committee of the same name had in the last Congress.

I suppose the gentleman does not mean to give the proposed committee quite that scope.

Mr. COX, of New York. With the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. RANDALL. I am afraid I have no more time to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MILLS). The time for the debate on this amendment has expired.

Mr. COX, of New York. Let me say that the scope of the resolution raising this committee was simply to care for the census for purposes of enumeration and statistics. And that would be the scope of the powers committed to the committee that would be raised by this amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 241) to repeal section 8 of an act entitled "An act to accept and ratify the agreement submitted by the confederated bands of Ute Indians in Colorado for the sale of their reservation in said State, and for other purposes, and to make the necessary appropriations for carrying out the same," approved June 15, 1880.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, his Secretary, who also announced to the House that the President had approved and signed a joint resolution of the following title:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 116) fixing the time when the pay of certain clerks to committees and other employés of the House of Representatives shall begin.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next amendment to be read is that proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE —. There shall be appointed by the Speaker at the beginning of each Congress a committee consisting of fifteen members, eight members from the party in control of the organization and seven members from the opposition, to be known as the Executive Committee of the House of Representatives. It shall be the duty of said committee to consider all bills which may be reported favorably from any other of the standing committees of the House, and to determine which of said bills shall have preference in being brought before the House for consideration. In the order of such preference such bills shall be reported to the House without amendment, and placed upon a calendar to be known as the Executive Calendar. And it shall be in order at any time after the reading of the Journal and expiration of the morning hour for the chairman of such executive committee, or any member thereof, when acting under the instruction of said committee, to call up any bill upon the said executive calendar for consideration. If his said motion be sustained by a majority vote of a quorum present the bill shall be considered under consideration. The said executive committee shall fix the time to be allowed for debate upon each bill so reported, and such time shall not be extended except by a majority vote of a quorum present. At the expiration of said time so fixed or extended a vote shall be taken upon the question without further debate. Nothing in this rule shall prevent the offer of amendments to the bill when under consideration, or to interfere with the preference already given to the consideration of appropriation or revenue bills, or to prevent the consideration of any of the other calendars of the House, whenever the House may so direct.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I offer this proposed rule, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of good legislation and of a fair and proper consideration of the mass of bills which are presented to us each session for our action. I hold to the rule that majorities should be held responsible for the legislation enacted here. Whether that majority be Republican or Democratic, or whatever it may be, the majority can be trusted. If it shall make any mistake, there is a power above that majority which will correct it.

This proposed rule provides that any bill which shall have been considered and reported favorably by any other of the standing committees of the House shall be referred to an executive committee composed of members the majority of whom shall represent the majority controlling the organization of the House and the minority those who represent the opposition in the House. That committee so representing the majority in control here shall have it in their power to decide what measures of legislation shall have preference in our deliberations.

If it is decided that the public interest requires the tariff bill to be pushed, then that committee, acting for the majority, can push that tariff bill. If it shall be decided that any other public measure shall be pushed to the front, it is within the power of the majority of that committee to push it to the front and have it decided. I hold that by that means good legislation of a public character which the country needs can be separated from the great mass of legislation before us, and acted upon without the circumlocution so well known here. In other words, it puts the power in the hands of this committee to indicate what measure shall be brought before us; whereas that power is now vested in many cases in individuals.

I believe that this rule, when carefully considered in the interest of public policy and in the interest of the advancement of public measures, will commend itself to the favorable judgment of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. The proposition now presented is altogether impracticable. It is impossible for any committee of fifteen men to take up the bills now pending and determine, with anything like ordinary labor, which of those bills ought to be preferred over the others. Even if it were practicable I would not give any such power to any committee. And even if I were willing to give such powers to any committee I would not make a committee of eight to seven, for those numbers stink in the nostrils of the American people.

The next proposition, submitted by Mr. WELLER, was read, as follows:

Amendment to Rule XXI by addition of section 7:

"SEC. 7. That no bill before the House shall be brought up for final action until a copy of such bill, with copy of the committee's report thereon, has been put on the desk of each member on the day on which final action is sought."

Mr. WELLER. I desire the attention especially of the new members on this floor to this proposed rule. I believe myself in old-fashioned, sound, statesmanlike Jeffersonian and Jacksonian democracy. I believe in that kind of democracy where willful harm to one is the concern of all.

It seems to me that this proposed rule will obviate some of the difficulties to which new members are especially liable to be subject. For instance, only to-day a bill was called up in this House for consideration. I did not have time to look over the files and ascertain the number and character of all the bills which have been presented. Very frequently bills are called up for consideration the purport of which members of the House generally are wholly unacquainted with.

It seems to me that a rule of this kind will obviate that difficulty, and not permit any member to go home to his constituency, and when the subject-matter of a bill acted upon by Congress is brought to his attention, and complaint is made of his vote on it by his constituency, allow him to say that he did not know the contents of the bill; that he was ignorant of what it contained, and therefore he voted unadvisedly for it.

We have had a great many prominent instances of the necessity for the rule which I have proposed. At the time when silver was demonetized some of the members of this House from the State of Iowa went home to their constituencies and said to the people who complained of their action in demonetizing silver that they did not know the scope of the bill—were ignorant of its purport—that it was read simply by its title, and they voted unadvisedly for it and regretted their action. In some instances they were excused, and in some notable instances they were not excused by the people.

I desire that whenever a bill shall be called up for action in this House a copy of that bill shall be laid on the desk of each member accompanied by a report of the committee thereon, so that each member can not plead ignorance of the provisions of the bill. The bill demonetizing silver wrought a complete overturn in sentiment in our State regarding the reliability or painstaking care of some of the members from that State on this floor.

This very morning I had to go, as it were, with the speed of thought, to the Clerk's desk in order to ascertain the number of a bill which had been called up for consideration. Very courteously the Clerk hunted over the files in his possession and gave me the number of the bill. I sent for the bill, and when I had secured it I dispatched a page to the document-room for a copy of the report of the committee. He returned with the information that no report was there to be found.

It seems to me that this is a very reasonable request, a request that certainly ought to be granted for the benefit of new members. We have officers and pages already engaged and prepared for this work, and no extra outlay will be needed to accomplish the purposes of my proposed amendment to the rules. I am aware that men who have grown gray in the service of their country in this distinguished body have become so familiar with the methods of procedure here that they are seldom at a loss. But I know that frequently matters are brought up which I have had no reasonable opportunity to carefully consider, but on which I am called to cast my vote. I do not propose to undertake to carry in my mind the subject-matter of each bill so that when mention is made of it I can immediately determine just what I ought to do in casting my vote for or against it. There being already thousands of them introduced, I want to save the little ability I have for the other work of this House which is more needful.

One of the troubles, it seems to me, which new members of this House continually meet with is that on the spur of the moment matters of great importance are brought up which they have had no reasonable opportunity to consider carefully, but on which they are called to cast their final votes.

I submit this proposition in the interest of my constituency. They demand that every vote I cast on this floor shall be cast advisedly, shall be cast after mature thought and deliberation. They demand that I cast no vote in reference to which I am compelled to present to them the excuse that under the rules of this House with its enormous pressure of business I was prevented from knowing what I was doing.

I find, Mr. Speaker, that there is a calendar having some bills on its pages indicating that they are to come up for action, but this Calendar [holding up one] is the only one I have received during this entire session of Congress. I know that many measures have been passed here of which I had no reasonable opportunity to determine by knowledge thereof what I should properly do by vote or otherwise. For instance, a case came up in regard to a national bank in the State of Texas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to that infernal, undemocratic bank system. I do not want to be caught here casting a vote for it in any particular and then be called upon to plead to my constituents that I was ignorant in the premises of my action. Thus I raised the objection this morning to the Speaker of this body. I made a parliamentary inquiry, but the Speaker informed me that I had not struck the right line.

There is another reason in favor of my proposition. I am not much more familiar with the rules of this House than the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, ex-Governor CURTIN, who informed us the other day that he knew nothing about them and hoped he never should; and I am laboring under the same difficulty as that gentleman. I believe that this House ought to accord us this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER] has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment there is no earthly excuse for any member of this House to plead ignorance of what goes on here.

Mr. WELLER. I would like to know from the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether many members of the House in a former Congress did not plead the excuse of ignorance in reference to their votes on the bill demonetizing silver.

Mr. RANDALL. I say that was a matter between themselves and their constituents; the rules of the House had nothing to do with it.

Mr. HORR. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a moment?

Mr. RANDALL. Directly. Now, the rules of this House provide that every bill introduced here shall be printed and placed upon a file where every member can see it. Nay, more; the rules provide that every bill, when reported back from a committee, shall be accompanied with a report, which shall be printed and immediately transmitted by mail to the individual members of the House. The gentleman from Iowa, as well as every other member, has had it in his power to read over such reports upon every bill reported at the earliest practicable moment, and before any action on the bill could be taken.

Mr. WELLER. I would like to inquire again of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it is not true that members of a former Congress did plead the excuse of ignorance for their votes on the bill demonetizing silver?

Mr. RANDALL. I have nothing to do with the ignorance of any man. I say the rules of the House gave no excuse——

Mr. WELLER. Is it not beyond the ability of any member of the House to read all those reports and to ascertain which bill is to come up?

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield a minute and a half to the gentleman, so that he may put his inquiries all together, and then I can answer him.

Mr. WELLER. I desire, then, again to ask the gentleman whether it is not beyond the ability of any member on this floor to take the thousands of bills and the accompanying reports as they (the bills) are filed in the document-room and reports are mailed to him by the Printer, read them over carefully, place them (the reports) with the bills to which they apply, bring them here, and then ascertain which bills are to come up and which not, and when any one of them may be brought up for final action?

Mr. RANDALL. I can not tell the gentleman which bills are to come up or which are to fail; the House can do that. But I will tell him my practice, and it illustrates——

Mr. WELLER. I have not had my minute and a half. Pardon me, sir. [Laughter.] I would like to inquire whether it has not been understood throughout the country that this House has been working under the gag-law rule to the injury of the people and in the interests of the monopolies of the country, which are eating the life-blood out of the people. [Applause on the Republican side.] I wish to say to the distinguished gentleman, furthermore, that in Iowa—and I am glad of it—the Republican side of the House was charged in the last Congress as being a party of the gag-law system, and there was a complete overturning there, thank God! [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I do not want this side of the House to put their foot in that same kind of trap, for I want to have you win in 1884 if we, the National party, can not win. [Applause.] Therefore I appeal to the Democratic side of the House to give us a rule by which we can not be put in the position of pleading ignorance in the matter of our votes.

The SPEAKER. The ten minutes allowed for debate on this resolution are exhausted.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have half a minute.

Mr. ANDERSON. All right; take it.

Mr. RANDALL. I am glad the gentleman from Iowa has had the opportunity to state his position on the subjects to which he has alluded, and they are presented to the consideration of the country, but I wish to state to him an opportunity has been presented to him at all times such as I take advantage of myself, and that is to look at the heading of every report which comes to me through the mail, so I may know whether it relates to such a subject as interests my constituents. It is the same sort of diligence I commend to the gentleman from Iowa which has enabled me here during my long term never to have cast a vote in favor of any monopoly of any sort or kind. [Applause.]

Mr. WELLER. I do not here and now charge the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania with being very distinguished in the line of casting his vote for monopolies, but I do say it has gone all over the country that he is the special advocate of them. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. RANDALL. I have lived long enough to have lived down that misrepresentation of me. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the next amendment proposed to the rules by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and a bill is reached for consideration, and before its consideration is begun, one motion may be made that the committee will lay that bill aside and take up another on that Calendar, which motion shall be decided by a majority of the committee without debate.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, what this House is to accomplish, what results are to follow our deliberations here, will depend very largely on the rules of procedure we adopt. Two systems have been reported here, one by the majority and the other by the minority of the Committee on Rules. They differ very radically from each other. The mode of proceeding agreed to in the majority report, if that be adopted, the regular mode, will be to take up the Calendar and consider the bills there in the order in which they stand. That has this advantage, that the House will not be called on to consider bills in which reports have not been printed. Every bill will be taken up then unless the House proceeds out of order; not in the order of its consequence, not according to its importance, but simply as it may stand upon the Calendar. The other system reported by the minority provides that each committee shall be called in order, and that each as it is reached shall have the right to call up for consideration a bill whether it be upon the Calendar or not, a bill it may be in which no report has been printed and about which the House will perhaps have had no opportunity whatever to inform itself.

Now, it seems to me that of these two systems that of the majority is preferable, because we ought to be careful in our deliberations not to take up bills we do not understand and in which reports have not been printed. But in another respect the minority and majority reports differ essentially, and that is, according to the plan of the majority there will be no mode of reaching any important bill except as described by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the other day, the ridiculous proceeding of going in and out of committee as you reach every bill before the House can take up the measure the majority of the House desires to reach.

The minority report provides for a simple, straightforward way, by which a majority can take up any bill upon the Calendar. According to section 6 of the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] the same purpose is accomplished which I had proposed to effect by the amendment I sent to the Clerk's desk to be read. If when this amendment of the gentleman from Maine is reached and a division of the question is had, and I shall call for it, and if the sixth clause of his proposition shall be adopted it will be unnecessary to consider my amendment.

But, Mr. Speaker, that amendment does not go far enough and my amendment does not go far enough. Both simply go to this extent: That a majority of the House may take up out of this order any bill that it may select on the Calendar of the House in Committee of the Whole. There ought to be a provision somewhere incorporated into these rules providing that a majority of this House might, whenever it saw proper, go by a simple, straightforward, direct vote to the consideration of any bill, whether it be on the House Calendar or on the Calendar of the Whole House, in committee. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine to which I have adverted contemplates that as to any bill which is in the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. But there ought to be another provision relating to bills upon the House Calendar.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that the Forty-sixth Congress when these rules were first adopted never accomplished anything, and practically we never went to the Calendar at all. Every bill that was reported from the committees and put upon that Calendar was allowed to die on that Calendar. We apologized for the working of our rules then by saying it had taken months to debate them. The session was far advanced before they were adopted, and we were told to wait and see whether in another Congress when these rules shall have been adopted at the beginning and have fair play they will not work better and produce more satisfactory results. We did wait; but in the Forty-seventh Congress the result was precisely the same—nothing whatever was accomplished. We never went to the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HERBERT. I should like to have a short time to finish what I was saying.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield one minute of my time, if desired, to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HERBERT. In the one minute more which has been extended to me by permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I simply desire to say that the most important legislation to be brought before this House during this Congress has not yet been matured. There is much before the Judiciary Committee and a great deal before the Commerce Committee. Matters of vital importance are before these and various committees of the House which are not yet acted upon. Now these committees are not privileged committees and have no advantages on this floor. The legislation to which I have referred has not yet been matured because it is important and difficult.

But important as the bills before them may be, I say that if we adopt the report of the majority of the committee, the Judiciary Committee and the Committee on Commerce and all the other committees might just as well shut up shop and work no longer if these rules are to operate in the Forty-eighth Congress that operated in the Forty-sixth and Forty-seventh.

Mr. RANDALL. There is at first sight considerable force in the objection of the gentleman from Alabama. That matter was fully discussed at the time these rules were reported in the Forty-sixth Congress, and if I understand the effect of the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama it is that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union shall have the authority of the House to lay aside a bill out of its order in that committee, and thus reach a particular bill that a majority may desire to reach without going back into the House and having to vote upon it.

Mr. HERBERT. More than that, to go forward and over everything else in order to get at a particular bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The objection to that, however, is that there could be no record made in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as to a particular bill which may be reached. Some members may desire a yea-and-nay record upon laying aside such a bill. I can understand, as the Committee on Rules in their report during the Forty-sixth Congress understood, that a bill, an important bill, might be reached in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and without a yea-and-nay vote, without a record or any means by which they can be placed upon record, to put their opinion before the country in relation to the propriety of passing it over—that under such circumstances when it is reached it should, under the ordinary rules of propriety, be then and there considered. But if it is to be laid aside, then the rule should be made applicable to an actual vote by yeas and nays upon it.

That was the reason and that is the only controversy I see involved in the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama—whether the House itself shall exercise the right to change the rule and displace bills, or whether that shall be done in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where no record is made.

Mr. HERBERT. The proposition of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] meets the objection stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It provides that a vote may be taken in the House to designate for consideration any one particular bill; and an opportunity is thus given, if need be, to make a record on the matter of selection. That is provided for in the sixth amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], which I am advocating in preference to my own.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. I want to know the effect of this rule upon the bill which is laid aside.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not displace it out of its order; but it allows all other bills to be successively jumped over until that bill is reached. The present rule says that shall be done in the House. The proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] says that may be done in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JOHN S. WISE. That would enable members to dodge a bill without making a record.

Mr. RANDALL. Exactly so.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next proposition, which is that submitted by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

The Clerk read as follows:

That each Representative, except the chairmen of standing or select committees which have a clerk, may appoint a clerk to serve during the session of Congress, who shall perform such clerical work as may be assigned him in aid of the discharge of his official duties, and shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day.

Mr. BELFORD. I have long since reached the conclusion that a man who had brains enough to comprehend the rules by which this House is governed has no brains for any other purpose. [Laughter.] I think those rules may be worshiped without committing idolatry, for they resemble nothing in the heavens above or the earth below or the waters under it. [Renewed laughter.] They are formulated and established in the interests of an oligarchy of a black-horse brigade, who propose to override the majority of the members of this House.

When our fathers established this Government, when they established a House of Representatives and a Senate, they designed that the majority should rule on all questions—rule not only in the determination as to the passage of an act, but rule upon its consideration. Such is not the case under the rules by which we are governed and controlled.

We have but three forces in this House: the Brahmins of the Committee on Ways and Means, as I said the other day; not the brains of this House, but the Brahmins of this House. Then we have the white-button mandarins of the Appropriations Committee. And we have the dignified oligarchy called the Committee on Rules, the Speaker of the House, and the illustrious gentleman from Indiana, in whose presence the nation uncovers its head. [Laughter.]

I have offered my amendment in good faith, and I say that if the members of this House have the courage of their convictions they will vote for it. But you have not got the courage of your convictions. You have not got the courage to do right. What are you sent here for except to transact the public business? We have a Secretary of the Treasury. Does he transact the public business without the employment of clerks? We have a Secretary of the Interior? Does he transact the public business without the employment of clerks? And is not that equally true of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. EATON (to Mr. BELFORD, who was facing the Democratic side of the House). Turn your Gatling gun the other way.

Mr. BELFORD. My time is too limited to attend to interruptions. I want to get through. I want to illuminate you Democrats for this reason. There was a special reason I found to-day why each member of the House should have a clerk; and that was in the speech made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER]. That gentleman is a Democrat, and it appears he has not the sense to comprehend a bill when it is reported to this House. [Laughter.]

Now, I propose to pay for an assistant in the shape of an electric clerical lamp that will illuminate the judgment of that gentleman; and I suppose he is an average specimen of the Democratic party. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER rose.

Mr. BELFORD. I have not time to yield.

Now, let me call your attention to one or two facts. I receive in the neighborhood of from fifty to one hundred letters a day. I am compelled to get out of my bed every morning at 5 o'clock to work at answering those letters. I work at those letters from 5 o'clock in the morning until half past 8, when I eat my breakfast. I assort them, put some of them in my pocket, and in order to answer the inquiries of those letters I have to go to the War Department, to the Navy Department, to the State Department, to the White House, to the Post-Office Department, and to the Interior Department. Then I have got to come up here to the Committee on Public Lands, which is trying to "despoil," as the boys say, the great railroad companies of the lands they have never earned. I sit there until 12 o'clock. I have to be in this House from 12 o'clock until 5 o'clock. I can not attend to my duties in the Departments, my duties in the committee, and my duties in the House at the same time. Look over to the Senate. Look at the seventy-six members of that body; the magnificent paladins who reign in supreme power at the other end of the Capitol. [Laughter.] I say fifty of them are millionaires, capable of hiring their own clerks, abundantly able to pay those clerks out of their own funds. There are twenty-six poor devils in that body [laughter] who got into the Senate on their own merits. And yet they had the courage to vote themselves secretaries.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. I yield two and one-half minutes more of my time to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. BELFORD. Thanks. Now, I say if these fifty Senators, each of whom is worth $500,000, can draw from the public Treasury to employ a clerk, why can not the poor members of this House do so, who have to lie awake to study the problem how they will make both ends meet at the end of the month. Gentlemen, this is a grand and magnificent nation.

Now, mark you, I am talking common sense, and I hope you have the courage on this question that I have. I receive hundreds of letters in relation to pension claims. It may be said that, technically speaking, it is not my business as a Representative to look after those claims, but practically speaking it is my business, and my constituents expect me to inquire into those matters.

In my State there is a little post-route at one place and a little post-office at another place. I am compelled to go to the Post-Office Department and inquire into all those matters—to inquire into the matter of the increase of the salary of a third-class postmaster. Then there is a man who wants a patent issued to him from the Land Office. He writes me a letter about it, and I must go to the Commissioner of the General Land Office and inquire about that. You all know that we can not ignore these demands made by our constituents. We are expected to attend to everything, from a patent for a toothpick to a foreign embassadorship. [Great laughter.]

Now, in view of all these demands upon us, I ask you, in all honesty and candor and sincerity, how in the name of God can we obtain time to acquaint ourselves with the great measures pending before this House? How can we acquire sufficient information to be enabled to act intelligently upon those measures? We are nothing but pack-horses and pack-slaves, and I say it is the duty of this House to imitate the example of the Senate and give to every member a clerk——

The SPEAKER (raising his gavel). The time of the gentleman——

Mr. BELFORD. Hold that gavel just a second more. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I yield the gentleman the other half-minute.

Mr. BELFORD. I say it is the duty of this House to give each member a clerk, to the end that that clerk may aid him in the transaction of his official business.

I want to call the attention of the House to one fact, and then I will surrender the floor. At the beginning of the last Congress I went to Speaker KEIFER and asked him to appoint Mr. RANDALL to the chairmanship of an important committee, to the end that he might have a clerk. And I asked him further to give him a large room in which he could receive and accommodate his friends.

Now, why did I do that? I knew that Mr. RANDALL was a gentleman of national reputation. I knew that he had been honest through his whole political career and that he was as poor as I am poor. [Great laughter.] That is a fact; and Brother RANDALL knows it. [Renewed laughter.]

I recognize the decencies, the courtesies, and the proprieties of public life. I said that the public had no right to deluge Mr. RANDALL with a flood of letters, compel him to answer them by his own hand, and to himself pay the postage on them. And I thank God that the ex-Speaker of this House had the courage to make him chairman of an important public committee, so as to give him a clerk.

Now, what I implored the ex-Speaker to do I ask you gentlemen to have the courage to do. I am not afraid of my constituents, because they are great, big, broad-hearted, generous fellows. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The time for debate on the proposition has expired.

Mr. COSGROVE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to yield to me to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the time for debate is now exhausted upon the propositions of amendment to the rules offered by individual members of the House. The one-hour debate upon the proposition reported by the Committee on Rules and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] will now begin.

Mr. COSGROVE. Do I understand the Chair to decide that I can not now offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair simply decides that there can be no debate upon any amendment offered or suggested hereafter except by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the Chair is quite correct, but I will remedy the matter by yielding part of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE], say two minutes of the time to which I am entitled for general debate, so that he can have read his amendment, the nature of which I am not advised of, and say something in explanation of it. That will leave me twenty-eight minutes for general debate.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 11 of Rule XXXIV, the word "Congress," after the words "ex-members of," and insert the words "House of Representatives;" so that it will read "ex-members of the House of Representatives who are not interested in any claim," &c.

Mr. COSGROVE. The object of that amendment is simply to make the rule of the House conform to the rule now enforced in the Senate. By the rule of the Senate an ex-member of this House is denied the privilege of going upon the floor of the Senate. If the amendment I have proposed to the rule shall be adopted the courtesy of this House will be extended only to ex-members of the House. That is all I care to say.

The SPEAKER. The question is now upon the demand for the previous question made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]; but there is an understanding that there shall be an hour of debate on the report of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it is not better now, before demanding the previous question, to call up these various propositions in their order and let them be voted upon. Otherwise every one who wishes a vote on any one of the propositions will be obliged to vote against ordering the previous question. I think it will facilitate the transaction of business if the gentleman will simply allow a vote to be taken on these propositions. Ordinarily the question will be decided by the sound, but a division can be called for if desired.

Mr. RANDALL. I am quite willing to vary the understanding so that the House can now determine whether it wishes to vote separately upon the proposed amendments or not. I recognize my position here as simply voicing the wish of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KASSON. I think members of the House would regard it as fair to have a vote in each case with the least possible delay.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that the honorable Speaker, and I believe I may say a majority of the committee, including myself, are rather in favor of giving the opportunity for such a vote.

Mr. REED. I ought to say that I have no objection except that it will take a great deal of time.

Mr. KASSON. A division will not in all cases be called for. The sound will determine the result in some cases.

Mr. RANDALL. If a vote is to be taken on these propositions, let us have it by tellers in each case.

Mr. KASSON. If required, it may be determined by the sound in some cases.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the House should have the opportunity of voting.

Mr. REAGAN. I submit that these questions should be passed upon by the ordinary methods under the rules. Suppose it does take an hour or two longer, that does not matter. It will be more satisfactory.

Mr. KASSON. I ask consent that a vote may now be taken on all the propositions that were not reported either by the majority or the minority of the committee.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I hope the gentleman in charge of this subject will agree to that.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I take it that the debate now going on is not to come out of the time allowed for general debate.

The SPEAKER. This, as the Chair assumes, is simply an effort to arrive at some understanding.

Mr. KASSON. My suggestion is that now at once we proceed to vote upon all the propositions except those recommended by the majority and the minority of the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. If that is to be done, I would suggest that the vote be taken by tellers, so as not to occupy too much time.

Mr. KASSON. Let the vote be taken by tellers if tellers should be demanded. My opinion is that the viva voce vote would be sufficient in many cases.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the suggestion might be made that the yeas and nays be not called, as taking up too much time.

Mr. KASSON. I do not desire to call them.

Mr. RANDALL. What do I understand the position of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to be?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine suggests—of course the understanding would require unanimous consent—that a vote by yeas and nays be not taken on any of these propositions.

Mr. ANDERSON. The yeas and nays might possibly be desired on some particular amendment. There will be no disposition, as I understand, to consume time unnecessarily; yet we might want that constitutional privilege.

Mr. REED. All I have to say is that if the gentleman in charge of this matter is willing that a vote shall be taken, I shall interpose no objection whatever.

Mr. RANDALL. I will state frankly my position. Something has been said here about the Committee on Rules desiring to cut off or infringe upon the rights of members. I do not mean to stand in any such position so far as I am individually concerned, and if the arrangement already suggested is objected to I shall feel authorized (knowing the view of the Speaker and of another member of the committee, as it is certainly in accord with my own view) to withdraw the demand for the previous question and take in the whole sweep.

Mr. KASSON and others. That is all right.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not probable that in almost every instance there will be no disposition to have the yeas and nays on these propositions?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to infringe on the rights of any one. If any member wants to call the yeas and nays upon any proposition he ought to be allowed to do so.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. That is right.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the previous question so as to allow a vote on each proposition.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman wishes the previous question to operate, as the Chair understands, against the introduction of further amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

Mr. YORK. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether the time has passed for offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER. It has, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I will give the gentleman two minutes of the time for general debate so that he may offer his amendment. I do not want to cut him off.

Mr. YORK. I desire to offer my amendment now.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That each member who may want a clerk shall pay for the same out of his own salary.

[Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. This appears to be an amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

Mr. YORK. Mr. Speaker, I will say in the outset that I desire to record my vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado. I feel that it would be an outrage upon the people of this country for this House to adopt a rule creating more than three hundred clerks for members of this body. I desire to be placed in such a position that I can record my vote upon this question. I do not want to be cut off by a few members on either side. I believe the new members of this House have some rights, but it seems there is a kind of monopoly here to shut off everybody.

Mr. RANDALL. My action and the position I have taken in relation to this matter show there is no disposition on the part of the Committee on Rules to interfere with anybody's rights, but on the contrary to respect every man's rights.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first proposition.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Are these amendments considered as pending?

The SPEAKER. Under the understanding reached by the House, the House will proceed to vote on these proposed amendments in the order in which they stand, except the report of the committee and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine, which will be disposed of last. The first question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California [Mr. BUDD], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV additional clause as follows:

"When any public bill or resolution shall have been referred to a committee, and the committee shall fail or refuse to report said bill or resolution back to the House of Representatives, either favorably or unfavorably, for thirty days, it shall be in order for the member who offered the bill or resolution, on any Monday immediately after the morning hour, to move to discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill or resolution, and the House shall then dispose of the bill or resolution by recommittal or by final action, such as a majority of the House may determine."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will next read the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TURNER].

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. To meet the objections urged by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and others, I will modify my amendment by saying Tuesday instead of Monday, and making it forty instead of thirty days.

The amendment as modified was read, as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV additional clause as follows:

"When any public bill or resolution shall have been referred to a committee, and the committee shall fail or refuse to report said bill or resolution back to the House of Representatives, either favorably or unfavorably, for forty days, it shall be in order for the member who offered the bill or resolution, on any Tuesday, immediately after the morning hour, to move to discharge the committee from the consideration of the bill or resolution, and the House shall then dispose of the bill or resolution by recommittal or by final action, such as a majority of the House may determine."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 115.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment of Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, was read, as follows:

Amend Rule X by inserting after the line—

"On Revision of the Laws, to consist of eleven members," the following, to wit:

"On Political Rights of Women, to consist of eleven members."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 102.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The amendment of Mr. ANDERSON was then read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That Rule XXXIV be amended by adding the following words:

"Provided, That an ex-member of Congress, on and after the fifth day from his first admission to the floor of the House, shall only be admitted thereto during the remainder of that Congress by an order of the Speaker; nor shall the Speaker issue said order until such ex-member shall have certified upon his honor as a man that he is not personally, pecuniarily, or professionally interested, either directly or indirectly, in the passage or defeat of any claim, bill, or other measure pending before Congress or any of its committees; that he is not, either personally or professionally, in the employ, service, or interest, either directly or indirectly, of any railroad, telegraph, or other company, corporation, person, or combination of corporations or persons having a pecuniary interest in the passage or defeat of any claim, bill, or measure pending before Congress or its committees; and pledging his word that, while the House is in session, he will in no way communicate with a member thereof respecting any claim, bill, measure, or action which may affect the welfare of any railroad, telegraph, or other company, corporation, person, or combination of corporations or persons having an interest in legislation pending before Congress. The Committee on Rules, upon ascertainment of any violation of this proviso, shall immediately declare the offender forever deprived of the privilege of the floor as an ex-member of Congress."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 87, noes 96.

Mr. ANDERSON. Let us have the yeas and nays. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] Oh, yes; let the country see how you stand.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 72.

So (one-fifth of those present having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 118, nays 130, not voting 72; as follows:

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I am paired with my colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN] on political questions. I regard this as a question not coming within the terms of that pair.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the next amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the rules:

"That the second and fourth Mondays in each month, after the morning hour, shall be devoted to the consideration of reports of committees in relation to the business of the District of Columbia and of the Territories of the United States, not to include propositions for the admission of new States."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 22, Rule XI, so as to read:

"To the improvement of the Mississippi River, its levees and tributaries, to the Committee on Levees and Improvements of the Mississippi River."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment, which was also submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XIV by striking out, wherever they occur in rules relating to time allowed for debate, the words "one hour" and inserting "thirty minutes."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read the amendment proposed by Mr. KASSON:

Resolved, That the third paragraph of Rule XXI be amended by striking out all after the word "progress," in line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "not including propositions for increase of salaries: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the recommendation of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the amendment proposed, the same being germane to the clause of the bill affected thereby."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee to ascertain the results of the Tenth Census be appointed, to have the same number of members, duties, privileges, and power as the committee of the same name had in the last Congress; and that said committee be authorized to employ a clerk.

The question was taken upon the adoption of the amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 105, noes 47.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for tellers. There is no quorum, anyway.

Mr. RANDALL. We might as well have the yeas and nays. I will move that the House adjourn. It is now near 5 o'clock.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will not do that.

Mr. RANDALL. If the House wants to stay and take a vote I have no objection.

Mr. COX, of New York My friend from Philadelphia ought not to insist upon an adjournment now. Let us have this committee.

Mr. RANDALL. Personally I should not object, but in my relation as a Representative I feel compelled to do so.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Boyd, addressed to the Senate and House of Representatives, praying for certain relief, and to ask that the petition and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to solicit from that committee early action upon the case I know nothing of the merits of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition, with the accompanying papers, will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. LAPHAM presented resolutions of the annual encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, held in the city of Rochester, N. Mr. LOGAN. I present a petition signed by Joseph Brown and others, colored persons, living in what is known as the Cherokee Nation, claiming under the treaty of 1866 between the Cherokees and the United States that they were incorporated as part of the Cherokee Nation, they having formerly been held in slavery by the Cherokee Nation of Indians, and that under the law the fund going to that nation from the United States was to be distributed pro rata to all persons included within the treaty; that in the distributing of the last appropriation of money for their benefit it has been withheld from the colored people under a resolution of the Cherokee Council excluding them from any participation in this fund. They conclude their petition as follows:

> Your petitioners therefore do hereby humbly petition the Congress of the United States to withhold from any moneys now due the Cherokee Indians from the Government of the United States the amount of which your petitioners are thus unjustly deprived, and that the honorable Secretary of the Interior be authorized to distribute the same per capita among the freedmen of the Cherokee Nation. Your petitioners would further pray that the Congress of the United States reverse this legislation of the Cherokee Council, to the end that your petitioners shall not be ultimately defrauded of their right in the Cherokee public domain. And your petitioners will ever pray.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I also present the petition of James A. Quinlan, an aged inmate of the soldiers' home called the National Military Home, Montgomery County, Ohio, praying for certain relief. This petition bears a printed signature; is not signed by the petitioner as the rule requires; but as the petitioner is evidently a very aged and feeble person, in order that his matter may come before the Committee on Pensions immediately I ask unanimous consent that this petition with the printed signature be received notwithstanding the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the paper submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts will be received and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report a bill to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, encourage the foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes, as a substitute for several bills referred to that committee. I desire to ask the indulgence of the Senate to explain as briefly as I can the provisions of the bill, as it is one of very great importance. I am obliged, probably, to leave, very much against my will, for Mississippi in a day or two, and wishing to have the bill placed upon the Calendar, I had not time to prepare a written report.

The first section of the bill touches the provision relating to officers of American ships. The law as it stands to-day requires that all officers of vessels of the United States shall be citizens of the United States, and provides a very heavy penalty of 50 cents a ton on a vessel for a violation of this law. It was a good law when it was enacted, when nearly all the sailors on board the ships were American sailors and many of them fit to be made officers; but to-day, with 95 per cent. of the sailors foreigners, it is not a good law and works a great injustice very frequently. The bill reported by me provides that under certain circumstances the officers, other than the captain, may be foreign rather than American citizens.

Sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7 relate to what is known as the three-months extra wages—a law which has stood upon our statute-books for a great many years, which provides, in brief, that when sailors are discharged in a foreign port an exaction may be made by the United States consul of three months' extra wages in addition to the wages that have been already earned; that two months of the wages shall be paid to the sailor so leaving the ship, and one month's wages retained by the consul, and that becomes a fund from which the United States sends back those sailors so left in a foreign port. There is an additional provision that any American vessel shall be compelled to take those sailors at the request of the consul and carry them to the home port and receive therefor a sum not exceeding $10, though the voyage may last six months. This, perhaps, was a healthy law when it was enacted and when the sailors had homes in the United States, but to-day 95 per cent. of all the sailors in our foreign trade are as much at home in one port as in another, and this exaction is now one of the most grievous and unjust burdens upon American shipping.

Let me illustrate. The Senator from South Carolina here at my left [Mr. BUTLER] sails for Australia. He has a crew on board of twenty-six sailors, none of whom he ever saw in his life until they were shipped. He arrives at the port in Australia. These sailors conclude they would like to stay. They go ashore against his wishes; they go before the American consul; they make their statements as they please. The Senator's ship is obliged to sail within two days, and he can not get his papers of clearance until he has paid every one of those twenty-six sailors three months' wages exacted by the United States consul. Since I have been in Congress I have by a special act of Congress on two different occasions recovered from fifteen hundred to eighteen hundred dollars exacted from the master of a ship in this way, generally exacted nowadays unjustly.

Further, if my ship is lying in Australia and is bound for the United States, notwithstanding there has been exacted from the Senator's ship three months' wages for each sailor beyond everything that was due him, the consul can compel me to take two of those sailors to each hundred tons of my ship and carry them from Australia to New York, being, perhaps, three months on the voyage and it costing me $50 for each one of them; and the United States pays out of the $30 it has received for that very purpose $10. Thus it mulcts the Senator under the law for $2,000, and then it proceeds to fine me in my ship going to New York perhaps five or six hundred dollars more.

Mr. BUTLER. Where does the other $20 go?

Mr. FRYE. It goes into a fund, the whole of it, and is gradually used up for sick seamen, and other purposes, I suppose.

The committee have reported in these sections a repeal of a portion of the existing statutes. The bill provides that where these sailors leave in a foreign port without fault of the captain, without fault of the owners of the ship, they shall be entitled to receive what is their due as wages, and no more. If they leave by fault of the captain or by fault of the owner or by reason of a violation of the shipping contract made with the captain, then on its being satisfactorily proven to the consul he may exact one month's extra wages, and that one month's extra wages shall be appropriated as the one month's extra wages have been appropriated heretofore.

There is no civilized commercial nation in the world for the last twenty-five years that has ever exacted more than one month's wages. England limits it in her law to a sum certain, and that sum certain in no event, however much the bad faith may have been of the master of the ship or the owners, is more than one month's pay.

The bill further provides that if the voyage is of a certain length, and the consul places on board my ship one of these seamen to be returned home, the sum of $10 shall be paid; if it is of a certain other length of time, being longer of course, $20 shall be paid—not enough, but a great advance over the old provisions of law. It also reduces the number of such seamen any ship may be compelled to take.

The next provision of the bill, in section 10, is a provision touching the two months' advance wages. Of course there is no law which demands of any master of a ship two months' advance wages, but there is a custom which is stronger than any law. I venture to say that no shipmaster receives any sailor to-day to whom he has not paid two months' wages in advance; and I venture further to say that not one sailor in one thousand when he goes on board has a single cent of this advanced pay; it has all gone into the hands of the sailors' landlord and the land-sharks who prey upon the sailor every time he comes into port. The philanthropists, the Bethel ministers of the country, and all those friends of the sailor from a humanitarian point of view agree that there should be a law which should forbid under heavy penalties the payment of advance wages either by our masters or the masters of foreign ships.

This section provides under heavy penalties that no master of a ship shall pay any advance wages whatever. If he does pay them he shall not be permitted to charge them against the sailor, and if he does pay them he shall be liable to heavy penalties; and this applies to the master of a foreign ship as well as to that of a home ship.

The committee report this section of the bill not feeling certain that it will serve its purpose. The power of sailor boarding-house keepers is immense, and the control which they exercise over these sailors is equivalent to their power. I, as one member of the committee, doubt seriously if this provision of the bill which we report can be enforced; but the committee believe it to be worth the trial at any rate, and consequently report it favorably.

Section 12 of the bill reported repeals all consular fees named in the tariff prescribed by the order of the President, and provides that they shall no longer be exacted from American vessels. They amount to about $120,000 a year, and this is the only commercial country that exacts them. England has a consular system which costs her annually in the neighborhood of $2,000,000. We have a consular system which pays for itself and leaves in the Treasury a balance of over $70,000 a year, and it is exacted from ships. We provide that this exaction shall no longer be made upon American ships. That will relieve the Treasury of about $120,000 a year, and will leave foreign ships paying about $700,000 a year. I will say right here that the United States is the only country in the known world that undertakes to have its consular expenses repaid to the Government by charges made by consuls.

Section 14 deals with the tonnage tax. The tonnage tax was a war tax of 30 cents a ton a year. If we were dealing with a steamship which made ten trips into the port of New York every year 30 cents a ton for one year would not be onerous. The Englishmen when our steamships go over there, for light and other duties, would exact from us four times as much. But when that 30 cents a ton is collected from a sailing vessel which can not by any possibility make more than two or three trips in a whole year it compels the sailing vessel to pay precisely the same tax that the foreign ship pays coming to New York ten times in a year. The most of our sailing ships probably to-day are engaged in foreign trade with Australia, China, and Japan, and make but one trip a year, and yet pay 30 cents a ton; the steamship arriving in New York ten times in the same year pays the same. The gross injustice of the tax thus levied is entirely apparent.

The bill provides that vessels shall pay this tax at each entry, entering from the West India Islands, or the Bermuda Islands, or from any port in the Republic of Mexico, or port or place south of Mexico down to and including Aspinwall and Panama, or from any port or place in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, or from the Sandwich Islands, 3 cents, not to exceed in any year 15 cents a ton; and from all other foreign ports 6 cents at each entry, not to exceed 30 cents in any one year. Thus the tax will fall where it belongs, if it belongs anywhere. The proportions will be borne as they ought to be borne, if any tax is justifiable.

As to the limitation to 30 cents a ton on ships from the other foreign ports, there are about four hundred steamships carrying a foreign flag making regular trips to our country. If no limitation of 30 cents was placed upon those four hundred foreign ships they would pay into the Treasury of the United States $360,000. What American vessels would it affect? Only the Philadelphia line. Not the Pacific line, because it can not make over five trips a year, and it would not increase there, but it would affect the Philadelphia line. It would affect four American steamers. It would increase their tax $3,600, and by increasing their tax $3,600 we should obtain from foreign ships $360,000.

I confess the temptation was great not to put any limit of 30 cents a year on these ships, but the judgment of the committee was (and I presume the judgment of the committee to be discreet) that none of these vessels should be compelled by a tax created now, so long after the war, when there seemed to be no pressing necessity to pay more than 30 cents in any one year, that in fact if steamships were compelled to pay for every entry, and it might run up to 60 cents a year (and would with regular trips between here and England), you might place an additional burden upon any company undertaking to start now an American line. That may be so, and therefore that limitation has been placed upon it.

I come to section 15. Sections 4585, 4586, and 4587 of the Revised Statutes provide for a hospital tax of 40 cents a month on every American sailor for the support of hospitals, all repealed by this bill. These sections place a tax upon every man employed on a steam-tug in the port of New York, every man employed on a ferry-boat, of 40 cents a month. There are at least a thousand men employed in New York Harbor on steam-tugs and ferry-boats who never see one of these hospitals; who have homes in New York, and if they are disabled or sick go to their homes. Yet the law exacts from each sailor (that is, from the crews of the ferry-boats and tugboats) 40 cents a month to support these hospitals. It is true of all our coasting vessels; it is true of all our vessels engaged in the foreign trade. It is a burden amounting to about $470,000 a year, and it is a burden upon American shipping, and upon American shipping alone. In nearly all the States these ships pay tax as personal property just the same as any other property, the same as any corporation property. It pays for the support of schools, for the support of the poor, for the support of the public institutions; and it is the only industry selected by law to impose an additional and exceptional tax of 40 cents a month for each man employed. England supports her hospitals out of her treasury; France supports her hospitals out of her treasury; Germany supports her hospitals, and so does every other civilized nation; but our country demands that the sailors themselves shall support their own hospitals, or rather that the ship-owners shall support hospitals for the sailors, besides paying their wages and the usual taxes assessed upon all other property-owners.

Mr. BUTLER. Marine hospitals?

Mr. FRYE. Marine hospitals.

Mr. MORGAN. Are the sailors of all countries admitted to those hospitals?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir; sick sailors. But they are required to pay 75 cents a day.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no protection in it then.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; section 15 provides that those sections of the Revised Statutes shall be repealed and that the expense of maintaining the Marine-Hospital Service shall hereafter be borne by the United States

I come to section 16. My recollection, from a hasty examination of the law, is that every commercial country furnishes to her ships supplies for the ships if taken from bonded warehouses free of duty. We have provided in this section that all articles of foreign production needed and actually withdrawn from bonded warehouses for ships' supplies shall be withdrawn free of duty.

Then comes section 17; and I call the attention of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to it. There is a provision of statute by which to-day our ship-builders may build vessels for foreign account. If they are built wholly of foreign materials a drawback is allowed of 90 per cent. of the duties, 10 per cent. being reserved for expenses.

Mr. BAYARD. That is the present law?

Mr. FRYE. That is the present law. The decisions of the Treasury Department are that if you use any American paint on that vessel, or an American spar, or an American sail, or an American plank, then the builder of the vessel can recover no drawback whatsoever, because the law says "wholly of foreign materials." That is a premium, as a matter of course, to use all foreign materials in the building of that vessel, because unless they do so use them no drawback can be obtained for any of the materials which go into the vessel. We have provided in the bill here that if the vessel built for foreign account is built wholly or partly from foreign materials the drawback, 90 per cent. of the duty, shall be allowed, on those portions of course which are imported.

That is a matter of importance. We are building to-day on the Delaware many ships for foreign account. We can build every steamer for the South American rivers. We can build the whole of them in this country; they prefer that we should; and with this provision of the statute adopted as reported by the committee I have no doubt we shall build the whole of them.

Section 18 limits the individual liability of a ship-owner for any and all debts and liabilities to the proportion that his individual share of the vessel bears to the whole. That is not so great a change as appears on the face of the law. By statute to-day any shareholder in a vessel is liable for no more than the value of the share for any tort of the master or in case of collision or in any other way except by contract. But those provisions of the law are not generally understood. They follow the English and the French law almost word for word. There is to-day a feeling among the capitalists of this country that it is exceedingly dangerous to put capital into a ship where there may be twenty owners and only one of them really a man of wealth, and he responsible for the entire debt contracted. The English have the same limited liability provided for in this section, only in another form. They have a general law of "limited liability," by which any dozen men desiring to build a ship or a steamer can simply incorporate themselves for that single purpose, and then their liability under that act of incorporation shall be the owner's share of the vessel and no more. The bill which we report does the same thing, only in another form. It is believed that it will remove a difficulty under which our capitalists have labored, will give them courage to invest in ships, and will do a great deal more towards encouraging ship-building and ship-owning than really the law itself which we report would authorize.

Now, Mr. President, I come to an important provision of the bill. Section 3976 of the Revised Statutes authorizes the Post-Office Department to confiscate any American vessel engaged in foreign trade. It may take possession of her whenever she may be in port, may detain her for such length of time as suits the Post-Office Department; it may place on her the United States mails, may compel her to deliver those mails to the foreign port where she is bound, and to the post-office itself, and it pays that vessel only 2 cents a letter. There are scores and scores of instances where American vessels have been detained by the Postmaster-General and compelled to receive the mails and to deliver them, where the pay they received for carrying those mails did not reimburse them for the detention of the ship at the port to which she was bound and the cartage of the letters to the post-office. Your committee can see no reason why this class of property should be in the power of the Post-Office Department. If the Post-Office Department desires mails carried along our coasts where our vessels are all protected by the navigation acts, it can not seize one and compel her to carry a mail. It makes a contract and pays a fair price therefor. It made a contract two years ago with a little steamer running from Galveston to Brashear and paid her $50,000 a year for carrying the mail, five times as much as it paid all the American vessels for carrying all the United States mails to every port in South America for one year. Your committee can see no reason why the Post-Office Department should have power under law to seize a vessel and compel it to carry mails for 2 cents a letter when it has no power to seize a railroad train or a stage-coach or a vessel on the lakes or on the rivers or on the coast, and so recommend the repeal of that section.

Then, sir, it provides that for transporting the mails between any port of the United States and any foreign port the Postmaster-General may contract for such transportation; he shall advertise for proposals; he shall give the contracts to the lowest bidder, but in no event shall the contract price exceed $1 a nautical mile out and back. That is what the Postmaster-General does everywhere else, only he does not have that limitation. It provides further that the aggregate of these contracts shall be limited. I do not believe that it ought to have that provision, but our bill as reported contains it. The aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed the gross revenues of the Post-Office Department from the foreign mail service, less the amount paid for transportation of the mails on foreign vessels and the net amount paid foreign administration for intermediary territorial and sea transit of such mails.

If that same provision extended inland in four-fifths of the States of the United States there would not be a mail. It costs over $600,000 more than is received to supply Ohio, that great State, with her mails to-day, and there are very few States where it does not cost us a great deal more than we obtain. But the committee have placed this limitation, that it shall not exceed a certain amount and that amount the gross revenues as I have described them. In my opinion, from an investigation I have made, that amount will be about $1,600,000 a year.

The Post-Office Department might be placed in a difficult position if there was no further provision, because there might be a refusal to make a contract; there might be an impossibility to make a contract. An American minister abroad or a consul or a commercial agent might wish to send a dispatch to the United States and could not make a contract, and an American vessel might be lying there. So the committee have provided for that contingency. There is another section of the Revised Statutes which provides for compulsory process against an American vessel, and your committee have not repealed it, but have left it with this compulsory principle, with a further provision that the Postmaster-General or any consul or minister or commercial agent may take advantage of it if it is inexpedient or impracticable to make a contract. I submitted this section to the Postmaster-General; I spent some two hours with him, and some two more with the superintendent of the foreign mail service. They have examined it with great care, and they both admit that they can see no practical difficulty about carrying out the provision as reported.

The other provisions of the bill extend certain privileges to sailing vessels which have hitherto been extended to steam vessels, and I will not bother about them.

Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senate for occupying the time I have on this bill, but I may not be here again after Tuesday for several weeks; the bill goes on the Calendar; it is of great importance, it is so regarded all over the country, it comes without any report, I having had no time to draft one. That is my excuse for occupying the time of the Senate.

I hope when the bill is reached that it will receive the careful consideration it merits, and that we may take a step at this Congress in advance of any that has been taken in the last twenty years, that we may remove these burdens and these barnacles placed there by our own laws, and that we may do something to recover our supremacy upon the ocean. I speak for myself alone when I say that in my judgment there is but one way on earth to revive American commerce, and that is by subsidies or bounties, and so far as I am concerned I am in favor of such measures as will enable us to recover the supremacy we had, and at any time I am ready to vote for them. I prefer the French system of bounties, not for ship-building but for ship-sailing. We can build ships, there is no trouble about that, and as time rolls on what little trouble there may have been or may seem to be to-day will disappear, and we can compete with the world in this. Our difficulty comes when the ship is built and we start her from her port to a port abroad; our difficulty comes from the wages we are compelled to pay our seamen as compared with the wages paid elsewhere, from the expenditures we are compelled to make as compared with the expenditures elsewhere, and that is the difficulty which must be met and removed, and in my opinion it never can be removed until the American Congress does what England does, what France does, what Germany does, what Italy does, what Chili does.

Mr. President, I submit this bill as a substitute for Senate bills 456, 248, 203, and 739; and I ask that the substitute may be placed on the Calendar, and that these several bills may be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The Senator from Maine reports back from the Committee on Commerce——

Mr. BECK. I desire to have the bills sought to be indefinitely postponed read, because I introduced a bill on one of these subjects.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator will allow me to say one word more. The bills which I have reported contain none of the provisions in which the Senator from Kentucky is interested. I ought to have said that the Committee on Commerce with practical unanimity authorized the report of the bill which I have reported as a substitute for these measures; but a minority of the committee reserve the right to offer an amendment to it in the Senate providing for free materials and that foreign-built ships shall be received to the American registry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine reports back several bills, which the Secretary will now read by title, and he asks that they be indefinitely postponed, and in lieu of them he reports a new bill, which will also be read by the title.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 456) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, to encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and to amend the laws relating to the shipment and discharge of seamen;

A bill (S. 248) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, to encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and to amend the laws relating to the shipment and discharge of seamen;

A bill (S. 203) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, to encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and to amend the laws relating to the shipment and discharge of seamen; and

A bill (S. 739) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the indefinite postponement of these several bills? The Chair hears none, and they will be indefinitely postponed; and in lieu of them the Senator from Maine reports a bill which will now be read.

The bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title.

Mr. VEST. On behalf of the minority of the Committee on Commerce I desire to say that while we have acquiesced in the report of the bill just presented to the Senate by the Senator from Maine, we by no means agree with the statement that he has made in lieu of a written report in connection with that bill. We do not believe that the bill which he has reported removes the great evils which have stricken down the merchant marine of the United States and caused our flag to virtually disappear from the ocean.

The provisions of the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Commerce in regard to advance wages to seamen, rebate on raw material for foreign ships, and ocean postage, so far as they go, are well enough, but they are insectiverous compared to the deadly blight which has stricken down the merchant marine of the United States.

The Senator from Maine has said that England and France and Germany and Chili and Peru have done so and so. Sir, those countries permit their citizens to buy ships where they can buy them cheapest and of the best material and the best workmanship; but it was reserved to the United States to go back to the relic of barbarism adopted in the days of Oliver Cromwell and abandoned by the English people soon afterward, and to say that American citizens shall not buy ships where they can, in the cheapest market and of the best materials and best workmanship; and to-day what is the result?

Since 1858 the merchant marine of the United States has steadily decreased, not commencing with the war but long before the war, and to-day we behold the spectacle of one single American steamship line on the ocean, with our immense coast and our immense exports, and that is what is known as the Philadelphia, Liverpool and Antwerp line, which is supported by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and has four ships flying the American flag, while steamers flying the British flag compose a majority of the line. This same company owns what is known as the Liverpool and New York line, running three steamers under the British flag, and the president of the company told me the other day in connection with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER] that the great evil was not the rebate on foreign materials, was not the ocean postage, but it was in the tariff system of the United States and in the fact that the American citizen who desired to build steam vessels or sail vessels was compelled to go to workmen in this country, instead of being at liberty to buy his ship in the best market.

In order to meet the views of the minority of the committee we submit an amendment to the bill which I send to the Chair, and I desire to say in regard to the bill as reported, that whilst there is much in the provisions of the bill as it stands to commend it, we have reserved to ourselves the right to act as we please in the Senate provided the amendment we now offer shall be rejected. In other words, we—and I speak for the minority of the committee upon that subject—were willing to adopt the provisions of the bill reported in regard to ocean postage provided we could secure an additional amendment permitting American citizens to buy their vessels in foreign ports if they could buy them there at the lowest price and upon the most favorable terms.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri will be printed.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions.

Mr. HALE. I present a privileged report, being the report of the committee of conference on the joint resolution appropriating money for the relief of the expedition under Lieutenant Greely.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to raise the question of the present consideration of the conference report. If it is to displace the ordinary routine morning business I think the whole Senate will agree with me in asking the Senator from Maine not to avail himself of his privilege, and in fifteen or twenty minutes he can put in his report.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely willing to wait. I had just come in and thought the morning business was through. I will withhold the report for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of standing and select committees are in order.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SAULSBURY, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 883) for the relief of Lysander H. Carroll, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Printing, reported a joint resolution (S. R. 59) to limit the cost of indexing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HAWLEY. This is a matter of detail business which I should like to have acted on promptly. I shall call it up in a day or two.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE LIBRARIAN OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Joint Committee on the Library to present the annual report of the Librarian of Congress, and submit with it an order, which will go to the Committee on Printing under the rules.

Ordered, That the annual report of the Librarian of Congress for the calendar year 1883, be printed, and that 500 additional copies be printed with covers for distribution by the Librarian.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires that an order embracing additional copies shall be referred to the Committee on Printing. This will be so referred.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONGER introduced a bill (S. 1449) to provide for the sale of the military reservation on the island of Bois Blanc, in the Straits of Mackinaw, in the State of Michigan, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1457) to legalize the incorporation of national trades unions; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that I introduced the bill at the last Congress and I do so at this time at the request of numerous representative organizations of the labor of the country.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1458) to prohibit the employment or performance of labor by convicts or persons restrained of their liberty upon the public works or property of the United States or the expenditure of any moneys of the United States on account of such labor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MORRILL introduced a bill (S. 1459) relating to the improvement of the coinage; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, introduced a bill (S. 1460) for the relief of the four orphan children of the late Surgeon Alfred M. Owen, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I wish to say just a word in regard to this matter. These are four orphan children, quite young, left by Surgeon Owen, of the Navy, who volunteered his services to go to the succor of the yellow-fever patients last summer at the Pensacola navy-yard, where he performed very heroic service to the Government. Both himself and his wife died there under very trying circumstances, leaving these poor children. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. COCKRELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3933) to declare a forfeiture of lands granted to the Texas Pacific Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. BAYARD. Under the instructions of the Committee on Private Land Claims I ask for the following order:

Ordered, That the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting certain papers relating to the private land claim in the Territory of Arizona known as El Sopori, and the accompanying papers, now on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and be printed.

The order was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. GROOME, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Alfred G. Hatfield be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, there being no adverse report.

On motion of Mr. BLAIR, it was Ordered, That the papers in the pension case of Mrs. Fannie S. Beaumont be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

JOHN DUDLEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] yesterday.

Mr. BECK. I made an investigation into that matter yesterday afternoon among the officers of the Senate as carefully as I could, and the facts I stated relative to the worth of this colored man John Dudley are corroborated; but I find I have no power to reinstate him in his place, and I therefore withdraw the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kentucky withdraws the resolution which he offered yesterday, and which went over under the rules.

REMOVALS OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYÉS.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was read:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee of three on the part of the Senate and five on the part of the House of Representatives be appointed to inquire into and report the cause of all removals of subordinate officers made by the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, the Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, Doorkeeper, and Postmaster of the House of Representatives.

The committee is directed to reduce to writing the evidence which it takes in regard to all removals and lay the evidence, together with its report, before the Congress.

The committee is further directed to report how many disabled and other soldiers were removed, what States and Congressional districts they were from, how many disabled and other soldiers have been appointed, and the States and Congressional districts from which they come.

The committee is further instructed to report whether in their opinion the act known as the civil-service act applies to appointments made by elective officers of the Senate and House of Representatives, and, if so, to report what legislation, if any, is necessary to the full and proper execution of that law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Virginia ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is immaterial, sir; I would just as soon it should lie over. I will state, however, that in preparing the resolution I had strict reference to the act known as the "civil-service act." In referring to the soldiers appointed and removed I had reference only to the civil-service act. I simply wanted to ascertain by the resolution whether the civil-service act applies to appointments made by officers of the Congress of the United States, not confined to either branch of it. I think it well enough for us to know it now. I am entirely willing that the Senate should pass upon it to-day, appoint such a committee, and let us ascertain the facts.

I did think yesterday, when the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] was introduced, that it was a columbiad aimed in some direction and at somebody. I understood that the appointee removed was from the State of Kentucky and that the man appointed was from the State of Virginia. I never knew him, do not know him now, and have never seen him; but I thought if we were to have an investigation under a resolution of that sort we might as well determine the question for the whole Congress as for the Senate, for both Houses as for one.

The civil-service act, as I understand it, is a law governing not only one branch of Congress, but the whole Congress, and I am prepared to show this morning that under the civil-service rules the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor does not have anything like her proportion of the offices in either House of Congress or in any Department in this city or under this Government. I am prepared to show, moreover, that the State of Kentucky, which has the same representation, has more appointments of bona fide Kentuckians than the State of Virginia. I am prepared to answer back all this ad captandum stuff that I have heard throughout the country about the patronage of the Federal Government being given out to certain gentlemen in the State of Virginia.

I am prepared to show, moreover, that the gentleman who complains so severely of the removal of the poor colored man from the State of Kentucky said not a word when there was removed a disabled confederate soldier from his own State a few weeks ago. No investigation was suggested then; no investigation was suggested at the time when a score of wounded soldiers came from one side of this Capitol to take a place, if it could be given to them, on the other. The one-legged man who sits beyond that door, and ought to attract the attention of every Senator who goes out of it, came from one end of this Capitol to be provided for in the other. No investigation was suggested then; no investigation was suggested of anything until there came to be a removal of one colored man from Kentucky to make place, as it may be said, for one from Virginia. Four can be removed in one part of this Capitol from Virginia alone and four new men put in, and no suggestion of investigation is made.

Why, sir, I stood upon this floor but a few weeks ago and voted for a resolution to investigate what are called the "Virginia and Mississippi outrages." It was one of the most reluctant votes I ever cast in one point of view; but I felt that due regard for the good name of my State required that I should cast that vote. I have read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I have read in the newspapers, that a gentleman representing that particular district in the State of Virginia had asked for an investigation, and I voted for it, not alone because of his request, but because I felt that I wanted that large preponderance of the people of Virginia who had nothing in common with such outrages to be vindicated against the charge of committing them. I say I voted for the investigation. I then saw all the gentlemen on the other side, including the Senator from Kentucky, vote against that investigation. Then there stares us in the face the proclamation, or message, if you please, of the governor of that Commonwealth—than whom there is no gentleman of higher character living, and whose official conduct has wrung from the opposition compliments and praise, and throughout the State to-day he is spoken of as a gentleman worthy of any public trust—in which he says that these murderers were not even indicted, and that no effort was ever made to try them. I say, sir, that with that staring us in the face I was surprised that the Senator from Kentucky could not vote to investigate; but when it came to the mere matter of the removal of a colored appointee from Kentucky he did move an investigation. I am glad he has withdrawn the resolution, and I hope it will now be his pleasure to vote to adopt this resolution, and let us know now and henceforth whether it is civil service executed to turn out all the office-holders on one side of the Capitol and civil service violated to turn out one on the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution.

Mr. BECK. I did not hear the first part of the remarks of the Senator from Virginia in reference to something I had done. When a colored laborer had been dismissed as I thought wrongfully I deemed it my duty to replace him if I could, but I found I could not do it, and I abandoned the effort. Beyond that I know nothing I have done. But I should like to see this resolution in print. I do not know what right we have to interfere with the House of Representatives. I do not think it comes with good grace to ask them to do anything they do not want to do themselves; but by to-morrow morning I may change my mind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over and will be printed.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Fisheries and the Committee on Expenditures of Public Money be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ clerks, who shall be paid the same per diem compensation as the session committee clerks of standing committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin mean that each committee may have a clerk?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Each a clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be modified accordingly.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The resolution was prepared by the financial clerk of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as modified.

The resolution was agreed to.

PAY OF POSTMASTERS.

Mr. VOORHEES. On the 29th of January I offered a resolution calling on the Postmaster-General to report to the Senate the cause or causes of delay, if any, in the adjustment of the salaries and pay of postmasters under the act of March 3, 1883. I understand the information has been furnished, and I ask that the communication in response to that resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that Executive Document No. 87, being a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitted to the Senate on the 31st of January, be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Chief Clerk reads as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., January 31, 1884.

SIR: In response to Senate resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate the cause or causes of delay, if any, in the adjustment of the salaries and pay of postmasters under the act of Congress of March 3, 1883, and whether in his opinion any further legislation is necessary on this subject"—

I have to say—

First. That upon consideration of the act of March 3, 1883, in connection with the acts of July 1, 1864, and the proviso to the act of June 12, 1866, a doubt arose in my mind as to the proper construction of the act referred to in the resolution. In order that I might be properly advised, the matter was, on the 25th day of August, 1883, referred to the Attorney-General, where it is still pending. This is the cause of delay in the adjustment referred to.

Second. In response to that portion of the resolution asking if in my opinion any further legislation is necessary, I have to say that until I am advised by the Attorney-General as to the proper construction to be placed on the act under consideration I shall be unable to report to your honorable body what, if any, additional legislation is necessary.

Very respectfully,

W. Q. GRESHAM, Postmaster-General.

Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
President of the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. In view of the fact stated in that communication of the Postmaster-General I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be directed to report to the Senate the cause or causes of delay, if any, on the part of the Department of Justice in advising the Postmaster-General as to the proper construction of the act of March 3, 1883, in relation to the salaries and pay of postmasters, the question of the proper construction of said act having been referred by the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General on the 25th of August, 1883, and no answer having yet been made thereto.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me rather an unusual proceeding for us to seek to enforce an answer by one head of Department to another head of Department. If the Senator desired any information from the Attorney-General himself in behalf of the Senate I would not object to such a resolution.

Mr. VOORHEES. The Senator from Ohio is misapprehending the scope of this resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better lie over and be printed. Perhaps I am mistaken about it.

Mr. VOORHEES. I wish to make a statement in connection with it before it goes over.

On the 3d of March last we passed a law which affects many thousands of persons who have heretofore been postmasters in the service of the United States, for the purpose of adjusting their pay and salary. It clothed the Postmaster-General, as we supposed, with power to do what we desired done. It seems that he had difficulty on the subject, and on the 25th day of last August he referred the matter to the Attorney-General for his legal opinion. He sought the advice of the Department of Justice. That is now almost six months ago.

Some ten days ago, my attention being called to this strange neglect, I offered a resolution, which has been read here and which has been answered by the Postmaster-General, calling upon that officer for information why this delay had occurred, and he has answered here in the hearing of the Senate that it has occurred because nearly six months ago, giving the date as the 25th of August, he asked the legal advice of the Attorney-General as to the proper construction of the act of March 3, 1883, and up to this time he has received no answer, and he states further that whether additional legislation is required to carry out the purpose of Congress he can not say until he is advised by the Attorney-General.

Now, I submit that there is not a Senator here but what would agree with me that we should have some information why a subject so simple, in so brief a compass, should be held in the Department of Justice almost six months, delaying the settlement of accounts of thousands of people who need the relief which this act gives. I say to the Senator from Ohio that the resolution which I have offered does not refer the paper received from the Postmaster-General to the Attorney-General. I had that read as the basis of the resolution which I offered calling for information from the Attorney-General. I had it read because it states the fact. I did not have it read in order to refer it, but to inform the Senate why this resolution ought to be immediately adopted and not laid over. If the Senator from Ohio wants one day more of delay, of course he can have it. The act of the 3d March, 1883, is nearly one year old, it will be one day older by the Senator's objection, but I apprehend it will not be obstructed beyond that period.

Mr. SHERMAN. I find that I am not mistaken in regard to the purport of this resolution. It is a resolution calling upon the Attorney-General to give us a reason why he has not answered another head of Department a legal question which the Postmaster-General had a right to put to the Attorney-General. That is an unusual process. Let the Executive Department stand on its own footing. If the Senator wants from the Attorney-General his opinion upon the legal question that is stated in these papers, and the Attorney-General fails to give the Senator an answer to that question in a reasonable time, then I would vote for a second call a little more peremptory in its character; but this resolution is entirely based upon the correspondence between these two heads of Departments, with which we have nothing to do. We have the right to call on any head of Department and ask him to send us any facts that we call for and his opinion on any question arising on those facts; but it is unusual for us to call him to account for neglecting or delaying his answer to one of his colleagues in the Cabinet. It might compel him in certain cases—not in this case, probably—to betray Cabinet secrets, Cabinet counsels. This is a mere matter between two Cabinet officers. Therefore I ask that the resolution lie over until to-morrow, and I hope that the Senator will modify the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

LADY FRANKLIN BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. HALE. I now desire to call up the conference report received from the House of Representatives to which I alluded some time ago and which is on the desk.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
JOHN SHERMAN,
E. SAULSBURY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAM'L J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be placed on file.

Mr. HALE. That is the only report that the conferees could make, because the representatives of the two Houses in the second conference entirely failed to agree. The House conferees insisted upon maintaining the attitude taken by the body which they represented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine desire that the conference report be now considered under the rules?

Mr. HALE. That is my desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will then put the question. Rule XXVII requires that question to be put without debate, so as to bring the matter before the Senate. Will the Senate now consider the report of the committee of conference?

Mr. HALE. I presume there will be no objection.

The question was decided in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report is before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Of course, Mr. President, if nothing further is done the whole matter lies stranded, the bill in any form fails to become a law, and any further effort in this direction for the relief of the Greely party ceases. In order that something may come out of this I propose, not as representing the conference, for that is not a part of its report, but as a member of the body, to make a motion which will test the sense of the Senate to-day upon this important and pressing subject-matter, and that is a motion that the Senate recede from its amendment. Of course I realize that in doing that I am renewing the same question that the Senate passed upon the other day; but time has passed, and it may be that the imperative duty of doing something will press more strongly upon Senators now than then, and there are certain relations which the Department in charge of this expedition will have to it that may tend to throw some additional light upon the subject-matter.

The Senate committed itself by one vote to the proposition that the naval force to be sent up into the northern waters for the relief of Lieutenant Greely and his party should be a volunteer force. That action was taken after discussion, and it involved the Senate taking the attitude that the Secretary of the Navy should have no power to force officers or men unwillingly into this dangerous service. I did not at the time sympathize with or agree in that view or vote upon it, but the Senate took its position, and in the conference I may say I supported the view of the body and so joined in the report.

Since then time, as it often does, has helped to loosen or cut this knot, and it is found on examination that so far as the crew is concerned—not the commissioned officers, but the crew that will be sent out on this expedition, if it ever sails—it will be gathered by a re-enlisting of men or a new enlisting of men in the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy does not deem it advisable under the conditions of enlistment of men in the Navy to order them to this service. I do not say that he believes he has not the power; but whatever question there may be about the nature of the contract he proposes to save all of that by calling for enlistments or for re-enlistments of men now in the service, and out of those who so offer he will select the best men offering, in his judgment, so that practically any Senator having any anxiety as to men being ordered into this service may dispossess his mind of that concern. So far as the officers are concerned the Secretary finds—for the subject has been much mooted in the American Navy, and attention has been called to it in every rank—that there will be no difficulty in getting superior men of the highest qualifications, of the fitting age, of enduring physical frame and life, who are willing and glad to take charge of this expedition with all its responsibilities.

Under these conditions it may be said that the House might as well have receded, and let the amendment go on, because it would not embarrass the passage of the bill or the fitting out of the expedition; and that is true. But this body has to deal with a co-ordinate branch of the Government, that takes its responsibility and looks at things from its own view, from its own standpoint, and we must accept results, I think, as we find them. The House has insisted upon its attitude on this general ground that from the beginning it was a remarkable expedition, where great responsibility should rest on the Executive in fitting it out and conducting it, that the hearts and sympathies of the American people are interested in its success and in everything that aids it to success, and that all that responsibility should be left with the President of the United States, and renewed conferences failed to impress the conferees of the House with any other view.

On these conditions, Mr. President, I shall ask again that the sense of the Senate be taken on my motion, which I will make before I take my seat, that the Senate recede from its amendment and let this bill go through; not that it has accomplished in terms and in form all that it sought; but as I have said light has come into this question by the process of time, and every danger that was found resting in any Senator's mind is avoided, and as an actual matter of fact I ask the Senate under these circumstances not to let this thing hang suspended, because every day adds certainly to the danger of this expedition being another failure. There is no time to spare. Each twenty-four hours is important, and it may be that the discussion and the time already spent have resulted in such a condition as practically and actually meets the objections of Senators.

And so, for these reasons, Mr. President, not wishing to take up more of the time of the Senate, I move that the Senate recede from its amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it to be his duty to state that it seems to him that this question is not regularly before the Senate. The Senate asked for a conference. The House of Representatives granted it. The papers, according to the parliamentary course, were returned on the disagreement to the House of Representatives. The report of the committee of conference is not a recommendation to either House, but simply a statement of the fact that they were unable to agree. The bill was in the possession of the House of Representatives for its action on the amendment of the Senate. The House has taken no action on the amendment of the Senate, either insisting upon its disagreement or adhering to its disagreement or receding from its disagreement, but has sent the bill back with a message that it concurs in the report of the conference committee, the conference committee's report being that nothing has been done; but the bill is here on the table, and the Chair——

Mr. HALE. I recognized that point myself when the bill came over, although I have, of course, very little practice in and knowledge of the parliamentary rules applicable in this body. It seems to me that in the emergency—as the Senate has voted and has agreed to consider the bill, so that it is now before the Senate—we may very well and very reasonably waive any point as to the action of the House; and if the Senate does vote to recede, I take it that then the original bill will become a law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the House of Representatives does not inform the Senate that it returns the bill to the Senate, but simply informs the Senate that it has concurred in the report of the conference committee, which report is that the committee were unable to agree. The Clerk brought the bill with this resolution of the House of Representatives, so that the bill is bodily here.

Mr. HALE. The Clerk brought the bill in a formal manner and delivered it with the message, and it was received by the Senate. So it seems to me that the Senate has considered, or may well fittingly consider, that it has waived the point, undoubtedly a good one, that has been suggested by the Chair. I think we may proceed in this matter, waiving the point.

Mr. BUTLER. I would suggest to my friend from Maine that by unanimous consent we might take the bill up.

Mr. INGALLS. That you will not get.

Mr. HOAR. Has not the Senate voted to consider it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The difficulty with the Chair is that in point of parliamentary law and regular proceeding this bill is not before the Senate although the Clerk of the House brought it here.

Mr. BUTLER. Where is it, Mr. President, if it is not before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in the parliamentary possession of the House of Representatives, the Chair thinks, although it is bodily in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the position taken by the Chair is undoubtedly correct. The bill is not in the possession of the Senate, and can not, therefore, be made the subject of a motion. The bill is, as a parliamentary proposition, in the possession of the House of Representatives, and the fact that it was manually brought here by the Clerk does not place it in a position upon our Calendar where it is subject to action by this body. The Senator from Maine could undoubtedly ask an expression of the Senate upon the question whether it would recede or insist upon its amendment; but then the only parliamentary procedure would be to ask for another committee of conference, when the conferees, considering themselves instructed, could agree with the House to recede from the Senate amendment.

But there is one other observation that I desire to make in connection with what the Senator from Maine has stated. We have heard repeatedly as an argument why this bill should be acted upon that there was an emergency; that it was imperatively necessary, in view of the emergency, that this unlimited discretion should be given to the Secretary of the Navy and the President to dispatch an expedition in search of the lost survivors of the Greely expedition. I saw not long since, within two days, in the telegraphic announcements in the public press, that a British bark had already been purchased by the Secretary of the Navy, and that the command of the expedition had been tendered to one or two gentlemen whose names have escaped me. If the Secretary of the Navy, in advance of the action of Congress, after the declaration of the Senate that the bill should be amended, and before there had been any agreement between the two Houses, has taken the responsibility of purchasing a British bark for the purpose of engaging in this expedition, and has tendered the command of this fleet to any officer of the Navy or any person employed in the merchant marine, I think there is an emergency, one that requires very serious consideration. Inasmuch as these statements have been made—I do not know whether they are correct or incorrect—it appears to me that before, in the presence of this emergency, we are to vote upon the question whether we shall recede or insist upon our amendment we had better have a little information. If the action of Congress is not necessary at all; if fleets are to be purchased and expeditions organized while measures are undetermined, then it is a matter for consideration whether there is not, as the Senator from Maine says, an emergency that we should take into consideration. I do not know whether these allegations are true or not; but I should like to know whether there is any foundation for the report.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of War——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This debate is proceeding of course by unanimous consent, as the Chair without some direction of the Senate has nothing to lay before the body. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, in view of the necessity for securing proper vessels suitable for this service, have, on their own part, personally taken the responsibility, which they do not claim in any way that the Government is bound to assume, of securing one of the vessels for this service, if it is ever provided for by Congress. If it is not, they have the responsibility upon themselves. They have gone further as to another vessel, and have made such arrangements to secure her that if this measure passes, or if any measure passes justifying and authorizing the expedition, they will accept it. But I can inform the Senator from Kansas and the body that the Government has not been committed. Neither the Secretary of War nor the Secretary of the Navy proposes to commit the Government without due authority.

I may say that the class of ships suitable for this onerous, dangerous service is a small one. There are only a few in the world. The Newfoundland and Scotch sealers or whalers furnish the only ships that by their structure are fitted for this dangerous work, and they are already getting in condition and fitting out and ready to start on their dangerous business for the year. They go very early in order to be up there in due season, and if they are once fitted out and have left their ports, whether at Halifax, or Newfoundland Island, or at Dundee, or wherever they may be found, the year is gone; they can not be reached. On this condition, under these circumstances, that which I have stated has been done.

As to the parliamentary condition of this measure and the report accompanying it, whether the House has done what it should have done in not adopting a motion to insist, the bill has come here at any rate; and it seems to me that there ought to be a way by which the Senate can agree to take some action upon it, so that it may be known what its attitude is. As a Senator on my right suggests to me, if Lieutenant Greely is to be left to perish, with his followers, I hope they may die in a parliamentary manner, so that it shall be satisfactory, so that no question may be raised as to their violating any rule.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senate consider the bill which is upon the desk of the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not conceive that he has any authority on account of the stress of the circumstances to violate the rules and orders of the Senate without unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. That is what I am asking.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Therefore the Chair felt it to be his duty to state to the Senate the attitude of the bill. The Senator from Maine now asks unanimous consent that he may move that the Senate recede from its amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. INGALLS. For the present I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas objects.

Mr. HALE. I will take the opinion of the Chair upon the question: Would it be in order for me now, wherever the bill and the report of the conference may be actually, to move for a new conference, with instructions to recede from the Senate amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion, as has been often decided in this body and elsewhere, that it is impossible to make any motion respecting a bill or amendment pending between the two Houses unless the body in which the motion is made has possession of the bill in the regular way. Therefore, if this bill had not been sent here (as it has not been, as the Chair thinks) from the House of Representatives by its messenger, the Senator from Maine could not make his report from the committee of conference and ask any action upon it whatever, because the measure is not in the possession of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER. If it is in order, I move that a message be sent to the House of Representatives requesting that body to return the bill to the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Let us proceed so as not to meet with new objections. Suppose the House sends the bill in form, and its Clerk appears and announces that as the organ of that body he brings here the actual measure; can the Senate then proceed unless the House has in addition to its present action taken some vote indicating its position upon the bill and the controversy upon it?

Mr. BUTLER. The Senate can recommit it. The Senate can pass the bill as it came from the House without amendment, I take it.

Mr. HALE. Then, as I understand, the only point now to be avoided which has been raised by the method of the House's action is to receive the bill in form from the House.

Mr. BUTLER. I submit that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from South Carolina repeat his motion?

Mr. BUTLER. I move that a message be sent to the House of Representatives requesting them to return to the Senate the bill now on the desk of the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To transmit it?

Mr. BUTLER. To transmit, or whatever the parlimentary language is.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Maine has repeatedly endeavored to enforce upon the Senate the idea that every moment was precious, and that lives might be periled by delay. The Senator from Maine knows better than anybody else that no expedition for the relief of this party in the Polar Sea can be dispatched from our coast with any possibility of success earlier than May next. Therefore when he endeavors to impress upon the body that we are trifling with human life, that there are great interests involved which are moved by considerations of humanity, he is saying what is not borne out by the facts. There was ample time and there is ample time now, instead of purchasing British barks, to build the necessary ships here in the United States to send forward properly armored and equipped with everything necessary for a successful search after the Greely party.

I do not understand what is the hidden motive of this continual attempt to make it appear here that we must act speedily, instantaneously, without consideration, without any examination of the measure that is brought before us, or else these lives may be sacrificed. They can not be reached by any expedition that can leave these shores earlier than May next.

There is one other matter in connection with this business, and it is germane to the question before the Senate as to what action should be taken. I do not understand that the Secretary of the Navy or any other executive officer, after measures have been reported by both Houses, has the right to appear and offer suggestions in his official capacity as to what action shall be taken by conference committees of either House of Congress. I am told, I have seen in a publication that is authorized by Congress, that the Secretary of the Navy addressed a communication to the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives directing them not to agree to the amendment offered by the Senate, because it would imperil the success of this enterprise. I think that the Secretary of the Navy departed from his functions when he assumed to dictate to either House of Congress what action they should take after they had deliberately expressed their opinion.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him to set his mind right upon that point?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. The Secretary of the Navy sent no such message. I can not conceive that he, with his long knowledge of public life and of the relations existing between the different departments of the Government, could have done it. I received a dispatch from him after the passage of the Senate amendment, and a dispatch to about the same effect was sent to the House, saying that the passage of the Senate amendment, the language of which he did not know, might cause embarrassment. There was no attempt in any way to either domineer or suggest the action of the conference committee or of the two branches of Congress which that committee represented. This same thing was referred to the other day. I know that the report was about that the Secretary of the Navy had sought to influence and prevent an agreement, but there is nothing in the facts to bear that out; and I am very glad to correct the Senator from Kansas upon this matter.

Mr. INGALLS. I read the proceedings in the House of Representatives as reported in the RECORD. The chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, in presenting his report, submitted a communication from the Secretary of the Navy bearing upon this subject as a reason why the House should not concur in the amendment that was agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Was not that proper? The Senator's statement now is very different from what it was a few moments ago.

Mr. INGALLS. I say that communication was not within his legitimate functions; that he had no right to appear when this matter was before a committee of conference and lend the weight of his official influence to the conferees on the part of the House to prevent the acceptance of an amendment agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Why not?

Mr. INGALLS. It was an impertinent intrusion.

Mr. HALE. Why?

Mr. INGALLS. It was an invasion of the proper domain of legislation.

Mr. HALE. The committees of both branches in preparing the bill and in the consideration of it from time to time had requested the presence of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. Each of those officers had appeared and had given his views, and stood ready at any time to give his views.

Mr. INGALLS. That was right.

Mr. HALE. It is impossible to consider a subject of this kind without conference with the heads of Departments.

Mr. INGALLS. That was undoubtedly correct.

Mr. HALE. There was nothing further done except in the continuation of the conferences that had already taken place between the Department officers and the committees having this matter in charge; and there never was the slightest pretense or desire manifested on the part of the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War in any way to influence this matter.

Mr. INGALLS. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the House when submitting the report to that body reported the communication of the Secretary of the Navy as a reason why the amendment of the Senate should not be agreed to. Further than that, he insisted upon the floor of the House that it should be rejected because, as he said, he wanted to throw the entire responsibility for the success or failure of this expedition upon the President of the United States. That was the reason alleged in the House of Representatives why this amendment should not be concurred in; and the Senator from Maine co-operates with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives in the attempt to prevent all amendment to this bill for the purpose of throwing the entire responsibility—and I use his language—for the success or failure of the expedition upon the President of the United States.

Mr. HALE. I did not even vote against this amendment, which was proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. It struck me when it was offered that it might be a good thing. It came up at the close of the discussion, and I did not call for a division or for the yeas and nays upon it. There has been no attempt anywhere to do an unfitting or an unseemly thing. The House sent this measure here and gave a large, an almost unexampled discretion, which it thought wise under the exigency, to the President of the United States. I am attempting as fast as it is possible to get something or other through that shall start this expedition.

Mr. INGALLS. In May next.

Mr. HALE. Yes; and so far as that goes, the Senator himself must know enough about vessels and ships and ordinary maritime employments to know that you can not the moment one of these ships comes here, bare, empty, turn her head about and set her prow to the northern seas without weeks and weeks of delay. There is examination to be made, trial to be made, she is to be filled up and fitted, and it is a slow work. It is not like an ordinary cruise of sixty days to some well-known port of the world, but there has got to be time.

So far as the point suggested by the Senator that new ships might have been built here is concerned, I would have been very glad if these ships could have been built in this country; but with the necessity that the expedition should start at an early date, take the time mentioned by the Senator from Kansas, neither the War nor the Navy Department dared to risk building a new ship here, because if anything happened in the middle of the building, if a fire broke out and it was destroyed, the season would have been gone. If a new ship was built and if on trial she proved to be faulty, there would be no time to repair her or to change her model and plan. The Newfoundland sealers and the Dundee whalers have been tried and found not wanting, and they do not need the trial trip that a new ship needs. The board of inquiry that sat upon this subject called by the Secretary of War considered this very question, and decided that it was not safe under this emergency to risk the building of the ships here. All along, at every stage of this matter, I have found that the Departments have proceeded carefully, cautiously, wisely, and the House of Representatives has said that under those conditions it will trust them with the responsibility.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair may be permitted to suggest in respect to the embarrassment about the consideration of the subject, that the regular thing to do would be to return the bill to the House of Representatives with the statement that the Senate is unable regularly to consider the matter which is pending between the two Houses until the House shall have acted again on the amendment of the Senate. That would enable the House of Representatives, having the proper possession of the bill, as it has now by parliamentary law, either to again insist upon its disagreement to the amendment or to recede from its disagreement.

Mr. HALE. I want to do what will expedite the matter most. What was the motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from South Carolina was that the House of Representatives be requested to transmit the bill to the Senate, it having been actually transmitted and supposed to be here under such transmittal at this moment. Then the Chair thinks that the only question could be, the House not having acted upon the last disagreement, a motion to reconsider the insistance of the Senate on its amendment. The time has gone by under the rule, if anybody objects, to make that motion. Therefore, the Chair would be again embarrassed, if the point were raised, in the Senate reaching the question whether it ought to recede or not. So the Chair thinks the only regular way (and the whole difficulty has undoubtedly arisen upon the fact that the bill was transmitted to the Senate without any action of the House upon the amendment at all) is to return the bill to the House with an explanation of the circumstances, and the House can then act upon the Senate amendment, either receding from their disagreement or insisting upon it. Then the question will be whether the Senate will recede. There is no difficulty in doing it in that way, the Chair thinks.

Mr. HALE. I do not know any other way, and yet I dislike to run the risk of getting the measure into a condition where either body will consider that it is being followed too closely upon technicalities, and get a feeling up and decline to do anything. I do not know that anything better than the suggestion of the Chair can be done if we can take no action now except by unanimous consent and the Senator from Kansas will not give his consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, but the Chair felt it due to suggest that when the bill should be thus returned another difficulty might present itself if any Senator then raised the question.

Mr. BUTLER. I realize the embarrassments and complications that my motion might lead to if it should prevail. I would say now that I based that motion somewhat upon the assumption that when the bill was returned to the Senate we might do just as the Chair has indicated, that is, get unanimous consent to reconsider the action of the Senate in amending it, although the two days had elapsed. Of course it would require unanimous consent. In that view of the question perhaps it would be the safest and most expeditious thing for me, as a friend of the bill, to withdraw my motion, so as to carry out the suggestion of the Chair. I have but one purpose, and that is to try to get something done to relieve Lieutenant Greely and his party. I am not at all wedded to any particular method, and if any other can be suggested which will expedite the matter I am quite willing to give it my support.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is bound to suppose that a formal vote of the House of Representatives upon insisting on its disagreement or receding from it was had, and therefore the Chair can not presume to raise any issue between the Senate and House of Representatives affecting the regularity of procedure.

Mr. BUTLER. I withdraw my motion to send a message to the House.

Mr. HALE. Then I move that a message be sent to the House of Representatives asking them to return the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is just the same motion as that the Senator from South Carolina made, which he has withdrawn. The motion the Chair suggested, if he may be permitted, is that the bill, as it is bodily here and brought here by the Clerk of the House, be returned to the House with the statement that the House not appearing to have voted upon the amendment which was reported from the conference the Senate is unable to act upon it under its rules. That leaves the measure in the possession of the House of Representatives, and a motion to recede from the disagreement or to insist upon the disagreement and return the bill to the Senate, which is of course perfectly in order, will disentangle the difficulty.

Mr. HALE. Then a motion to return the joint resolution to the House with a message stating that the Senate cannot take action upon it, as the House has not indicated its position upon the pending amendment, would meet the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Or the Chair would suggest another course, which would be perhaps still better, that is, an informal communication to the Speaker of this accidental omission, when undoubtedly the Clerk would take the bill again and the House would take the proper action without any formal message.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not the Chair overlook the important fact that the House of Representatives concurred in the report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the report unhappily is only a report that there is no agreement.

Mr. INGALLS. That does not change the fact that it is a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a report that they have disagreed. Therefore in voting to concur in that report they have voted that the committee of conference has disagreed. That is all there is in it.

Mr. INGALLS. That is the end of it, in a parliamentary sense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the end of it until the House again acts on the amendment of the Senate. The want of action there is what makes the difficulty.

Mr. INGALLS. Then sending for the bill will do no good so far as the solution of this problem is concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the bill is once again in possession of the House of Representatives in fact, as it is in law now, it is competent, as the Chair supposes in that body as in all parliamentary bodies, for it to act upon the question of disagreement and insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. INGALLS. That is very true, but the bill is there now in law.

Mr. HALE. The bill is already here actually, and I think the last suggestion of the Chair is the best way out of the difficulty, that an informal message be sent to the Speaker by the President of the Senate, and then the House naturally will take action upon the single matter in issue.

Mr. INGALLS. That is a matter between the President of the Senate and the Speaker, a private matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. I think if the Senate will consent to have the matter laid aside for further action, undoubtedly the simplest way would be an informal communication to the presiding officer of the House.

Mr. HALE. I think that is the better way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Clerk will come and take the bill and the House will take a formal vote, which will untie the whole difficulty.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly it would all have been saved if when the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations presented the report and it was read he had moved its adoption or had moved that the House insist on its amendment and then adopted the report. That would have brought everything here.

Mr. HOAR. May I inquire for information how the bill came to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was brought here by the Clerk of the House of Representatives in a message which read: "The House concurs in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution," giving its title, and it stopped there. The report of that concurrence is on the back of the joint resolution, which regularly never passes from one House to the other but which is always made in duplicate. The report is simply that the conferees met and were unable to agree.

Mr. HOAR. My difficulty is this: Suppose it be true that the House, as a matter of parliamentary proceeding, had also reaffirmed its action on the amendment or dealt with the amendment in some other way, still, the joint resolution having been sent by the House to the Senate and received by the Senate into its custody, how can the Clerk of the House, on a private message, take that document away on the ground of an informal action of the House without some vote of the Senate like that suggested by the Senator from South Carolina?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The only answer the Chair can make is that the resolution of the House which the Clerk brought to the Senate does not inform us that it has taken any action on the bill or that it sends the bill.

Mr. HALE. Is there any record anywhere that the bill has been received or is in the custody of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know that there is. The Journal should only properly show of course the message of the House of Representatives, which is spread on the Journal.

Mr. HALE. So that apart from the actual material presence of the written bill on the Secretary's desk there is nothing to show that it is not now lodged in the custody of the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is so.

Mr. HALE. I take it the Chair is proceeding on that supposition; I am at any rate in accepting the suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The same question the Chair thinks has arisen in the last ten or fifteen years between the two bodies, and there was no difficulty of course when an explanation was made in setting the matter right.

Mr. HALE. Then I ask that the matter be laid aside for the present.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask a question. Could the Senate have acted on the report unless the bill had been returned to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate could not.

Mr. CONGER. Then the bill is here as a necessary part of that report, and it was sent here by the House for the action of the Senate upon its report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But under the constant law of conferences, the Senate conferees left the papers with the House conferees. The House conferees returned the bill with the amendment to the House of Representatives when they reported that the conference was unable to agree. That left the bill in the possession of the House of Representatives, exactly as if there had not been any conference at all, for its action.

Mr. CONGER. But by some law, parliamentary or otherwise, certainly that report without the bill would have left the Senate without any power to act even upon the report. By some law there was a necessity that the measure should be here in possession of the Senate, and it was properly announced by the Clerk that it was sent to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill could only come to the Senate after the House had acted upon it like any other bill which has passed one House and been sent to the other and returned with or without amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Does it not follow, if that be correct, that this whole matter is out of order; that the Senator from Maine had no right to call up the report, and that it is not lawfully before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That follows.

Mr. HALE. That is only another way of stating the same thing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the Senator from Maine called up the report the Chair was not advised what the exact state of the measure was, but on looking at the report the Chair felt it to be his duty to state the matter to the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. I suggest as one practical solution of the difficulty to the Senator from Maine, that if he will consent to the passage of a bill in which the amount of the appropriation shall be limited to $500,000, or $1,000,000, as he may suggest, and which shall provide that the expedition shall be under the command of volunteers, we can undoubtedly pass it in this body in fifteen minutes and send it over to the other House and settle the matter.

Mr. HALE. That does not relieve us from the difficulty with reference to this particular subject-matter. We have got to deal with the House of Representatives. It has passed the bill and it may well take its attitude that until all legal forms have been passed through both by that body and this and there is final action upon the measure, it will not consider any other. I would be willing to do that, but I can see the very trouble that we may reach. I think the easiest way now is to take the suggestion of the Chair, and let this matter be passed over for the present and let the informal communication be made and the bill returned, and at any rate see what comes out of it. Then if the House of Representatives insists that it has done everything that it can or will do and that the Senate ought to have acted here, if the Senate is finical in the point raised between the two bodies, we may proceed to original action ourselves. But I do not want to see that done until every opportunity is taken advantage of to bring the two Houses to some action on this measure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not imagine that there will be any difficulty in disposing of it if the matter is laid aside. The point of the Senator from Massachusetts is well taken that there is strictly nothing before the Senate. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday's sitting.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. RANSOM it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 19) to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. BOWEN to the amendment of Mr. CONGER as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] has the floor and is about to submit some remarks in relation to the substitute offered by him. Before that is done I desire again to submit to the Senate the proposition that debate upon the measure, which has now been before the Senate for a week, shall close at 4 o'clock to-day. I would ask that, with the understanding that ten minutes of time before the close of the debate be allowed to the Senator in charge of the bill, myself, to answer what may have been urged in favor of these new propositions. I trust that arrangement will be satisfactory to all members of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Will the Senator from Delaware restate his proposition?

Mr. BAYARD. I will restate the proposition, to which I ask the unanimous approval of the Senate. It is that debate upon this measure shall close at 4 o'clock, prior to which time ten minutes be allowed to me to reply to the arguments which may have been made in favor of the pending substitutes for the measure in debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Delaware, that general debate upon the bill be closed at 4 o'clock, allowing to that Senator ten minutes before 4 to answer such arguments as may have been made?

Mr. INGALLS. If that suggestion had been made yesterday I think it would have been just, and it might probably have been agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I did make it yesterday.

Mr. INGALLS. But last evening practically two new bills were offered as substitutes for the measure, proposing an entire change of the whole method suggested in the bill, and the Senator from Colorado has the floor. It would be unjust to limit him as to the amount of time he may occupy, and there will then remain a little over an hour in all in which to debate these measures.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from Kansas was not in the Senate possibly when I submitted the proposition yesterday and it was objected to by a Senator who has offered one of the substitutes by way of amendment; but to-day it was upon consultation with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] and also the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] that I submitted the proposition again. I will extend the time until half past 4 if the Senator thinks that will be more satisfactory.

Mr. INGALLS. It seems to me, when we are to have two entirely new propositions upon this matter, involving an entire change of administration, it would be hardly fair to the friends of those measures to ask that the debate should be limited to a little over an hour.

Mr. BAYARD. The suggestion was made after consultation with both of them. I will extend the time then until half past 4, and ask the Senate to assent to that. I propose to make the time for closing the debate half past 4, with the reservation of ten minutes for myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Delaware that debate upon the bill shall close at half past 4, allowing that Senator ten minutes to conclude?

Mr. CONGER. I have reason to believe and hope that the Senate may close the debate at that time, but I am unwilling that there shall be ten minutes given with no opportunity to reply. I think perhaps it is as improper for that to be asked on one side as on the other. I think the debate had better go on without a limitation. As far as I am concerned myself I do not know now that I shall wish to occupy any time in remarks upon the substitute which I have submitted—perhaps not—but I think we can reach a determination of the discussion better by letting the debate go on without limit. Therefore I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition, the Chair understands, is objected to by the Senator from Michigan. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOWEN. Mr. President, the remarks which I desire to submit will occupy but a few moments. I have submitted this amendment because the people of the State of Colorado are vitally interested in the question; not for the purpose of antagonizing the bill before the Senate, but for the purpose of making my own record right upon the question.

After the great scope which this debate has taken, and the evident thought and attention which Senators have given to questions involved in the pending legislation, I should hesitate to announce my views were it not for the fact that the State of Colorado, which I in part represent here, gets its full share of the legacy bequeathed to the Government by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. These excrescences upon our general land system, however much they may impair the symmetry of that system, must nevertheless be recognized, cared for, and directed.

I take it for granted that no Senator, especially the gentleman who has evidently given great attention to the questions involved—I refer to the author of the bill—nor the Senator who has with so much ability, and I must say patience, kept charge of the bill on this floor, has any pride of opinion in this matter, but on the other hand are seeking for what is the best, most adequate, and proper remedy under all the circumstances.

Agreeing as I do with the plan of the bill which enables claimants to go into the courts in all these and kindred matters, I have ventured to propose the general amendment which I have, and upon which I am willing to rest my own record rather than to propose amendments to the several sections of the bill, which latter course would have drawn me into the general debate, which I did not desire.

The theory of my amendment is—

First. That nothing is necessary except to enlarge the scope of a bill in equity to quiet title, to the end that all questions necessary to be determined may be put in issue.

Second. That no special practice shall be created for this class of cases, but, on the other hand, to proceed according to the usual rules and practice in courts of equity.

Third. That the necessary legislative permission be given to enable claimants to make the United States a party to the litigation.

I admit that the amendment I have offered reaches cases not contemplated by the original bill; such was my intention when I prepared it; and I shall now proceed to consider the bill and the amendment together, with the hope that whatever is done shall be done so that no unnecessary questions of construction are left to impair the efficacy of the measure nor to impede proceedings thereunder.

The first objection which I desire to urge against the bill is that it creates a new practice when no such thing is necessary. The old rules and practice in courts of equity are certainly the best methods for conducting these proceedings. By the first section of my proposed substitute I have enlarged the scope of the ordinary bill in equity, and I have done so for the purpose of allowing the claimants to raise and to put in issue every question which ought to be determined in the settlement of these and kindred causes. The ordinary bill to quiet titles does not suffice to meet the questions which are covered by my amendment; and I thought that without impairing or interfering with the usual and customary practice, which I believe to be the best, I could enlarge the scope of the bill to the end that the extent and boundaries of claims could be fixed and determined and that the nature of the title could be ascertained in the same case.

I believed when I prepared the amendment that this was better than the bill which has been under consideration, and whatever may be the result of this matter when the vote of the Senate is taken, will nevertheless maintain the same position. I shall believe that the short and easy way to determine this matter is by a bill in equity, and I have enlarged the scope of such a bill by the first section of the amendment which I have proposed in order that all necessary questions may be put in issue and determined at the hearing.

The second section of my substitute provides that the cases shall be tried according to the ordinary rules and practice in courts of equity. I apprehend that there is no lawyer on this floor or elsewhere who will say that this method can be improved upon. I am not prepared to hold up the bill reported by the committee on one side and the ordinary rules of practice and procedure in courts of equity on the other hand and point out wherein the practice laid down by the first few sections of the bill introduced by the Senator from Vermont are not declaratory of the practice as it now exists. I do not feel that we are called upon to determine that question. I do not believe that we ought to be called upon to determine it. The Congress of the United States has no time to consider the question as to whether this is an act declaratory of what the practice now is or whether it is not. I do not believe that the necessary attention will be given to the question to enable us to make an intelligent decision upon this point. Therefore, in the second section of my substitute, I provide that the proceedings shall go on as they would do in other cases. There is no reason why we should have a special practice provided for these cases. The old rules have been ample for all the purposes of litigation. I see no reason why we should create new ones for the class of cases mentioned in the bill nor the class of cases mentioned in my amendment.

In the third section of the amendment the mode and manner of appeal is provided for. I was very much pleased to hear the suggestions of the Senator from Vermont upon the dangers likely to arise in these cases. In the bill it is provided that the district attorney of the United States shall appeal these cases unless otherwise ordered by the Attorney-General, and we understand that an appeal in equity brings the law and the facts before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MAHONE. So far as contained in the record.

Mr. BOWEN. Of course there can be no facts considered on an appeal other than those put in issue and contained in the record. That is what I mean; but the very danger which has been referred to upon this point is possible in this litigation under the bill reported by the committee, when I do not believe that it ought to be even a remote possibility. I do not believe that the opportunity should be permitted for a district attorney of the United States nor for the Attorney-General himself to determine whether an appeal should be taken or not. They are cases in which the Government is as vitally interested as the claimant, and no one man should have the power to prevent an appeal from the decrees of the lower courts.

I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to a decision of Judge Field, then a circuit judge of the United States in California and now a judge of the Supreme Court. In my opinion he is the ablest land judge not only in the United States but in the world, because he seems to comprehend everything involved in the determination of land titles. Here is what he says about the powers and duties of the Attorney-General. Mr. Justice Field says:

> After the decision of the commissioners, the control of proceedings, whether to prosecute an appeal or to dismiss the same, rested exclusively with the Attorney-General; and the propriety or legality of his action in any case was not the subject of review by any tribunal, and it could only be revoked by the appellate court upon his own application. In coming to a determination on the subject he was not restricted to an examination of the transcript transmitted to him; he could look into the archives of the former government, the reports of officers previously appointed to examine into the subject of land titles in the State, the records of the Land Department at Washington, and any correspondence existing between Mexico and the United States respecting the title.

Thus it would seem that a single officer of the Government would have the power to determine rights to vast estates. This is not wise. If we are to have resort to the courts, let us be quite sure that the cases go to the court of last resort in all cases where the United States is a party.

The committee who advocate this bill are attempting to put the proceedings upon safe grounds. This is right. I desire to place this thing upon a more safe basis than the committee has placed it. By the section which I am proposing it is provided that when a decree has been made adverse to the United States, the case shall stand appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, without any further action upon it upon the part of the district attorney of the United States or any one else.

I wish these cases to stand appealed absolutely whenever a decree has been rendered adverse to the United States in the court of original jurisdiction. No person in the world can object to the adjudication by that august tribunal, the most intelligent court in this country, a court before whose decrees and decisions we all bow with reverence, and certainly the most learned court in this country if not in the world. To it we look for that unerring certainty and precision which settles beyond all cavil and all disputes the rights of the citizen.

The purpose of my amendment is to make the bill better and not to antagonize it.

In the fourth section it is provided that these cases shall take precedence as to time over all other civil cases in the court. I believe this to be right, because these are cases which involve matters of prime importance. This idea may not be adopted at first blush, but a single explanation will suffice to show that the idea is right.

These cases are important to the Government and should be entitled to precedence on the dockets of all the courts. They should be advanced upon the dockets not only in the courts of original jurisdiction but in the Supreme Court of the United States, in order that we may have a speedy determination of the great questions involved and that we may know just how much is to be left out of the surveys of public lands, just how much territory belongs to the Government subject to the operation of its general land laws.

The fifth section of my proposed substitute simply refers to the mode and manner by which evidence of a title may be acquired from the United States after the decree.

The section provides for that, and I will not stop at this time to discuss it, because it is a matter of detail about which there is no disagreement whatever.

The sixth section saves the rights of persons who are not parties to the record. That provision has been drawn with care, because there are other parties who might be estopped by a decree or judgment other than the parties to the record. Privies to a decree are just as much estopped as parties. The theory of this section is to save the rights of all who are not parties.

Another objection to the bill reported by the committee is to that portion which relates to the issuance of scrip where land has been taken or settled upon by private parties. The scrip section is the most objectionable section in the bill. It is a matter of history that the scrip, called, I believe, Sioux scrip, was overissued, and that the parties who located that scrip afterward came to Congress and asked for a legalization where titles rested in the hands of innocent parties. True it is that these parties were required to pay a dollar and a quarter an acre, which I believe they did, but they got the land in large quantities and were not embarrassed by the homestead or pre-emption laws. The way to avert such things is not to issue scrip. We do not want any more of that kind of business if we can help it.

In lieu of scrip I have provided what I believe to be the fairest proposition that can be adopted, and that is where lands have been actually taken by homestead, pre-emption, or mining settlement to pay $1.25 per acre for their agricultural lands and the price of mining lands, $2.50 or $5 an acre, to the claimant and give them the money by the decree which gives the homesteader, the pre-emptor, and the miner the land upon which he has settled and the owner of the grant his money in lieu of the land.

The purpose of the committee seems to be to prevent the perpetration of frauds in the execution of this law. I say to-day it will give the opportunity to perpetrate more frauds than can possibly arise out of any other section of the bill if you allow this scrip to be issued. Fixing the Government price as the price which these claimants shall receive is not in consonance with my own ideas about the rights of parties who own land under the Mexican or Spanish titles. Strictly speaking, these persons would be entitled to their land. If they had a legal and valid grant they would be entitled to the whole of it, but in making this exception in favor of homestead and pre-emption and mining claimants I believe that the Government is only doing that which it does in every case where it exercises its right of eminent domain and appropriates private property to public use. This may be considered a roundabout way of getting at this question, but in the end it amounts to the same thing.

If the Government of the United States has taken a quarter-section out of a grant belonging to a claimant who has a valid title it is no more than the Government does whenever it exercises its right of eminent domain in any other case. Taking and selling lands belonging to one of these grants is virtually taking private property for public use.

Section 8 of my amendment brings us to the consideration of another question. In 1854 an act of Congress was passed which directed parties who had claims for lands under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo to take certain proceedings; it pointed out a certain mode and manner by which they could prove their title, by which they could get evidence of their title.

A paper is a mere evidence of title. The exception made in favor of these claimants I think is fair and just, because they have taken steps under the act of Congress which was passed for the purpose of allowing them to proceed, and it is unfair and unjust to require them to go to a court, beginning de novo, unless they so desire, and to adopt an entirely different manner of ascertaining and determining the exact rights to which they are entitled under their original grant. I believe that these cases ought to be saved for this reason: Here nearly thirty years have elapsed, and the act was passed, as I recollect it now, within one year after the final treaty was signed and agreed to at the city of Mexico. The treaty was adopted in 1853; the act was passed in 1854; and from that time to the present hour these claimants have been attempting to present and perfect the evidence of their title before Congress. I think that the Government of the United States is great enough to stand by its own acts, and not now resort to a new mode of determining these questions to the exclusion of the mode which was pointed out by the Government itself as far back as the year 1854. This is all I have to say upon that section.

I believe I have said that I am not in favor of the idea of a commission determining the question, because an adjudication by the courts is safer. It is safe, especially if we take my amendment and absolutely appeal all cases to the Supreme Court of the United States where the decree is adverse to the Government. Nothing can be better than that if the proceedings are allowed to go on according to the usual practice in courts of equity, free from the embarrassments always attending the construction of a new practice act.

But there are objections to this bill beyond those which I have mentioned, and which I have reserved for this time because they are objections which are insurmountable. The question as to the practice part of the bill may be explained and my objections may be overcome. The bill may be declaratory of what the practice would be without it, but upon these other questions there is something which can not be explained, something which can not be disposed of in a manner which will be satisfactory to my mind.

The principal remaining objection is to that provision which attempts to limit the grants mentioned in the bill to a certain number of leagues. That question has been so fully and so ably discussed that I will only mention it to the extent of placing myself right on the record and to say that I do not believe that the Congress of the United States should attempt to usurp judicial functions. These rights, whatever they may be, under the Spanish and Mexican laws must be measured by those laws; they can not be justly or legally curtailed or limited in any way whatever. We might grant more, but we can take nothing away.

I say that this is a question for judicial determination. It is a question that we ought not to consider in Congress. I have been surprised that the opponents of this part of the bill have been drawn into the discussion of what I conceive to be false issues, and have allowed themselves to be brought to the point of discussing whether a man had a right to more than eleven leagues under the Spanish or Mexican law. I do not believe that is a question which belongs to this forum. It has been the purpose of my amendment to open the door of the courts to the extent of allowing the United States to be made a party in order that these questions may be settled between the parties and the Government. In one of the sections of my amendment I have saved all the rights which may exist on the part of others not parties to the record, and I have provided that a privy to the record shall not be bound by the decree. This I have done, as I said before, intentionally.

Having said this much, I believe I have covered all the ground that I desired. I believe that I have fully and sufficiently explained the objections to the bill and the reasons why I favor the amendment drawn by myself. I am very clear that if the amendment had been adopted by the committee which had this matter in charge and had been presented to the Senate there would have been no objection whatever to its passage. The wisdom of the committee pointed out another course. So let it be. Whatever the action of Congress may be upon this matter, I am clear in regard to the theory of my amendment; clear that every case decided adversely to the Government should stand appealed to the Supreme Court without going through intermediate tribunals, believing that nothing short of a decree of that court will ever bring repose to the Government or the claimants.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] as a substitute for that of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CONGER].

Mr. BOWEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired on these amendments and on this bill with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], who has been called away from the city.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CAMDEN. I desire to announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. KENNA] with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. MILLER, of California. I desire to announce my pair with my colleague [Mr. FARLEY].

Mr. HAMPTON (after having voted in the negative). I find that I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], and I beg to withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. VEST (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS]. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. COKE. My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is necessarily absent, and is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 28; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAPHAM. I have been requested this morning by persons interested in this subject to offer this amendment: After the word "case," in line 45 of section 12, being the first line of the seventh subdivision of that section, insert "upon claims under the colonization laws of Mexico;" so as to read:

Seventh. No confirmation shall in any case upon claims under the colonization laws of Mexico be barred, &c.

Limiting the bar to that class of claims. It is unobjectionable, I am informed, if it is thus limited, and I am also informed that its provisions are designed only to reach that class. To save any question about it the parties interested desire that this qualification shall be made. If I remember, the honorable Senator having charge of this bill stated——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York will suspend and allow the amendment to be reported by the Secretary; and the Senator from New York will please give his attention, that he may see that the Secretary has the amendment exactly as he desires it.

The SECRETARY. In line 45, section 12, subdivision 7, after the word "case," it is proposed to insert the words "upon claims under the colonization laws of Mexico;" so as to read:

Seventh. No confirmation shall in any case upon claims under the colonization laws of Mexico be barred, &c.

Mr. LAPHAM. That is right. I was about saying that if I understood the honorable Senator having this bill in charge aright the other day it was stated that this bar was necessary with reference to that class of claims and designed only to reach that class.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the limitation will not be accepted. This objection was raised in the commencement of the debate. It was answered at some length, however imperfectly, by myself and by others, and I trust that the text of the bill, which has been well considered, will be allowed to stand without the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In line 17 of section 9 I move to strike out "respectively" and insert "in the State or Territory in which the land grant or claim for which scrip is issued shall be located."

The object of the amendment is to say what I understand the committee mean in this matter. No doubt this whole section should be stricken out; but it seems impossible to secure that, and therefore the location of this scrip should be limited to the State or Territory in which the land grant is located; and it should not be left for any misunderstanding or misinterpretation or judicial construction. If the committee mean that, as they do, then it is far better to place it beyond the reach of any sort of doubt by saying plainly what is meant.

Mr. BAYARD. This amendment in substance has been once received and voted down. An amendment was offered not precisely in the words but to the same effect, I think by the Senator from New York, "in which each claim shall exist." That has been voted upon by the Senate and the yeas and nays called for on it. I submit that the committee do understand precisely what the language they have used means, and they know the effect that was intended and will be produced by it, and we consider that effect to be much better furthered by the language of the committee than by the language suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. I trust, therefore, that as his amendment would be no improvement but would rather defeat and retard than advance the object of the committee, it will be rejected.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator did not explain how it would defeat or possibly retard the intention of the committee.

Mr. BAYARD. The committee have already used language which I respectfully submit is far more pertinent to effect their object than that offered by the Senator.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I understand the purpose of the committee is, and there can be no other, that the location of this scrip, which is a dangerous thing to allow to be used in any event, as the experience of the Land Department clearly illustrates, shall be confined to the State or Territory in which the land grant is situated.

Mr. BAYARD. The abuse heretofore complained of in regard to scrip is guarded against.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It is impossible to guard against the complications and frauds that will follow upon the issue of any scrip. I would not have suggested this amendment had I been aware of the fact that a similar amendment has been offered and voted down, but if it has been, I must say respectfully that in my judgment the Senate was wrong in voting down such an amendment. The Senator says the language of the bill is clearer. The word "respectively" is used, and I submit to the Senator that in this section where the word "respectively" is used no word "States" or "Territories" appears by direction or indirection, express or implied. I think there is only one section in this whole bill where the word "State" or "Territory" is used. I would suggest to my friend that under the term "respectively" there will be a very excellent opportunity for some claimant to come in and desire a judicial construction upon this matter. We have judicial constructions asked for and applications made to the Supreme Court of the United States in cases which have been far plainer as to the intent of the committee, and the Supreme Court of the United States have sought in many cases anxiously to find out what was intended by Congress when a doubtful expression was used, and then with great pleasure have decided against what was the apparent intention of Congress in the premises, and asked, "If Congress meant such a thing why did they not say so?" Now, it will make it plain to say that this scrip shall be located in no other State or Territory than that in which the land grant was located. Nothing can be plainer. There is no room for doubt or to call upon the Supreme Court to inquire what the language means. The word "respectively" is used in the bill, but as I say in this section of the bill neither "State" nor "Territory" nor anything indicating the State or Territory is used except the word "respectively;" and now I submit to my friend why is it not better to put in language which can admit of no doubt?

I know, of course, the great knowledge which the Committee on Private Land Claims has of the English language; I know that they have great facility for expressing just what they mean, but I know that this very same committee framed—I will not say they "framed," because some ingenious fellow is always framing this sort of a bill—they had in their charge a bill which they thought was perfectly right. My friend will recognize it when I tell him it was the bill in regard to the Dodge land scrip. They intended one thing, just as they intend it to-day; the committee intended one thing, just as he intends to-day. He passed his law. I presume, then, he would not have listened to any suggestion to amend it by making it plain. Oh, no; it was beneath the dignity of the Private Land Claims Committee to entertain any proposition of that kind, I suppose. That act went to the Land Office, and they expressly decided—justified undoubtedly by the language incorporated in the act—against what the committee intended and what the Congress of the United States intended. The only difficulty there was that some very shrewd gentleman drew that bill, and generally in these cases it is the man outside who draws the bill, who knows more than both branches of Congress inside. Such men generally know what they are seeking after, and, unfortunately, they generally accomplish it; and if it is necessary to get a hint from the recesses of the Supreme Court to do it, they are always sure to do it.

I want this thing distinctly understood now, because this question has got to be presented. The gentlemen who present this bill, the committee who report it, and the Congress that passes it should know the capability of the scrip issued under this act. I desire it distinctly understood that the object of my amendment is merely in furtherance of the intention of the committee, and I very much prefer that the intention of the committee should not be buried under a word which individuals outside interested or the Supreme Court may say means one thing or the other, or, what is most likely, is uncertain, because if Congress intended a certain thing they would have said so, as the court said in regard to the detection of the frauds on sugar. When this amendment says the scrip shall be located in the State or Territory in which the land grant is located it places beyond peradventure the right of the Mexican claimant who, under the bill as it stands, instead of entering land that may be worthless in New Mexico, will claim the right to enter it in the State of California, and locate his scrip there on valuable land.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator from Delaware would give me his attention for a moment.

Mr. BAYARD. I will do so with great pleasure.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to ask him if he thinks upon a careful inspection of the phraseology here that it is absolutely distinct that the scrip shall only be located in the States or Territories where the land grant exists? Let me read it. Speaking about this scrip:

> And shall be receivable, acre for acre, in payment for any public lands in either of said Territories or States respectively that may be subject to private entry at the minimum price.

There is nowhere in the section in which that language occurs any reference to States or Territories.

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator will look at the bill——

Mr. INGALLS. I refer to the section now, not to the whole bill.

Mr. BAYARD. The language is "in either of the said States or Territories respectively;" and I think it would be useless to substitute "in the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, or Utah, or within the States of Nevada or Colorado," because those are the only States and Territories and they are the States and Territories nominatim in the bill. There can be no possible extension of the right to locate this scrip except in the said States and Territories which are those very States and Territories named in the bill, and to which and which alone the bill applies.

Mr. INGALLS. But even with the interpretation which the Senator from Delaware suggests this scrip issued for land taken in New Mexico could unquestionably be located in Arizona or Utah.

Mr. BAYARD. Under the word "respectively?"

Mr. INGALLS. I think so.

Mr. BAYARD. How can it be?

Mr. INGALLS. Because the language as employed here simply applies the choice to the States or Territories referred to in the first section of the bill

Mr. BAYARD. "Respectively."

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, "respectively," but there is no declaration that the scrip shall only be located in any particular Territory where the excess has been taken by the United States, and I can see no objection, inasmuch as the language is susceptible of misconstruction or at least is not absolutely clear as to what the committee intend shall be the action of the Department in accepting this scheme, to using some language that shall carry out definitely the purpose of the committee. The Senator knows I do not desire to embarrass the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. We both desire evidently from this debate the same thing in the way of limitation as to the location of this land scrip to prevent its being floated all over the country and affecting any other land except that subject to private entry at the minimum price and within the named States and Territories. If the Senator thinks it will strengthen that limitation and restriction of the language to say "the said Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Arizona, or Utah," and then after the word "States" to say "of Nevada or Colorado"——

Mr. INGALLS. No, that leaves it worse than it is now, because that groups them together, and would amount to a declaration that the scrip might be interchangeably located.

Mr. BAYARD. With every desire to concur in the views and being always impressed by the intelligence of my friend from Kansas, I consider that we have used in the bill language which precisely accomplishes the object designed; and that is to limit the location of this land scrip to be issued in lieu of land of which the parties have been deprived, and to which the court say they would have been entitled, to the localities by name; that is to say, the Territories or the States respectively in which the land was said to exist. I know that there has been a very careful intent upon the part of the draughtsman of this bill to avoid the extension of this floating right. I believe that intent is fully accomplished by the language used, and so thinking I shall vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President, only a word more. The very fact that on this floor two such eminent gentlemen in the legal profession as the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Delaware disagree upon the interpretation of this word "respectively" and the applicability of this scrip makes it almost criminal, and it will make this body participant in some frauds to be perpetrated hereafter, if it does not stop to make this section so plain and explicit that it cannot be misunderstood. The word "respectively" is used. In the first section and second section are coupled together three or four Territories and two States. The Supreme Court would hold—probably the district court, but certainly the Supreme Court would hold—and take pleasure in holding—that the word "respectively" meant that this land scrip could be located in either of the States and Territories named in the bill and not in any other State or Territory of the Union where there was public land.

Now, I say to my friends in advance that if they succeed in passing this bill in this shape I shall consider it a misfortune, and it will open the door to that question, and the gentlemen who have scrip for thousands of acres in New Mexico will go to California and locate land, and they will claim the right under this law if they are given the right to locate it in the States or Territories "respectively," that is, as cut off from the other States and Territories of the Union where there may be public lands.

Surely there is doubt as to the application of this word in view of the experience of the past. This very committee have the experience of the past before them. They have weighed this bill, as they state, so well that not a comma must be changed, that not an "i" must be dotted or a "t" crossed, that nothing must be done; but I say to the gentlemen that they weighed the Dodge-scrip bill just as well as they weighed this, and that Dodge-scrip bill came in from this very exemplary committee and opened the door to this very thing. Whereas they intended that that land scrip should be located on land worth $1.25 an acre, it was located on land which the holders sell in the market for $25 and $30 an acre. My friend knows that fact and every member of the committee knows that fact. It was done in violation of the intelligence of the committee and of Congress. A little word inserted there would have saved all that; and yet if any gentleman in this body had possessed the hardihood to ask to interpose a word to make it clear and carry out the intention of the committee and of Congress I presume he would have been met by the same suggestion as now: "This committee have weighed every word, and therefore this bill must be right." The very fact that it admits of discussion here places us where we dare not vote for this bill unless it be made so sure, so certain, so strong that there shall be no trouble when it gets into the Land Department, where, careful as they may be, there are outside gentlemen interested who always find out the construction of a law intended to be given by the Department and avail themselves of the benefits of it.

I have a right to interpret this bill and to call attention to the facts and read its meaning in the light of a bill passed a few years ago on the report of the same committee which has been interpreted to mean different from what they intended, because in their wisdom they did not stop to insert one word which should have been placed in that bill.

Now, all I ask, and I have a right to ask it, is that this bill shall be made so plain that there can be no possible controversy. There is on the floor of the Senate a controversy now, and that controversy will be carried to the Land Department, and if necessary to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, if the committee mean by the language used here that the scrip to be issued shall be located only in that State or Territory in which the land grant lies, why do they object to a statement which makes it absolutely certain? Behind this there is something else, not with the committee understand me, but the same method and the same plan by obscurity of language which was used in the issuing of the Sioux scrip, the Dodge scrip, the Porterfield scrip, the Valentine scrip (which has been a source not only of annoyance but an instrument of the most obvious injustice of any law that has been passed in regard to land). My first objection to this bill arose from seeing this language in the bill, believing that it was uncertain, indefinite, and might be used for great wrong. For that I opposed the bill. For that on a former occasion I asked the Senate to consider an amendment similar to this, which would make it definite. Now, the very fact that this committee are unwilling to admit here in the Senate—and this is a Senate bill—a clause of any kind which shall make it certain that the scrip shall be used for the payment of lands only in that State or Territory in which the grant originally lay, is the most surprising thing in legislation that I have ever seen in the Senate. The gentleman in charge of the bill does not assert, and I venture to say dare not assert, that under this language the scrip issued for land failing in any one of the States and Territories mentioned in the bill may be located under this very language in either of the States or Territories mentioned in the bill. It is plain from what has been said here that in the minds of many Senators this language is indefinite and uncertain. Now, if the committee desire to have it definite and certain, why not say so and avoid an evil which seems apparent to many Senators. Is there such a love for this bantling in the minds of the committee that present it that no hair on its head must be straightened, no change in its dress must be attempted, no "t" crossed, no "i" dotted, and no point changed? Has it become so from custom or habit or form in this Senate that by an adherence to some custom a bill coming from a committee must not be changed even at the earnest request of a third of the Senators because the committee has made a certain choice of words?

In voting for this amendment and in voting against the bill, if I believed that this bill ever could pass the House in its present form; if I believed in its present form and language it could ever become a law, I would join with those who oppose its passage so earnestly as to wear it out until not only the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] should venture to say that the whole Senate was tired of it, but that the whole Senate should absolutely be tired of it, and let it die a natural death here rather than become a law to bring with it the wrongs and outrages upon citizens having some imperfect titles to lands which other bills reported from the same committee and other scrip authorized to be issued by this same committee have done until land scrips of that kind are obnoxious to the people of every Western State and Territory.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I shall make no objection to the amendment, for I find that it is only restating what I think is already in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska ask unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw his call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. BAYARD. I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the words "either of," on the ninth page, line 16, ought to be stricken out, so as to read: "Shall be receivable, acre for acre, in payment for any public lands in said Territories or States respectively that may be subject to private entry at the minimum price." The word "either" makes an ambiguity.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think that would make it still better.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be so modified. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays, which have been ordered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PLUMB. I wish to call attention to the fourth subdivision of section 12, on page 11, and with some misgivings I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware a question.

That subdivision reads as follows:

Fourth. No claim shall be allowed for any land the right to which has hitherto been lawfully acted upon and decided by Congress or under its authority.

The controlling word in that subdivision is the word "land;" it is not the grant. Congress has passed upon certain grants described and they have been located upon certain lands, but there is no prohibition in this bill anywhere contained, at least I can not find it on a very careful reading, to prevent the court from considering such grants over again. The limitation of the power of the court is simply that it shall not give land to anybody to whom Congress has heretofore given it or who has had it by reason of the authority of its grant.

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator look at the first section, at lines 12, 13, 14, and 15, and I think he will find his mind relieved on that subject.

Mr. PLUMB. But that describes only one particular class of grant, an incomplete grant.

Mr. BAYARD. The only kind the bill refers to.

Mr. PLUMB. That is very true; but Congress has made certain grants complete by its own action heretofore. Now, I have in mind a grant which I can not name, but the facts concerning which I remember very well, which was confirmed by Congress for a certain number of acres of land and no more. The people who owned that grant claimed that Congress did not give them land enough. The grant itself is a complete grant, perhaps. I confess I do not consider as settled the question of what the word "complete" or "incomplete" means. I am so much in doubt about it that I hope the courts, when they consider this bill, if it ever becomes a law, will be more certain about it than I am. But in that case there is still a claim, and it is a claim, perhaps, based upon an incomplete grant, which these people, I think, under this bill, would have the right to set up for other land than the land which was covered by the action of Congress. I would say that that clause should be amended so as to read:

No claim shall be allowed based upon any grant which has hitherto been lawfully acted upon and decided by Congress or under its authority.

In such a way that we could exclude entirely everything which has become the subject of action by Congress or by any other authority heretofore. I move to add, after the word "allowed," in line 28, the words "based upon any grant," and to strike out the words "for any land the right to;" so as to read:

No claim shall be allowed based upon any grant which has hitherto been lawfully acted upon and decided by Congress or under its authority.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, as the land must be the subject of the grant and as the obtaining of the land is the object of the law I trust that the amendment will not be adopted, for I think it would defeat the substantial meaning of the words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOWEN. I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware one question as to the effect of this bill. I ask whether it is the intention of the bill to allow this scrip to be located on land without conforming to the policy of the Government, which provides that the public lands shall be subject to pre-emption and homestead?

Mr. BAYARD. I think the restriction placed upon this land-scrip is the proper one; it is as narrow as possible consistent with equity and justice and a proper regard to the safety of other landholders.

Mr. BOWEN. The question I submit is whether or not this scrip can be located on lands without going through the formality of pre-emption?

Mr. BAYARD. The limitations have been carefully guarded and I think they ought not to be enlarged. The objection was made just now that they were too loose; now it is proposed to extend them. I trust the Senate will let the matter stand as it is.

Mr. BOWEN. I simply interposed the question, not desiring to speak. The land laws have favored homesteaders and pre-emptors, and I do not think the Congress of the United States ought to change this policy.

Mr. COKE. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the word "survey," in line 10 of section 1:

Or by virtue of possession or claim of title for such length of time and under such circumstances as would justify the presumption of a lawful grant.

This bill provides for "such lawful incomplete Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey as the United States are bound to recognize and confirm." I desire to add to that such titles as are evidenced by that sort of possession running long enough and accompanied by circumstances such as would justify a court in instructing a jury to presume a grant.

Unless this amendment is put in the bill there are a great number of persons in the territory embraced in it who together with their ancestry have lived upon lands perhaps fifty or one hundred years under titles emanating from Spain or Mexico, the evidences of which are to be found possibly, if at all, in Spain now, when there were no registration laws in that country under which they could be recorded, who will suffer great injustice. These persons have nothing now to show that they are entitled to this land but proof of this long-continued possession and enjoyment. This possession and enjoyment have in many cases been such that in any court in the world a jury would be instructed from the facts to presume that there was originally a lawful grant of the land from the sovereignty of the soil. Yet these are incomplete titles, there being no written or paper evidence of them. There are titles in Texas of this character, and the courts of that State, which was formerly under Spanish and Mexican domination, as the territory embraced in this bill was, have repeatedly presumed grants upon proof of long-continued possession and enjoyment under claim of title. Being incomplete titles, because of the absence of paper or written muniments, they will fall within the operation of this bill and require action under its provisions.

Yet when brought before the courts under the provisions of this act if it becomes law, the very provisions of this bill will condemn them, because no written grant can be produced, unless the amendment I propose shall be adopted. If the bill passes in its present shape many people whose ancestry for three or four generations may have lived and died upon the very land their descendants are now occupying may find themselves forever barred and excluded from it when in a court of competent jurisdiction they would be able to prove a perfect title; that is, to prove facts upon which the court would conclusively presume the existence of a good paper title. Many grants of land in the territory embraced in this bill, being a portion of the country acquired from Mexico, were made by the authorities of Spain, and the original or matrix of such titles it may be are to be found, if at all, only in that country, of which the testimony, unrecorded, has long since been lost, leaving the interested parties with no evidence of title. The amendment I offer is intended simply as a measure of justice to people thus situated, and to give them an opportunity of establishing their claims. In my judgment the bill as it now stands will cut them off, because its provisions limit the courts to the adjudication of written grants which can be produced in court.

I read from the bill:

SEC. 11. That all claims which are by the provisions of this act authori ed to be prosecuted shall, after three years from the taking effect of this act, if no petition in respect to the same shall have been filed as hereinbefore provided, be deemed and taken, in all courts and elsewhere, to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred.

The people to whom I refer will find themselves in this predicament: If they fail to prosecute their claims within three years will be barred and held to have abandoned their claims. If they do present them and undertake to prosecute them, being unable to show proper titles, will go out of court with the costs upon them, because the bill, unless my amendment or some other shall be adopted, restricts the court to the consideration of paper titles or regular written grants. The bill should be made to do full justice to all, and not be partial in its operation. The people in whose behalf I offer this amendment are simple pastoral people, natives of the Territory, and ought to be cared for, because little able to take care of themselves in a contest with speculators who will enter their lands if not prohibited in this bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. May I ask the Senator, are there many of that class to which he has been referring?

Mr. COKE. I imagine that there are quite a number of them.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Do I understand the Senator to say, and is it conceded on the face of this bill and by the acquiescence of the committee, that a large class of citizens occupying land in these Territories whose possession, or whatever their incipient claim may have been, at all events has ripened into a title which would be recognized by any court in Christendom, can be dispossessed without ever being heard in court?

Mr. COKE. I mean to say that whatever the intent of the bill may be, under its provisions it is my judgment that a great many of the most meritorious titles in this Territory will be defeated and nullified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, as I understand, this bill proposes to carry into effect and to perfect any title under the Mexican law, any such "grant, concession, warrant, or survey as the United States are bound to recognize and confirm by virtue of the treaties of cession." What does the treaty of cession provide for? It provides for property, and it provides for the inviolability of property, and the courts have decided that a right of action to land is property, an equitable title is property; and very carefully the bill goes on to provide that such persons may set forth in their petition the nature of their claim to the said land, "and particularly stating the date and form of the grant, concession, warrant, or order of survey under which they claim, by whom made, the name or names of any person or persons in possession of or claiming the same or any part thereof."

Then it provides for the character of the decree, and that decree shall "settle and determine the question of the validity of the title and the boundaries of the grant or claim presented for adjudication, according to the law of nations, the stipulations of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, at the city of Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d day of February, in the year of our Lord 1848, or the treaty concluded between the same powers at the city of Mexico, on the 30th day of December, in the year of our Lord 1853, and the laws and ordinances of the government from which it is alleged to have been derived, and all other questions properly arising between the claimants or other parties in the case and the United States, which decree shall in all cases refer to the treaty, law, or ordinance under which such claim is confirmed or rejected."

Under that I trust the Senator will not introduce and affirm a mere possessory title as against the Government of the United States. If the party has a claim under the Mexican law, whether it shall be by a verbal concession by a license which can be proved—I think that that is within the meaning of the word "concession"—he would be protected in his grant by the force of the law of the United States. It has been so in the courts of Texas, which was part of this Mexican territory.

Mr. COKE. The Senator will permit me to say that I have consulted several lawyers in this body, and the universal opinion is that such a title would not be embraced in the language of this bill; and this amendment of mine if the Senator is correct would simply make that certain and plain which otherwise would be ambiguous and doubtful.

Mr. BAYARD. An amendment very much in pari materia with this was offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB], which was debated and voted down. It proposes to protect these mere possessory titles and to raise a statute of limitation against the action of the United States. Against that I protested and ever will protest. I gave the rule, and the reason for that rule as laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States, why the United States as a sovereignty were not subject to the statute of limitations and why there was no imputation of laches upon them as there would be upon a private individual. The Senate, however, has passed upon this question on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

I may say further that that Senator has already sent to the Private Land Claims Committee a bill that looks to the relief of these small holders holding under possessory titles, that is to say, without written muniments, whose title is undoubted, who have held by descent and long occupation for a great period of time; and I for one shall be well content if, taking a practical view of their condition in our midst, a view that shall embrace the absence of formalities in the former law, the condition of an agrarian population living without those metes and bounds which a more civilized country impresses upon the holdings of land—I shall be very glad, I say, if a law can be framed that will be just to the Government and those who claim under the Government, that shall afford security to the possession of these small holdings. But I do not wish to see in a bill of this kind language used the effect of which I do not think we can fully contemplate.

Mr. HAWLEY. I then understand the Senator from Delaware to explain to us that this is not a bill "to provide for ascertaining and settling private land claims in certain States and Territories," but to provide for settling a few of them, leaving the weak and poor men to fight it out or to be barred forever at the end of three years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, this amendment goes a little further than the amendment which I proposed yesterday, and I think it is one that certainly ought to be adopted. There is no need of passing two bills for the purpose of enforcing the treaty which we entered into with the Republic of Mexico. We ought to provide for all classes of cases, because necessarily many of these claims may be adverse; and while it is provided in section 1 that adverse claimants may come in and object to the confirmation of title sought by the person seeking relief, at the same time there is no provision that the adverse claimant himself can finally prevail and have title vested in him unless he can set out in a petition the date and form of the grant, concession, warrant, or order of survey under which he claims and the name or names of any person or persons, &c. This language excludes by its terms the very class of cases which the Senator from Texas desires by his amendment to provide for, a class of claimants who are as meritorious with reference to the real equities they have as any class of people can be.

Some of these titles were derived, I have no doubt, from the Spanish authorities. The evidence of title is found in the Spanish records. They can not be found and translated and brought to this country by any reasonable process or at any reasonable expense. The people who would profit by them, and who are in possession under them, are not able to do this; they are perhaps not even cognizant of the fact that there was a title back of their possession. This has been going on so long a time that the question of a paper title has entirely disappeared from the minds of the persons who would be entitled to claim benefit under it, The amendment of the Senator from Texas would cover that class of cases, and it is a class that ought to be covered.

Take a person occupying a small tract of land which has been in possession of himself and his ancestors and grantors, I will say for four or five generations; an illiterate class of people they are, with no knowledge of the law; a class of people to whom possession has been amply sufficient, never desiring to sell their lands, and consequently never put on inquiry as to the evidence of their title—how are they to set up under the requirements of this bill the date and form of the grant under which they claim, if they know anything about there being any grant at all? Mr. President, that is absolutely impossible. In order to prevent injustice we must provide for some presumption to arise from continued possession.

The Senator from Delaware waves all this aside and says it will do for another bill. I suppose under that theory if we are to limit this bill to one particular and narrow class of subjects there must be another bill for each separate class of claims that may arise, so that we may have bills here ad infinitum. Either this is a bill to settle beyond future dispute all the claims which we have guaranteed to protect by our treaty, or it is a bill which ought not to become a law. The amendment which I proposed yesterday to embrace all rights and all titles which by the treaty we had obligated ourselves to protect and to ratify could have accomplished perhaps the same object with this amendment of the Senator from Texas; but either of them or both of them should be incorporated in this bill, in order that when the courts come to consider this question they may not only consider the incomplete titles which may be presented with the particularity provided for in the bill but also to consider the adverse possession, and in case the adverse possession has been of the kind named by the amendment of the Senator from Texas the title of the possessors should be affirmatively ratified and confirmed.

This is not a bill to quiet titles. It is a bill to disturb and to break up and to destroy titles. It is a bill in the interest of a peculiar class of people, the larger holders against the small holders and against the settlers. It is a bill in the interest of wrong and injustice as it stands, and not in the interest of justice or the obligation which we have incurred to these people by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE.]

Mr. PLUMB called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BAYARD (when Mr. LAMAR'S name was called). I understand the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. LAPHAM].

Mr. COKE (when Mr. MAXEY'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If he were here, my colleague would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. VEST (after having voted in the affirmative). I withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS], but had forgotten the fact when I voted.

Mr. CAMDEN. I desire to repeat the announcement that my colleague [Mr. KENNA] is paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. I make the announcement for the day.

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 23; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOWEN. I move to strike out section 11 of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The section will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is moved to strike out section 11, as follows:

SEC. 11. That all claims which are by the provisions of this act authorized to be prosecuted shall, after three years from the taking effect of this act, if no petition in respect to the same shall have been filed as hereinafter provided, be deemed and taken, in all courts and elsewhere, to be abandoned, and shall be forever barred: Provided, That minors, married women, and persons non compos mentis shall have one year after the removal of their respective disabilities within which to make their claims under the provisions of this act.

Mr. BOWEN. I do not desire to discuss the motion, but simply to say that one of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States provides that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law. "Due process of law" is not an act of Congress; it is well defined, and I will not stop to discuss that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAWLEY. If it be in order, as I suppose it is, I move to strike out the word "three" and insert "six" in section 11, line 2; so as to give people a little longer time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY].

The question being put, a division was called for; and the ayes were 12.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us have the yeas and nays on this.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

The result was announced—yeas 19, nays 24; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to amend section 9, line 16, by inserting, before the word "acre," being the first word in the line, the words "from actual settlers only;" so that this scrip shall not be planted upon the public lands as an instrument of speculation, but shall be limited in its use to those persons who seek to acquire pre-emption rights and may use it in payment for their land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will please repeat his amendment. The Secretary was unable to catch it.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to insert at the beginning of line 16, on page 9, section 9, the words "from actual settlers only." The section can be otherwise amended, if this be adopted, so as to make it in harmony with this idea, that this scrip shall not be used as a means of speculation on the public domain, but shall be used only by persons who are actual settlers on the public lands and will use it in payment for their holdings.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I am surprised at the persistency which is shown by certain Senators in regard to this provision for the issuing of scrip. Suppose the provision was for the payment of a dollar and a quarter an acre for all the lands which will be found upon judicial investigation to have been included in these Mexican and Spanish grants which have been granted away by the United States, then whenever that money was paid the owner of the grant or the party who received the money could take that money and purchase of the United States an acre of land for every one dollar and a quarter which he received in any of the States or Territories of the United States. If any amount of this proposed scrip should be issued under the provisions of this bill, instead of bringing ten or fifteen dollars an acre or twenty-five dollars an acre, it would not bring twenty-five cents an acre if put upon the market and sold or held for sale; and why? Because it can not be laid upon any land except such as has been a quarter of a century ago offered at public sale, and which has been in the market for a quarter of a century, more or less, subject to be bought at a dollar and a quarter an acre without settlement.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator from Oregon please name some particular tract of land or some State or Territory covered by this bill where public lands were offered for sale twenty-five years ago? I should be glad to be informed on that point. It would add to my stock of information as well as my surprise.

Mr. DOLPH. I ventured the statement a few days since that there was no land of this class in the Territory of Utah, and the Senator from Kansas rose almost immediately and repeated what I had said, and also said that he believed there was no land of this class, or there probably was no land of this class in any of the Territories mentioned in the bill. If so, then the provisions of the bill are inoperative. I took occasion to say when speaking on this question that I thought the restriction ought to be stricken out of the bill, and that this scrip ought to be allowed to be located on any of these lands wherever found in any of the States or Territories of the United States, because they were only isolated tracts of no great value, tracts that would not sell at private sale; and I repeat what I then said, and what the Senator must know is true, that any one man may purchase the whole body of the unoffered public lands at a dollar and a quarter an acre within twenty-four hours from this time.

Why the Senator should still express the fear that there is some fraud in connection with the proposed issue of this scrip or that it will be laid on lands which are or may be needed for homesteads or pre-emptions I can not understand. The truth is that no man would go on any of this class of land and take it as a homestead claim or take it as a pre-emption claim; that is, he would not so take it if he desired to obtain the title immediately or if he proposed to pay one dollar and a quarter for it at some future time. And why? Because he can go and take it now for cash, pay cash down and get the title at once. There is no necessity for him to make a claim under the homestead or pre-emption law or any other law of the United States which requires settlement on the land. From the very fact that these lands, wherever they may be situated, which are offered lands and which are subject to private entry, will not sell; they have been in the market for a quarter of a century and have not been sold. If there were 100,000 acres of this class of scrip on the market it would not be worth 25 cents an acre; it would not be worth its face, because the land is of a class that is not worth a dollar and a quarter an acre. If it was, it would have been taken up long since.

I think it was a mistake to confine the provisions of this section to lands within the States and Territories where the claim was situated for which the indemnity is given. I think we ought to have allowed the location of this scrip on any of the lands subject to private entry if there are any within the limits of the territory ceded by Mexico to the United States, and that we ought not to confine it to the artificial divisions of this territory which the United States alone has made in carving out of it States and organized Territories.

If I am correct, if this scrip when issued can only be laid on offered lands, if there has been no land put up at public sale within the last twenty or twenty-five years, if the class of land on which this scrip is to be located is not so valuable as to find a purchaser, although it has been in the market subject to private entry for a quarter of a century, what harm can arise from paying these people for those lands to which they are entitled, which have been granted away, in this scrip? They would rather have a dollar and a quarter an acre, for they could take the dollar and a quarter and keep the money or enter with it land anywhere within any of the land States or Territories. We are paying these people for this land under the provisions of this bill less than a dollar and a quarter an acre, as any man can see who is familiar with the laws relating to public lands and the provisions of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I think I can perhaps relieve the Senator from Oregon of some misapprehension he seems to have, that the people who get this scrip will in some way be wronged, by proposing at the proper time that they locate it in the State of Oregon. I think they can get some good land up there; and the Senator is so anxious about it, so representative of the wishes and interests of his constituents, that I have no doubt they will welcome them up there to large bodies, to the millions of acres they will get. That will let him out of the scrape at all events.

Mr. President, it is not necessary that this land should have been heretofore offered. The President of the United States may offer any of the lands of the United States to-day, if he chooses, at public sale; and when they are not sold, as of course they rarely are, they all then become subject to entry, to what is called private entry, and then they would all be located with this scrip. I think myself that there are no lands now subject to private entry. Suppose that the President never should offer any at public sale, and then there never should be any land that this scrip could be located on, what then would happen? There would simply have been a juggle. We should have been led to pass this bill under the impression that we were holding out something to the hope of these men and breaking it in fact, and then they would come and say, "We hold the dishonored promise of the Government of the United States;" and Congress would make haste, as has been done heretofore, to give them better land to locate the scrip upon and make it valuable, as it ought to be, if the promise is issued at all.

I am not specially apprehensive that these people will not get something for their scrip in the long run, and I am not specially desirous of encouraging speculation in the public domain, and I hope to have before this session is through the privilege of voting for a bill which shall prohibit the entry in large bodies of the public lands of the United States at private entry, either in the Southern States or elsewhere. What I aim at is not the question of the price of this scrip or its value in any particular, but simply the location of it in large bodies on the public lands in such a way as to withhold them from settlement. And so I propose simply that this scrip may be used by the pre-emptors or by the homesteaders who commute their entry in locating their claims on the public domain in such a way that the issuance of this scrip will not segregate these large bodies from the public domain and keep them out of the hands of settlers, but will go along with their settlement as money in their hands. If there is anybody who proposes to say that he prefers this shall be thus located as provided in the bill as it stands, that it shall be used as an instrument of speculation, that it is good policy to locate one hundred thousand or five hundred thousand or a million acres of the public land in a body, and let that much of the public domain go into the hands of a single individual, there is a very easy way of carrying out that idea by voting to keep the bill exactly as it is. If, on the other hand, somebody believes that it might not be put upon the public domain, but only used in payment of pre-emptions, he can vote to put it into the hands of the actual settlers. Most of the land that we shall recoup to these people is not worth 25 cents an acre to-day, and if the scrip which they get is worth a dollar and a quarter an acre they are ahead just a dollar an acre by virtue of this bill. You can buy to-day many of these grants at 25 cents an acre; you can buy particular sections of them probably for 10 cents an acre. I am told that the Atlantic and Pacific Railway Company, which has several millions of acres of land lying in New Mexico—that is claimed by it at all events, by reason of having built the road under the grant—offers its entire grant for 25 cents an acre, hill and dale, valley land, springs, everything complete all the way through. Under this bill it very conveniently happens that by reason of the grant to the railroad company we shall have at first a pleasurable duty to perform, to issue in lieu of the lands the railroad company got an amount of indemnity scrip to some of these claimants covering, my friend from Nebraska says, many thousands of acres at all events. Certainly large quantities of land are covered by railroad grants in the Territory of New Mexico, and in lieu of which we shall issue scrip to these people.

This bill improves in my estimation as I read it; it grows larger in its provisions. If the Senator from Oregon, who seems to have some bowels of compassion for these people, who are to lose their land by reason of the acts of the Government heretofore, and who are to be paid with scrip which they can locate on the public lands of the United States elsewhere, will read it very thoroughly, I think on the whole perhaps his sympathy will not be as active as it is now. It is a pretty good bill for the owners of the grants, a pretty good bill for the people who are entitled to take the benefit of its provisions, and they will get more out of it than they ever expected they would get out of any legislation on the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not care to notice the remarks which the Senator from Kansas has made in regard to my compassion for the claimants under Mexican and Spanish grants. I have already expressed my opinion in regard to this bill in an early stage of the discussion, and I do not care to repeat that opinion. I have no objection, if it meets with the approval of the Senate, that the gentleman shall extend the right to locate this scrip to land in Oregon, that is to say, lands in Oregon subject to private entry. The holders of the scrip would find when they reached Oregon that they had a very poor class of lands to locate their scrip upon, lands which the Government would do well if it could receive twenty-five cents an acre for the entire body of.

Now, that my statement may not rest on mere assertion, I desire to read briefly from a volume which has been before referred to, part 4 of the Compilation of the Public Land Commission, page 206, under the head of "Disposal of public lands by public offering and sale."

> In some of the early acts of Congress providing for bringing lands into market dates were fixed for the sales, and the superintendence of the sales was placed under the register of the land office or the governor or secretary of the Territory.

Then again on page 207—

> The President is not empowered to proclaim lands for sale not authorized to be exposed to public sale by law of Congress; the laws authorizing such sales have reference to particular localities therein mentioned. There is no general provision of law authorizing public sales of all the vacant lands of the Government, and a portion of the lands in the Far West, the Territory of Utah, for instance, is not subject to be proclaimed for sale.

I read again from page 415 of the same publication:

> Lands are sold at public sale after offering in the manner indicated in prior pages of this volume, but no lands can be entered at private sale unless they have first been offered at public sale. The area of lands that can be so entered is small and they lie in isolated tracts in various States and Territories, except the total area of surveyed offered public lands in the five Southern States of Alabama, Arkansas, Florida, Louisiana, and Mississippi, which can be purchased at any district land office in said States in legal subdivisions, having been duly offered under the act of Congress of June 22, 1876.

That is the class of lands in these five Southern States which were offered at public sale before the war, as I understand; during the war they were withdrawn from private sale, but by the act referred to they have been again restored to private entry as offered lands. So it appears that there is no general law under which the President can offer lands at public sale, that the right of private entry is confined to those lands which have been heretofore offered at public sale, and which have ever since the time they were offered at public sale been subject to private entry at a dollar and a quarter an acre, and have not found a purchaser in all that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 16, noes 18; not a quorum voting.

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted, and the Chair will count the Senate to save time, although the rule strictly requires a roll-call. [Counting.] The Chair believes a quorum is present.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS].

The roll-call was concluded, and the result announced—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bowen,	Cullom,	Lapham,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Dawes,	McMillan,	Van Wyck,
Cockrell,	George,	Mahone,	Wilson.
Coke,	Harrison,	Plumb,

NAYS—21.

Bayard,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Pendleton,
Blair,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Garland,	Lamar,	Voorhees.
Camden,	Gibson,	Manderson,
Colquitt,	Gorman,	Morgan,
Dolph,	Harris,	Morrill,

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Hale,	Maxey,	Sewell,

Cameron of Pa.,	Jones of Florida,	Platt,	Williams.
Farley,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Frye,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Groome,	McPherson,	Sabin,

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole will be reported.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that if no Senator desires to reserve for a separate vote an amendment the amendments be concurred in in gross.

Mr. VEST. By request of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON], who is unavoidably absent from the Senate and in accordance with my own personal opinion, I wish to vote for his amendment to the seventh subdivision of the twelfth section.

Mr. HARRIS. Is not that an amendment which was rejected in committee?

Mr. VEST. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Then after the committee amendments are disposed of it can be renewed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed in committee by the Senator from New Jersey was disagreed to, so that it is not now before the Senate. After the amendments made in Committee of the Whole shall have been disposed of it will be in order to offer the amendment again. Is there objection to taking the question in gross on the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole? The Chair hears none.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. VEST. Now I renew the amendment which was offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON]. In lines 46 and 47, on page 12, in the seventh subdivision of section 12, I move to strike out the words "for a greater quantity than eleven square leagues of land." I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. PLATT. I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], but as I think I should vote as he would vote if he were here, I vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB (after having voted in the affirmative). I believe I have voted as I should not have done. I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn, if there be no objection.

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—10.

Bowen,	Hawley,	Platt,	Vest.
Coke,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Conger,	Lapham,	Sawyer,

NAYS—29.

Bayard,	Dolph,	Harrison,	Pugh,
Blair,	Edmunds,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Butler,	Fair,	Lamar,	Saulsbury,
Call,	Garland,	McMillan,	Van Wyck,
Camden,	George,	Manderson,	Voorhees.
Cameron of Wis.,	Gibson,	Morgan,
Colquitt,	Gorman,	Morrill,
Cullom,	Harris,	Pendleton,

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Groome,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Allison,	Hale,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Anthony,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Slater,
Beck,	Hill,	Miller of Cal.,	Vance,
Brown,	Hoar,	Miller of N. Y.,	Walker,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Mitchell,	Williams,
Cockrell,	Jonas,	Palmer,	Wilson.
Dawes,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,
Farley,	Kenna,	Plumb,
Frye,	Logan,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PLUMB. I will propose the amendment which was voted on yesterday and failed by reason of a tie vote, modified somewhat, as an additional section to the bill. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That all the public lands of the United States in the Rio Grande Valley and elsewhere in the Territory of New Mexico and in the State of Colorado, occupied and possessed by persons who, or whose ancestors or grantors, became citizens of the United States by reason of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and occupied by any person or persons who have been in the actual bona fide occupancy or possession of said land, by themselves or their ancestors or grantors, for fifty years next preceding the date of the passage of this act, be, and the same are hereby, withdrawn from entry and sale under the laws of the United States; and it shall be the duty of the surveyor-general of New Mexico to investigate the rights of the parties claiming such parcels of land, and to report all the facts to the Secretary of the Interior. Said surveyor-general shall have power to summon witnesses, administer oaths, and take testimony relative to such occupancy or possession: Provided, That all claims under this act shall be filed with the said surveyor-general within two years after the passage of this act: And provided further, That no claim shall be so heard or examined exceeding eighty acres in quantity.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the Senator will say "this section" instead of "this act," the last time where the word "act" occurs: "All claims under this act shall be filed," &c.

Mr. PLUMB. I accept the correction. It should be "section" instead of "act."

Mr. BAYARD. That is the same amendment which was offered yesterday.

Mr. PLUMB. Only I have made a modification by which I have made the section correspond to what the surveyor-general may do to determine the rights of the parties. He only investigates and reports to the Secretary of the Interior. This simply maintains the status of these people who have been under discussion here on the public lands until such time as Congress can legislate in their behalf.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas modifies the amendment in the last proviso by changing the word "act" to "section;" so as to read:

Provided, That all claims under this section shall be filed, &c.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BAYARD. Let us have the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. I should vote "yea" if he were here.

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 22, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—22.

Blair,	George,	Lapham,	Ransom,
Bowen,	Harrison,	Logan,	Saulsbury,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Coke,	Hill,	Morgan,	Van Wyck.
Conger,	Jones of Florida,	Plumb,
Cullom,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,

NAYS—19.

Allison,	Dolph,	Gorman,	Morrill,
Bayard,	Edmunds,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Butler,	Fair,	Jackson,	Voorhees,
Camden,	Garland,	Lamar,	Wilson.
Colquitt,	Gibson,	Manderson,

ABSENT—35.

Aldrich,	Frye,	McPherson,	Sabin,
Anthony,	Groome,	Maxey,	Sewell,
Beck,	Hale,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman,
Brown,	Hampton,	Miller of N. Y.,	Slater,
Call,	Hoar,	Mitchell,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Jonas,	Pike,	Walker,
Dawes,	Kenna,	Platt,	Williams.
Farley,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. CONGER and Mr. HAWLEY called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK].

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. HAMPTON (when his name was called). As I have announced already, I am paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON]. I should vote "yea" if he were present.

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. JONAS]. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COKE. I was requested by my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] to state that he is paired on this bill with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—28.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Gorman,	McMillan,
Allison,	Dolph,	Harris,	Manderson,
Bayard,	Edmunds,	Harrison,	Morgan,
Blair,	Fair,	Hill,	Morrill,
Butler,	Garland,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Camden,	George,	Jones of Florida,	Ransom,
Colquitt,	Gibson,	Lamar,	Saulsbury.

NAYS—15.

Bowen,	Hawley,	Mahone,	Van Wyck,
Cameron of Wis.,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Lapham,	Sabin,	Wilson.
Conger,	Logan,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—33.

Anthony,	Groome,	Miller of Cal.,	Sherman,
Beck,	Hale,	Miller of N. Y.,	Slater,
Brown,	Hampton,	Mitchell,	Vance,
Call,	Hoar,	Palmer,	Vest,
Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,	Walker,
Cockrell,	Jonas,	Pike,	Williams.
Dawes,	Kenna,	Platt,
Farley,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,
Frye,	Maxey,	Sewell,

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is a little executive business that ought to be done.

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the motion if the Senator desires an executive session.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. ["No!" "No!"] There is some executive business that should be transacted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 9, noes 24; no quorum voting.

Mr. HARRIS. I renew the motion to adjourn. I believe that is in order.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 8, 1884.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for present consideration a resolution of inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection to its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to inform this House if any consul-general, consular agent, or other consular officer is indebted to the Government on account of fees received, trust funds, or from any other source, giving the name, position, the amount due the Government, and the length of time since such indebtedness accrued, and whether any such officer so in default is receiving pay for his services.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest that that resolution had better go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SHELLEY. If objection is made and it be necessary to refer it, I should prefer its reference to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I think that should go to the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department.

Mr. DINGLEY. It should go at all events to a committee.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the reference will be made as indicated by the gentleman from Alabama.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

REINHARD WAGNER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed:

Mr. BELMONT. I ask unanimous consent to present to the House for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether or not Congress has the power to regulate commerce between the United States and foreign nations by the imposition, in the form of Federal inspection laws, of any prohibition, hinderance, burden, or tax on American pork destined for exportation from any State, the said inspection laws being only intended to ascertain and attest the quality of such American pork, and not to enforce the inspection laws of any State of the United States or the general revenue and navigation requirements of the Federal Government, at the several ports of export, applicable to all merchandise to be exported. And, also, whether any State of the United States may not by its inspection laws, absolutely necessary for the purpose, require pork intended for exportation from that State to be inspected and marked by officers of such State, and levy a proper tax to defray the expenses of such inspection and marking.

Mr. CALKINS. I think that resolution had better go to a committee.

Mr. BELMONT. Objection being made to the present consideration of the resolution, I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LOAN OF TENTS TO SOLDIERS' REUNION.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to introduce and have put upon its passage at this time the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish tents for the fifth annual reunion of the soldiers and sailors of the Northwest, to be held at Chicago in the month of August, 1884.

Resolved, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to supply the soldiers and sailors' reunion at Chicago, Ill., to be held in August, A. D. 1884, such tents as can be conveniently spared, taking a sufficient bond for the return thereof, after the holding of the reunion, in as good condition as when received, all cost of transportation and other expenses to be borne by such reunion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 153) was read a first and second time, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IMPRISONMENT OF SEÑOR CARLOS AGÜERO.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to prevent the delivery of Señor Carlos Agüero, now in prison at Key West, Fla., and held for extradition on the demand of the Government of Spain under the treaty of extradition, until it shall be ascertained that the charges against him are true and that he is not held for political offenses; and that the President be requested to direct the Attorney-General of the United States to have an investigation of the case made, and if it shall be found that the said Señor Carlos Agüero has been arrested for political offenses alleged to have been committed in the island of Cuba, that he cause such proceedings to be had in conformity with law as will prevent the extradition of the said Señor Carlos Agüero.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, together with the proceedings of a meeting of Cuban citizens held at Key West. I also ask that those proceedings be printed in the RECORD with the resolution.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object to printing the proceedings of the meeting.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COBB. I call for the regular order.

Mr. FINERTY. I hope the call for the regular order will be withdrawn until I can submit a resolution for present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is called for; and this being Friday——

Mr. COBB. I will withdraw the call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The call for the regular order is withdrawn.

Mr. RANDALL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the "joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions," having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,

The following written statement accompanying the report was then read:

The managers on the part of the House on the conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the "joint resolution (H. Res. 119) making an appropriation for the relief of Lieut. A. W. Greely and his party, composing what is known as the Lady Franklin Bay expedition to the Arctic regions," submit the following written statement in explanation of the accompanying conference report:

The conference on the part of the two Houses have been unable to agree, the effect of which disagreement is to leave the joint resolution in the same condition as before.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
W. H. CALKINS.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the report be accepted and the fact communicated to the Senate; and I presume the Senate may ask for a further conference.

The report was then adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF WENDELL PHILLIPS.

Mr. FINERTY. I desire to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the death of Wendell Phillips has deprived America of an orator worthy to rank with her greatest, from Patrick Henry, of Virginia, to Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts; and

Whereas his life was an incessant and unselfish struggle for the liberty of mankind, irrespective of race, creed, country, or condition: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That it laments the death of Wendell Phillips as a national bereavement, which at once deprives the American rostrum of a superb intellect and human freedom of an advocate and friend.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution just read?

Mr. EATON. I object.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Perhaps there was some mistake in the matter of the objection to the resolution of my colleague [Mr. FINERTY].

The SPEAKER. There was no mistake; the gentleman rose in his place and objected.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. It is too late; there is a privileged report now before the House.

ELECTION CONTEST—CHALMERS VS. MANNING.

The SPEAKER. The resolution accompanying the report from the Committee on Elections will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the prima facie right to the seat in the contested-election case of J. R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. I move that the report be printed, and I ask that the minority of the committee may have leave to present their views in the case to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed and leave given to the minority to present their views for printing with the report of the majority.

Mr. COOK. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOK. When this case was referred to the Committee on Elections it embraced the question of the prima facie right of Mr. Chalmers and Mr. Manning to the seat in contest. The Committee on Elections is a unit upon the proposition that Mr. Chalmers is not entitled prima facie to the seat, holding no credentials. The committee is likewise a unit in the opinion that the credentials held by Mr. Manning are in due form and that he has been duly returned as the member-elect. The Committee on Elections are equally divided, upon a vote, upon the question of the prima facie right of Mr. Manning to the seat, notwithstanding his credentials are in due form.

The inquiry I desire to make is whether, inasmuch as the report just presented gives the views of those who believe that Mr. Manning should not be permitted to occupy the seat pending the contest notwithstanding his credentials, on the other hand have those of us who believe he is entitled to that seat the right to present our views without obtaining unanimous consent for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. If the committee is equally divided, the Chair would suppose that both sides had the right to present their views. But there is no difficulty about that, because there is no objection to the presentation of the views on the other side.

Mr. CURTIN. I send to the desk a resolution which I ask to have printed with the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CURTIN] asks unanimous consent to have printed with the report of the majority and the views of the minority a resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the question of a prima facie right to a seat on this floor involved in the contested-election case of James R. Chalmers vs. Van H. Manning, from the second Congressional district of the State of Mississippi, be recommitted to the Committee on Elections, with instructions to ascertain and report immediately to this House whether a certificate of election to the office of Representative from said district to the Forty-eighth Congress was issued by the proper authority, as required by the laws of the State of Mississippi and of the United States, to any one; and, if so, to whom.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the printing of this resolution with the report?

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Of course I have no desire in limine to antagonize any proposition which the gentleman from Pennsylvania may propose to submit to the House. But I respectfully suggest to him that the motion to recommit at this time is premature and extraordinary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania does not move to recommit, but simply asks, as the Chair understands, unanimous consent to have this resolution printed with the report of the majority and the views of the minority.

Mr. TURNER, of Georgia. Then I have no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania state the object of this? It is so unusual to accompany a report of this kind with anything except that which comes from the committee that I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to state the purpose. Otherwise I must object.

Mr. CURTIN. The object is that when this question is presented for consideration the House may be fully informed as to the course of action proposed by some members in reference to the case; and those who believe that General Manning has a right to the seat will have an opportunity to press for adoption this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KEIFER. It is unusual——

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

JAMES W. COLVILLE.

Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 4714) granting a pension to James W. Colville; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REPEAL OF TOBACCO TAXES.

Mr. BAYNE, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 4715) repealing all internal taxes on domestic tobacco; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Commiteee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

VIRGINIA ELECTION CONTEST—GARRISON VS. MAYO.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. LOWRY. I desire to present a report from the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. That is in order, notwithstanding the call for the regular order.

Mr. LOWRY. The Committee on Elections, having had under consideration the legal question involved in the prima facie right to a seat in the case of George D. Garrison against Robert T. Mayo, from the first district of Virginia, have instructed me to submit the report which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution appended to the report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the legal question involved in the case of Garrison vs. Mayo, the return of the governor, in the absence of anything appearing thereon or properly presented in connection therewith tending to impeach it, is conclusive as to the prima facie right; and that, pending the contest on the merits, the sitting member is therefore in this case entitled to retain the seat.

The SPEAKER. The report will be printed and will lie over. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I want to speak upon the proposition just presented.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ROBERTSON. I want to state that while, as a member of the Committee on Elections, I agree with the conclusion reached by the majority of the committee as stated in the resolution just read, I wholly dissent from the reasoning of the report; and I desire the privilege of submitting my views.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, leave will be granted to the minority of the committee to present their views——

Mr. ROBERTSON. As to the law of the case; that is all.

The SPEAKER. To be printed with the report of the majority. The Chairs hears no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded; and this being Friday——

Mr. COX, of New York. My colleague [Mr. ROGERS] has a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand. There is so much confusion on the floor this morning that it is almost impossible for the Chair to hear gentlemen addressing him.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR AMERICAN LEGATIONS.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 125) to provide each of the American legations abroad with one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is not a privileged matter——

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I call for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER. This is not a privileged matter; it does not relate to printing for the use of the House or the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. If the House is willing, I would like to call up the report of the Committee on Rules, that we may finish its consideration to-day.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter of privilege which, in the opinion of the Chair, comes up whenever the gentleman in charge of it thinks proper to call it up.

Mr. BAYNE. I hope my colleague [Mr. RANDALL] will not insist on bringing up that question to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. Why not?

Mr. BAYNE. Because Friday is the only day of the week assigned for the consideration of private bills; and these bills afford many citizens of this country the only redress they can possibly get from their Government.

Mr. RANDALL. This will take but a little while, otherwise I would not interfere.

Mr. BAYNE. It will in all probability take the most of the day.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is one of privilege raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL].

Mr. BAYNE. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The question then is, Will the House proceed to the consideration of the report from the Committee on the Rules?

The House divided; and there were—ayes 127, noes 23.

So the House determined to proceed with the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Rules.

AMENDMENT OF RULES.

The SPEAKER. The House resumes the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Rules, and the pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee to ascertain the result of the Tenth Census be appointed, to have the same number of members, duties, privileges, and power as the committee of the same name had in the last Congress; and that said committee be authorized to employ a clerk.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned it had divided on this amendment, but no quorum had voted. The proposition will again be submitted to the House.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 93, noes 51.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. There is evidently a quorum in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. We may as well have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 163, nays 91, not voting 66; as follows:

On motion of Mr. CALKINS, by unanimous consent the reading of the names was dispensed with.

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. BLANCHARD, on all political questions, until Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of New York, and Mr. RICE, on all political questions, from and including Wednesday, January 30, to February 8.

Mr. BUDD and Mr. GEORGE, on political questions, till further notice.

Mr. VAN EATON and Mr. HOUK.

Mr. MILLARD and Mr. POST of Pennsylvania, on all political questions, until this pair is withdrawn on notice from both parties.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, on all political questions, from February 5 to the 12th, inclusive.

Mr. BLACKBURN and Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, on all political questions, till further notice.

Mr. TOWNSHEND and Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois, for this day.

Mr. KETCHAM and Mr. WARNER of Ohio, on all political questions, till further notice.

Mr. CALDWELL and Mr. JOHN S. WISE, on political questions, for this day.

Mr. HILL and Mr. DUNHAM, until further notice.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is it necessary to move a reconsideration of that vote?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not necessary, this being only an amendment.

The Clerk will report the next amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SKINNER].

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE —. There shall be appointed by the Speaker at the beginning of each Congress a committee, consisting of fifteen members, eight members from the party in control of the organization and seven members from the opposition, to be known as the Executive Committee of the House of Representatives. It shall be the duty of said committee to consider all bills which may be reported favorably from any other of the standing committees of the House, and to determine which of said bills shall have preference in being brought before the House for consideration. In the order of such preference such bills shall be reported to the House without amendment and placed upon a calendar to be known as the Executive Calendar. And it shall be in order at any time after the reading of the Journal and expiration of the morning hour for the chairman of such executive committee, or any member thereof when acting under the instruction of said committee, to call up any bill upon the said executive calendar for consideration. If his said motion be sustained by a majority vote of a quorum present the bill shall be considered under consideration. The said executive committee shall fix the time to be allowed for debate upon each bill so reported, and such time shall not be extended except by a majority vote of a quorum present. At the expiration of said time so fixed or extended a vote shall be taken upon the question without further debate. Nothing in this rule shall prevent the offer of amendments to the bill when under consideration or to interfere with the preference already given to the consideration of appropriation or revenue bills or to prevent the consideration of any of the other calendars of the House, whenever the House may so direct.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WELLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to Rule XXI by addition of section 7:

"SEC. 7. That no bill before the House shall be brought up for final action until a copy of such bill, with copy of the committee's report thereon, has been put on the desk of each member on the day on which final action is sought."

The question was taken; and the Speaker decided that the amendment was lost.

Mr. WELLER. I ask a division. I would like to have that reported again, for there are many gentlemen around me here inquiring, what is it? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the amendment will be again reported.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I object.

Mr. WELLER. I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were ayes 2.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand a further count?

Mr. WELLER. I think under the circumstances it is useless to demand a further count, but I am astonished at the action of the House upon that. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The amendment is rejected. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

The Clerk read as follows:

Whenever the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and a bill is reached for consideration, and before its consideration is begun, one motion may be made that the committee lay that bill aside and take up any other on that Calendar; which motion shall be decided by a majority of the committee without debate.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask leave to withdraw that resolution, and shall favor number 6 of the proposition of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], which reaches the same result, and I do not wish to come in conflict with it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw the amendment before a vote is taken.

The Clerk will report the next amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD].

The Clerk read as follows:

That each Representative, except the chairmen of standing or select committees which have a clerk, may appoint a clerk, to serve during the session of Congress, who shall perform such clerical work as may be assigned to him in aid of the discharge of his official duties, and shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 11 of Rule XXXIV the word "Congress," after the words "ex-members of," and insert the words "the House of Representatives."

Mr. COSGROVE. I would like before the question is taken upon that amendment to have the rule of the Senate bearing upon this question read also.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would be in the nature of debate, but will submit the question to the House.

Mr. HERBERT. Let the amendment be read again and the rule as it will stand if amended.

The SPEAKER. That had better be done.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 11 of Rule XXXIV the word "Congress," after the words "ex-members of," and insert the words "the House of Representatives;" so that it will read:

"The persons hereinafter named, and none other, shall be admitted to the Hall of the House or rooms leading thereto, namely: The President and Vice-President of the United States and their private secretaries, judges of the Supreme Court, members of Congress and members-elect, contestants in election cases during the pendency of their cases in the House, the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, heads of Departments, foreign ministers, governors of States, the Architect of the Capitol, the Librarian of Congress and his assistant in charge of the law library, such persons as have by name received the thanks of Congress, ex-members of the House of Representatives who are not interested in any claim or directly in any bill pending before Congress, and clerks of committees when business from their committee is under consideration; and it shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain a request for the suspension of this rule or to present from the chair the request of any member for unanimous consent."

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like to ask if that would exclude ex-members of the Senate?

Mr. COSGROVE. That is the intention. They refuse that courtesy to ex-members of the House.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to know whether the rules of the Senate exclude ex-members of the House.

Mr. COSGROVE. They do.

The SPEAKER. This is not debatable. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri to have the Senate rule upon this subject read?

Objection was made.

The question was taken. The House divided; and there were—ayes 109, noes 23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. By instructions of the Committee on Appropriations I report a bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes. I do this in behalf of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUTCHINS], who is unavoidably absent on account of sickness. In his behalf I also give notice that he will call up this bill, if physically able to do so, for consideration on Tuesday next.

The bill was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALKINS. I give notice that I reserve all points of order upon the bill.

THE RULES.

The SPEAKER. All of the proposed amendments to the rules have now been voted upon except that offered by the gentleman from Maine, and upon that and the original report of the committee there remain fifty-six minutes' time for debate.

Mr. RANDALL. Twenty-six minutes of that time will be under the control of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. I will suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he occupy a part of his time now and then yield to me.

Mr. RANDALL. I have a very few remarks to make, and prefer to close the debate.

Mr. REED. I yield first to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. MILLS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] on yesterday very well remarked that the rules of the House had much to do with determining the question of the comfort of its members. He might have gone further and said that the rules of the House had very much to do with determining the business of the House.

All parliamentary rules, as I understand, Mr. Speaker, are made to enable the legislative assembly to declare its will. That is the primary object of all rules. I hold in my hands a volume, carefully prepared, of some thousand pages. The celebrated author who has labored through the whole of this volume telling us how a legislative assembly ought to be organized, how it ought to preserve order, on what line it should move to transact its business, what should be privileged questions and what not, and all the other questions that can arise in a legislative assembly, concludes the volume with this striking sentence, which, to emphasize, he places on a page by itself and puts in capitals:

In concluding the foregoing work on parliamentary law and practice the author may be allowed to suggest that THE GREAT PURPOSE OF ALL THE RULES AND FORMS BY WHICH THE BUSINESS OF A LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY IS CONDUCTED, WHETHER CONSTITUTIONAL, LEGAL, OR PARLIAMENTARY IN THEIR ORIGIN, IS TO SUBSERVE THE WILL OF THE ASSEMBLY RATHER THAN TO RESTRAIN IT; TO FACILITATE, AND NOT TO OBSTRUCT THE EXPRESSION OF ITS DELIBERATE SENSE.

Unfortunately for this Congress since I have been a member of it during the last ten years its rules under both parties have been the reverse of the principle laid down by Mr. Cushing in his Parliamentary Manual. Not only are they so, but they have been claimed to be so by the advocates of these rules who have made them as they are. They have been claimed to be made chiefly for the merit that they obstruct the crystallization of the will of the House into law.

There is a sort of self-asserted superiority in some members of the House over all the others. They seem to fear if the will of the majority is facilitated in finding expression that some great disaster will befall the Republic. Now, I feel that every gentleman on this floor is the equal of every other; and I do not want any one gentleman on this floor to take upon himself more than one three-hundred-and-twenty-fifth portion of the responsibility that rests upon the House. Each one of our constituencies has selected us to come here and represent their interests; and it is right that this House should so make rules that the will of the majority should be made into law so far as this House has it in its power to make it.

For that reason I like the amendment of the gentleman from Maine much better than the report of the Committee on Rules. Look at this volume [holding up a printed calendar]; this is the unfinished business that remained in this House at the close of the Forty-seventh Congress. It embraces nine hundred and fifty bills reported favorably. And that is not all. If you will look into the reports of this book of calendars of this House you will find there has been report after report on the same case year after year, Congress after Congress; and under the workings of these rules, made to restrict you and prevent you from passing these bills into law, they died upon your calendar.

Why, Mr. Speaker, I passed through the last House a bill that came into this House twenty-odd years ago. It had never received anything but a unanimous approval of every committee that had considered it; one time in the Senate and all the other times in this House. Yet it never became a law till the last Congress.

Now is that the way to treat the people of the United States who have claims for the consideration of the Government? Is it right for us to pile up all these claims and report them favorably year after year to Congress and yet provide a way by which they shall never become law? Yet that is what your rules do.

What wrong can there be in allowing a committee to come into the House in the morning hour and ask to call up a certain bill on which they all agree and have it considered? I believe every committee of the House can be trusted. I believe every man in this House can be trusted as much as I can be. I do not arrogate to myself more political virtue than I am willing to concede to other members of this House. But I want to take one three-hundred-and-twenty-fifth part of the responsibility for the action of this House on my shoulders, and I do not want any one gentleman to take the responsibility of half a dozen on his.

What is the object of having the rules in this form? The great object is to keep somebody from getting through a bill for some public building. Somebody is afraid that there will be some bills passed to build court-houses or custom-houses or something of the kind. That is what they are striking at. This calendar has upon it bills for twenty-five or thirty of these buildings in this great Republic. And almost the only way to get any of them through is by unanimous consent. After you get beyond the boundary of tariff legislation and appropriation bills and great measures of that class, all the other measures before this House come under the head of unanimous-consent legislation. And I have seen gentlemen almost get on their knees in front of one man who had the power of withholding unanimous consent, who had the power to slaughter a bill unanimously reported by a committee; and that man sat like a czar of Russia, holding in his hands the power of stopping that legislation, and tears and entreaty could not avail to get him to give his consent that that bill should become law. That such a power should exist in the hands of one man is a disgrace to a legislative assembly composed of members who are the representatives of a free people.

These rules are autocratic, oligarchic, plutocratic, and not democratic. They ought to be changed, and the amendment offered by my friend from Maine [Mr. REED] does give an opportunity occasionally for a bill to be reached wherever a committee who has had it under consideration comes before the House and asks to have it put upon its passage. To that extent it is a benefit, and I think we ought to favor it.

Mr. REED. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] for five minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. In the last Congress I favored this amendment to the standing rules of the House of Representatives. The central idea of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is that the majority of the House may do such business as it shall decide ought to be done in preference to other business that may happen to come first upon some of our calendars. We upon this side of the House who favor the proposition recognize the fact that in so far as there may be any political legislation we are not to have the benefit of the adoption of this proposed change in the rules. But it is our duty to look what is for the general interest of prompt and correct legislation.

I do not believe and never have believed that the power which is given to us by the second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, to determine the rules of proceedings here, ever was given for the purpose of authorizing the House to make rules by which a majority of the House can not transact its business. The whole idea was to facilitate the transaction of business by the majority of the House, which is the basis of all republicanism; to enable the majority to proceed with the consideration and transaction of such business as it was intended it should do.

As has been very well and strongly said by my colleague on the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], we ought to decide what particular things we should do in preference to the great mass of business which we can not and perhaps ought not to undertake to transact. If it were possible to get through with all the great mass of business which is presented for the consideration of Congress, to get through it at all, then we might possibly work under such rules as we now have.

We have three calendars. One is the calendar to which is referred all matters of revenue or of appropriation, the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; then we have the House Calendar, to which is referred those public matters which do not involve appropriations or the raising of revenue; then we have a third calendar, known as the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, to which we send all business of a private nature. These three calendars soon become lumbered up with business, which is taken up now, under our present rules, in the order in which the bills are presented on either of them.

Sometimes, as I have known, a disputed matter is reached, a matter of no great importance, on a private calendar perhaps, and days and weeks are passed in its consideration before it is disposed of, when there may be on that calendar immediately after this disputed matter meritorious measures which could be passed in five minutes without dispute if they could be reached. Some one may be interested in the first one reached, and we have gone on day after day discussing some purely private matter before that is disposed of.

On the House Calendar as well as on the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union there may be matters which are never reached, and, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has said, Congress adjourns with meritorious measures pending which have not been reached at all, although practically every member on the floor of the House may be in favor of such legislation.

I myself am not afraid of legislation. I believe that that provision in the Constitution of the United States which gives to every American citizen the right to petition the Congress of the United States for redress of grievances was intended to allow such petitions to be presented to a legislative body which would be able to grant the relief asked, if upon consideration it should be deemed proper to do so. But we are now, as we have been for some years, working under a system of rules which renders it absolutely impossible for us to grant the redress and relief which we may be willing to do.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KEIFER. I would like a little more time.

Mr. REED. Will three minutes more be enough?

Mr. KEIFER. That will be enough.

Mr. REED. I yield to the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. KEIFER. I will occupy that time in speaking of the proposed amendment. It will be noticed that by that amendment committees making reports within the morning hour can ask the House to consider within that hour only such business as belongs to the House Calendar and as the committee itself may deem to be of such importance as should be considered at once. The system as proposed by the gentleman from Maine is one of harmony.

When under that system we come to deal with business upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union the power is given to the majority of the House, when a motion is made to go into Committee of the Whole, to designate by a majority vote the particular bill on that calendar which shall be taken up and considered, provided the committee reporting that bill shall state it to be of such importance as to be at once considered.

As under our present system, Friday of each week is given for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, by this proposed amendment there will be worked out a complete system of transacting business. No bill reported back from a committee which under the rules should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union or to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar can be designated for consideration during the morning hour, because preference is given to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar on each Friday.

Then also, what I consider of the highest importance, the Committee on the District of Columbia, which must have all its legislation completed during a Congress, is given two days in each month, on which days that committee can call up for consideration any business reported from it. Thus it will be seen the proposed system is one that is perfectly harmonious and which looks to the proper and prompt transaction of business.

Mr. REED. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] for five minutes.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose, from the experience I have had in this House, that any rules we may adopt will enable us to transact the whole business of the House or to investigate and pass upon all bills which may be introduced and reported. The difficulty is not so much on account of the rules as it is due to the fact that for five or six months we are engaged here in considering and making reports from committees, when we necessarily adjourn; and then there comes the short session, the shortness of which absolutely forbids us from taking up the business which has been prepared at the first session. If this difficulty could be remedied the objection of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] would be very largely removed.

But, sir, we are called to consider how we shall do, with expedition and dispatch, the business that we can do; and in this view of the question, with my experience here, I think the system which was in existence before the adoption of the present rules was better than the existing system. I believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will expedite business and diminish the great vice under which we are laboring of being compelled either to call up bills and pass them by unanimous consent, or as the only alternative to ask a suspension of the rules by a two-thirds vote in order to pass bills.

We have a House Calendar; but I undertake to say that during the last two sessions of Congress that calendar has never been reached—never so far as I know. It is only at this session that the House Calendar has ever been taken up at all, according to my recollection.

Formerly the difficulty was in making reports and getting action upon them; and the amendment of the gentleman from Maine cures that difficulty to some extent. Formerly we got locked up in the morning hour. A bill would sometimes occupy that hour day after day for weeks or months if there was much opposition to it. Under the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, if the House thinks fit, after the expiration of the morning hour, to go on with the reports of a committee, it can do so during the remainder of the day.

I think, sir, that a still better system would be that we should have days set apart for the consideration of the House Calendar, as we now assign one day in every week for the Private Calendar, days on which the business of the House Calendar could not be set aside except by a two-thirds vote. Why, sir, it seems to me an anomaly in legislation that we have one day in every week set apart in this House for the consideration of private business involving the interests of private individuals, but the public business has no day upon which it may not be excluded by privileged questions or other questions overriding it and setting it aside.

According to my view the proposition of the gentleman from Maine will give us an outlet for the immense number of reports now made here and which are still to accumulate. We can dispose of some of them. There is much routine legislation that requires but little time or consideration if we once get at it; and we could do this under this proposed rule to some extent, whereas now our calendars are so crowded that they are never taken up; and the only possibility of having a bill passed, though it be on the calendar, is to annoy the Speaker for recognition and to seek the passage of the bill by unanimous consent; a most vicious system of legislation, which ought never to be resorted to when it can be avoided.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the trouble under the old plan, which it is now proposed to revive, was not that measures being reported during the morning hour for present consideration, they sometimes occupied that hour day after day for two or three months?

Mr. BUCKNER. That is an objection which this rule proposes to obviate by allowing the House to go on after the expiration of the morning hour, not for the presentation of new reports, but for the consideration of a measure which has been reported.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will not that require unanimous consent?

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. HERBERT. This proposition provides that when the consideration of a matter is begun in the morning hour it may continue during the whole day unless the House by an affirmative vote decides otherwise.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. REED. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND. I think that any member of this House who has been here since the adoption of these new rules will agree with me that the only means necessary to break them down and show that they are a farce is for some gentleman to stand here and object when unanimous consent is desired. If that be done—and I hope some gentleman will do that if these rules are continued—it will be shown that the rules we are operating under to-day are a farce. These rules seem to contemplate that all we meet here for is to raise revenue and appropriate it; that all other legislation is wholly unnecessary. I appeal to new members to mark the prediction, that if we continue the rules as they now are we shall find the calendars lumbered up with the same bills and the same reports as in the last Congress; and in the next Congress precisely the same bills and the same reports will appear on our calendars without any action being taken on any of them. I dare say it is within the observation of new members here to-day that they are constantly presenting the same bills and reports which have been presented in the last Congress. Why? Because there is no time to consider these reports. You never reach that House Calendar except by unanimous consent. You never legislate except on privileged reports from the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee on Rules, or some other committee which is given this precedence in reference to our legislation. Now, we are sent here by our constituents with the idea there is to be legislation, either affirmative or negative legislation, to repeal bad laws and to enact good laws, but we can not do either; we can not get rid of bad laws or enact good ones under these rules as they stand. The whole time of the House is taken up by consideration of privileged reports and the business of privileged committees. If there should happen to be a committee in this House that has this privilege and desires to interfere with our legislation for that purpose they have the right to take up the time of the House in the consideration of such measures as they deem necessary, and thus prevent the consideration of measures which other members desire to have heard here.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] is in nearly all respects, or at least it is in the main, the rule we had before the adoption of these new rules, and which provided when a committee made a report that then and there that report might be considered in the morning hour. And what was the effect of it? A committee that had an important subject which it wished to present to the House would select it out from the others before that committee, a subject more important than all others in demanding legislation. I say that committee had the power to select that subject and present it to the House and compel its consideration. That placed the committees in the House not on equality, but to some extent upon an equality in having their measures considered. Under our present rules there is no committee in this House that can have a bill considered unless it has the power of reporting as a question of privilege, and hence it is that bad laws are continued and good laws which ought to be enacted are deferred, and the whole time of this House is taken up in considering privileged reports from privileged committees and such matters as may come up by unanimous consent presented by those who can get that unanimous consent by importuning the Speaker.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REED. How much of my time is there left?

The SPEAKER. Four minutes.

Mr. REED. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I be allowed to reserve those four minutes until something is said on the other side.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want a few minutes, and I wish to wind up the debate, as that is my privilege.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to close, but to take my four minutes after some objections have been made.

Mr. RANDALL. I will make the concluding remarks which I intend, and then ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REED. Very well; I will say all I have to say now.

I can not hope, Mr. Speaker, in four minutes to add anything of importance to the suggestions I had the honor to make to the House the other day. I desire to say, by way of recapitulation, I do not regard the proposition I make to this House as anything in the nature of a panacea, and I do not believe it will cure all the evils and make us live happily ever afterward [laughter], but I do believe it will be a great assistance to the House on the true principle upon which every House ought to conduct itself, namely, that the majority thereof shall control its business.

Now, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMPSON] has made a suggestion I desire to answer, and that is, will not the adoption of the morning hour lead to a clog? If the morning hour was at sixty minutes, as perhaps he recollects it was in the Forty-fifth Congress, or some of us do, then it will be a clog; but, extended as long as the House chooses, it can no more be a clog than special assignments can be a clog to the business of the House. In other words, if the House is fully prepared to deal with a measure the House can go on and finish it, and no measure can take forever, so the House need not imagine there is going to be a great clog.

Further than that, I desire to say that my proposition does not open the flood-gates of legislation by any manner of means. On the contrary there is no physical possibility of doing the great majority of our legislation. The single object of my amendment is to make a selection, and I maintain the system I propose makes a selection in a better way. I doubt if there will be any more legislation passed, but I believe a better class of legislation, one worthier of the House, will receive its attention. And I do not anticipate any great increase of legislation by it; but I do anticipate an enlargement of the right of the members of the House to such an extent that those bills which the House considers worthy will receive attention.

And allow me to say that this system which I propose is a definite system. It is to be taken, in my judgment, as a whole, and as a whole it will be found to work harmoniously and produce some good results. It has the advantage also of having been practically tested in other Congresses prior to the Forty-sixth, and was not found to result in any serious difficulty or produce any public injury.

Mr. HERBERT. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine whether his system does not provide that no legislation can be selected—no bill advanced on the calendar—except by the direction of a committee?

Mr. REED. It does. Now I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that the difficulty which it is proposed to remedy by this amendment to the rules is not applicable alone to ourselves but lies at the base of every parliamentary system——

Mr. HERBERT. Let me say that I favor the proposition of the gentleman and believe it will produce good results.

Mr. REED. Some members object to it; but, as I have stated, it is to be applied as a remedy to a difficulty which exists in all parliamentary systems that can not do their whole business; and while this proposition can not accomplish all that could be desired, still it goes in that direction and will afford somewhat of a solution of the difficulty.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I will endeavor to be very brief. Under the operation of the old rule objection was made that bills were hidden in the committees. The Committee on Rules, then, recognizing the fact that every bill should have a report as far as practicable, changed that rule and provided for calendars, so that each bill when introduced might come in its order to the consideration of the House. The difficulty then was that bills in the manner now proposed by this amendment were injected into the morning hour and were kept there to the exclusion or obstruction of any other business. I deny that under the existing rules of the House the majority of this House can not reach any business it may desire to reach if the subject to which it relates has been reported upon by a committee. This House provided that if a bill was to be taken out of its order, that displacement should be done by a recorded vote in the House; and that important measures could not be taken out of their order and displaced by bills which had secured a momentum, either by the extent of the appropriation embraced in them or by the industrious methods of people who surrounded this building to secure consideration of such measures, thus giving them power to militate against matters of legislation in the interest of people who were not so well able to reach the ears of members as they.

The whole burden of the argument in the House to-day in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine is that this House does not get through with its businesss. I agree with the gentleman from Maine that such is the case, for the reason, as he knows and as the House knows, that it would be a physical impossibility to do so. But a change in the rules will not alter that. An examination of the number of bills and joint resolutions introduced and their growth in numbers for a few Congresses back will be of interest in this connection. We find that in the Thirty-eighth Congress there were 813 bills and 182 joint resolutions, making a total of 995 bills. That number increased in the Thirty-ninth Congress to 1,539 bills and joint resolutions, and in subsequent Congresses the number increased as follows:

Congress.	Bills.	Resolutions.	Total.
Fortieth	2,021	476	2,499
Forty-first	3,093	522	3,613
Forty-second	4,073	203	4,276
Forty-third	4,891	162	5,053
Forty-fourth	4,708	196	4,904
Forty-fifth	6,549	250	6,799
Forty-sixth	7,257	419	7,676
Forty-seventh	7,635	367	8,052

In the Forty-seventh Congress, therefore, if you include the bills which originated in the Senate, the total number was probably not short of 10,000. It must be apparent, therefore, to the House that no rule can remedy that condition of affairs. The only possible remedy is in legislation. The only remedy would be that which would take from this House matters relating to war claims, that would take from its consideration matters relating to claims of a private character against the Government, and remit all such to a judicial tribunal. Another remedy would be with reference to the pension bills. These, if taken from the jurisdiction of the House, all of these bills which come here on appeal from the decision of the Department, if referred to some other tribunal, to a court having authority to examine and report upon them, would relieve the House of a vast amount of labor.

The effect of this amendment is in my judgment to give preference to bills behind which there is that description of motive power of which I have before spoken. If we are to appropriate money, if we are to consider bills of that character, let them come in the order in which they appear on the calendars. Do not let us, either by combination of circumstances or by sudden impulse, vote to take from the calendar at the instance of a mere majority of a committee of this House these bills and give them an advantage of consideration over those that have not money in them to promote their passage.

The gentleman from Maine has stated that only 8 per cent. of the bills introduced became laws. That is because this enormous increase from 990 in the Thirty-eighth Congress to 10,000 in the last Congress makes it utterly and physically impossible to get to the consideration, if his figures be correct, of more than 8 per cent. of them, no matter how essential they may be in many instances to the public service. But incidentally here I want to say further that from observation I am induced to believe that 95 per cent. of all the legislation of this House has behind it the motive power of money, either immediately or else in the early future.

I do say that this proposition will open the doors of the Treasury wider than I think they ought to be opened. I do not believe that this proposition is in the interest of economy. I do believe that it is in the interest and promotive of extravagant expenditure of the public money. And I recognize the fact that one of the motives that the people had in filling these seats about me was that we should exhibit what they wanted in our acts here—reform and economy in the public expenditures of money. And I am proud to say, Mr. Speaker, that as far as I am able now to know, your appointments are likely to promote that view of the people.

Hence it is that I say this is not a step in the right direction; that in fact it is a step in the wrong direction. My honorable friend here from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] who has under his especial care legislation for reform and reduction of the tariff, and I who stand here with others in favor of the abrogation of internal taxation, or men on that side from my own State who declare for a division among the States of a surplus, may give up, if this rule is permitted to have its legitimate effect in the direction to which it looks. For, mark you, I think it tears down every restraint upon extravagance, every safeguard for economy. The House can take the consequences. I have done my duty in calling attention to the danger; and with that I ask the yeas and nays on the proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. VAN EATON. I should like to hear read the amendment on which the House is to vote.

The SPEAKER. Before the vote is taken the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

The Clerk read as follows:

That clause 2 of Rule XXIV be amended so as to read as follows:

"2. On all days other than Monday, as soon as the Journal is read and approved, and on all Mondays (except the first and third in each month) after the call of States and Territories, there shall be a morning hour for reports of committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed and a copy thereof mailed by the Public Printer to each Member and Delegate: Provided, That during such morning hour it shall be in order to consider such bills as would otherwise go to or are already on the House Calendar, if the committee in charge when called shall so direct. The Speaker shall call each committee in regular order, and if the Speaker shall not get through the call of committees before the House passes to other business, he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving preference to the measure last under consideration; but whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on one day it shall not be in order for such committee to report further until the other committees shall have been called in their turn."

That clause 4 be so amended as to read as follows:

"4. After the hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees, except on the second and fourth Mondays of each month, it shall be in order to proceed to business on the Speaker's table, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or to the House Calendar; motions therefor having priority in the order named. The morning hour shall continue until the House determines to go to other business."

That clause 5 be so amended as to read as follows:

"5. When the House proceeds to the Speaker's table, the business shall be disposed of in the following order:

"First. Messages from the President and other executive communications.

"Second. Messages from the Senate and amendments proposed by the Senate to bills of the House.

"Third. Bills and resolutions from the Senate on their first and second reading; that they be referred to committees or put on their passage; and the motions so to refer shall have precedence of all motions touching their disposition.

"Fourth. Engrossed bills and bills from the Senate on their third reading."

That clause 6 be amended so as to read as follows:

"6. When a motion is made that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, it shall be in order, pending that motion, if directed by a committee, to move to designate a bill to be first considered in the committee, which motion shall not be subject to amendment or debate, and only one designation shall be pending at a time. If no bill be designated, or, being designated, is disposed of in committee, it shall then consider first bills for raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other bills on its calendar.

"7. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and, if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days."

Add to Rule XXIV the following clause:

"8. After the morning hour, on the second and fourth Mondays of each month, it shall be in order to consider legislation already reported relating to the District of Columbia unless dispensed with by a two-thirds vote of the House."

That there be added to Rule XXIV the following clause:

"9. Before the morning hour it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of unfinished business other than that in the morning hour or on the Speaker's table, and the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 128, nays 137, not voting 55; as follows:

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. VAN EATON with Mr. HOUK.

Mr. DEUSTER with Mr. GUENTHER.

Mr. SHELLEY with Mr. VALENTINE.

Mr. PATTON. At the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER], I desire to state that he has been on the sick-list for the last four days.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. I ask that the reading of the names of members voting be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. HERBERT. I move to recommit the report to the Committee on Rules with the instructions which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the resolution reported by the Committee on Rules be recommitted with instructions to the committee to report an additional rule providing that pending a motion to go into Committee of the Whole one motion may be made by direction of a committee, to be decided by a majority without amendment and without debate, to take up and consider, when in committee, any bill on that calendar; and also a rule providing that when a motion is made to take up the House Calendar, pending that motion one motion may be made, if directed by a committee, to be decided by a majority without amendment and without debate, to take up and consider any particular bill on said calendar.

Mr. REED. The House having determined not to trust itself, let us see how far it will go.

Mr. RANDALL. If one side can debate, the other ought to be allowed also.

Mr. REED. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have a chance to debate.

Mr. RANDALL. This will virtually leave us without any rule.

Mr. HERBERT. I call for the yeas and nays on my proposition.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays there were ayes 46.

The SPEAKER. The affirmative is not one-fifth of the last vote.

Mr. HERBERT. Count the other side.

The other side being counted, there were noes 74.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the entire vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 113, nays 130, not voting 77; as follows:

So the motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:
Mr. MILLIKEN with Mr. YOUNG.
Mr. SLOCUM with Mr. HANCOCK.
Mr. GIBSON. I desire to record my vote.
The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present when his name was called?
Mr. GIBSON. I had stepped out of the Hall for a moment, and was not present when my name was called.
The SPEAKER. The rule is very positive on that subject. The House sometimes has given unanimous consent to record the vote where the gentleman has stated that he was in the Hall at the time the roll was called and was listening and failed to hear his name; that is done by unanimous consent of the House. But the gentleman states that he was not in the House at all during the call of the roll.
Mr. GIBSON. I desire to state that if I had been present, I should have voted "no."
Mr. SLOCUM. I am paired on this question with Mr. HANCOCK, of Texas. I desire to state that if he were present, he would vote "ay" and I should vote "no."
The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.
The SPEAKER. The question is now upon adopting the report of the Committee on Rules.
The question was taken, and the report was adopted.
Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:
To Mr. FINDLAY, for five days, on account of important business.
To Mr. BLANCHARD, for three days, on account of illness.
To Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, for ten days, on account of illness.
To Mr. SNYDER, for five days, on account of important business.
To Mr. HOLMES, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

ASSIGNMENT OF COMMITTEE-ROOMS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state to the House that according to an arrangement made between the Clerk of the House and the Chair, the Chair has taken control of the room in the basement of the Capitol heretofore occupied by the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds and will assign it to a committee of the House, that room being suitable for the purpose; and the Clerk will take in lieu of that room the one under the Hall of the House, which has been heretofore occupied as a miscellaneous store-room. The Chair makes this announcement because the room in the basement had been assigned to the Clerk by order of the House, and if the House is not content with the action of the Chair it is proper that it should be known.
There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. I demand the regular order.
The SPEAKER. To-day being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.
Mr. STEELE. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.
The SPEAKER. That requires a two-thirds vote.
The motion to dispense with the morning hour was not agreed to; there being upon a division—ayes 76, noes 48 (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative).

LIEUT. JOHN G. KYLE.

Mr. MURRAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 2586) for the payment of the funeral expenses of Lieut. John G. Kyle; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CASTLE ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back adversely the joint resolution (H. ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEELE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I rise to a question of privilege. I offer the following resolution for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution, after which the Chair will decide whether or not it presents a question of privilege.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, directed to purchase the necessary furniture and carpeting for the rooms of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, subject to the approval of the Committee on Accounts, and pay for the same out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. I wish to offer an amendment to that resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that had better go to the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks as this provides for the purchase of furniture, and for payment out of the contingent fund, that it is perhaps hardly a matter of privilege.

Mr. MUTCHLER. Let it go to the Committee on Accounts, then.

Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky. Will my amendment also go?

The SPEAKER. It is not before the House for consideration.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Accounts.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. COBB. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MILLS. Would it not have been better to fix some rules for the House by which a majority of the House could reach such questions without asking unanimous consent? [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. COBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The Clerk will report the first bill on the Calendar.

MUSTER AND PAY OF CERTAIN OFFICERS, ETC.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 355) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the muster-rolls of the volunteer forces of the United States in the late war so that the muster of officers and enlisted men therein shall cover the whole period during which they were regularly commissioned and actually performed the duties to which they were so commissioned, in all cases where no charges are pending against them and there was no fault or neglect on their part which delayed their muster-in, and where the commissions bear date prior to the 20th day of June, 1863, or after that date when their commands were not below the minimum number entitling them to such officers at the date of the commission.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be paid to all officers and enlisted men mustered under the provisions of the preceding section the amounts of pay and allowances to which they would have been entitled if originally so mustered, less the amount they actually received, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

"In line 8, after the word "commissioned," insert:

"Or were prevented from performing said duties under their respective commissions by reason of wounds received in the line of duty, or by sickness in hospital, or by being prisoners of war."

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have the report read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred bills H. R. 350, 816, and 355, having the same under consideration, do respectfully report the same back with bill H. R. 355 in the nature of a substitute for the several bills named.

Your committee are of the opinion that an act of general application, such as is proposed in this bill, would be a measure of plain justice toward many meritorious officers who served in the late war, and would at the same time properly protect the interests of the Government. There is no reason apparent to your committee why officers who actually served in positions to which they were regularly commissioned in the volunteer forces of the United States, but who from the exigencies of the service, and through no fault of theirs, failed of muster on their commissions at the proper dates, should thereby be deprived of the pay and allowances to which they would otherwise have been entitled. The bill by which it is proposed to cover this class of cases will, we believe, provide for the adjustment of nearly all that are meritorious among the many claims of a similar character which are coming before the two Houses of Congress.

Your committee therefore report back the bills named, and recommend that bill H. R. 355 do pass.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope the gentleman from Indiana or some other member of the committee or some one conversant with the facts will give some reason why this bill ought to pass, for certainly none appears in the bill itself or the report which has been read.

Mr. STEELE. That is what I propose to do.

On the 3d of March, 1863, an act was approved or passed empowering the Secretary of War where regiments fell below the minimum number to reduce the number of their officers. On the 20th day of June, 1863, the Secretary of War issued an order prescribing regulations under the said act to the effect that where a regiment was below the minimum number it should be deprived of its colonel, and that where companies were below the minimum they should be deprived of a second lieutenant. Now officers who were at the rear with commissions dated on the 18th day of June had only to go to a mustering officer the next day and be mustered on a commission of that date, or even on the 19th of June they could be mustered, while an officer on active duty at the front with a commission in his pocket dated May 1, 1863, who was not accessible to a mustering officer probably for a few days subsequent to receiving the commission by mail, could not be then mustered in. And so he went on performing his duty until after the order of June 20 was issued. Then when he came to a mustering officer to be mustered in, he was told that this order excluded him, and he could not be mustered.

Now, these officers on active duty at the front with commissions in their pockets, dated on the 1st of May, served to the close of the war as lieutenant-colonels for instance, with a colonel's commission, while the "band-box" soldiers as they were called in those days, serving in the cities with a commission dated forty-eight days subsequently to that, went up and were mustered in and served as colonels to the close of the war and drew their pay as such.

This bill, then, Mr. Chairman, is simply to put the officers who were upon active duty at the front upon an equal footing with those who were serving at the rear. The bill provides only for such cases, except subsequent to the 20th of June, 1863, where regiments were up to the minimum. Now, if the regiment is here, or say was in 1863 or 1864 at the time of the issuance of this order, all that was necessary if the regiment was up to the minimum was for the officer to get his commission and ride up and be mustered. But if the regiment was at the front he could not receive his commission so promptly as if the regiment had been here, and perhaps the regiment which was up to the minimum at the time the commission was issued was ordered into battle before he could be mustered, and by the casualties of war the number of men would be reduced below the minimum. Under this order, and because of that very gallant act which occurred in many cases and which prevented the officer from being mustered, although he served to the close of the war, they were excluded from being mustered and simply because they went in and did their duty to their country—did what this country expected them to do, fight and lose men.

It is only in those cases where they were up to the minimum and actually held the commission and performed the service, or were prevented from performing the service by reason of being prisoners, by reason of sickness in hospital, or by reason of suffering from wounds which incapacitated them from performing these services, that they are allowed to muster under this act. The law was a very unjust one, and no country on earth ever fathered such a law, saying to regiments, "You must be careful of your precious selves; if you go in and be killed and your regiments are reduced below the minimum your regiments will have no further promotions."

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLIN. Have you any information as to the number of officers affected by the bill and the amount of expenditure it will take to meet it?

Mr. STEELE. I have no accurate data as to that. I do not know how many the bill would apply to. I know it is an act of simple justice to meritorious active-duty officers. This bill passed the House last session unanimously. It passed the Senate unanimously with some amendments.

I desire to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PETTIBONE. In addition to the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana, I wish to say that some ten regiments were raised in Eastern Tennessee after General Burnside came to Knoxville. They were ordered immediately into service with full ranks, and many a soldier and officer was killed or wounded and put out of the service before being mustered in because there was no mustering officer within reach. This bill covers the cases of those officers who entered the service and served many months, and many of them went to their graves or went out of the service by reason of sickness or wounds when there was not a mustering officer within hundreds of miles of them.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I am satisfied this bill is correct and I have no doubt it ought to pass. It seeks to do by general law what is done every day when private bills come up; and the same facts have to be shown before an officer or soldier is entitled to pay under it. There are hundreds of bills now pending before the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on War Claims involving this identical question, and I know of no case in which the facts required by this bill to entitle any one to pay where the House has not passed the bill when it was reached on the Calendar.

The bill reaches that class of men, as suggested by my colleague from Indiana, who did their duty faithfully at the front, but because of the fact that the commissions could not reach them because of the communications being cut off and other casualties, or because they could not get a mustering officer, performed the duties of their rank but never received pay.

Mr. McMILLIN. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] whether he can give the information his colleague was unable to give as to the number of persons affected by the bill. My colleague from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] says there are ten regiments in our State that will be affected. We ought to have some information on the subject, it appears to me, either approximate or remote.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will state to my friend from Tennessee that I have not the data, but it is altogether probable that nearly all of those cases will be reached by this bill. In nearly every instance private bills are pending before this House to pay them.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] that I think it does not make any difference how many cases will be reached by the bill. It is a matter of justice. I have charge of many of these claims myself, and know they are right and ought to be paid. And it makes no difference how many there are; the more there are the more important it is that we should lose no time in passing a bill for their benefit.

Mr. VANCE. I think this bill ought to pass. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] has spoken of the regiments in his State. I know of my own knowledge that many officers went out from North Carolina—two whole regiments went out from North Carolina, and, besides, men went into other regiments. They went out at the risk of their lives, under great difficulties, all the passes of the mountains being guarded by the confederate soldiers. Many of these men, both enlisted men and officers, have up to the present time never received their pay. They ought to be paid. They showed their patriotism and their love for the old flag, and I think it is time the Congress of the United States should remember these men and put them on the rolls and let them be paid. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STOCKSLAGER] said something which I did not distinctly hear about private bills being pending. If this bill is to take the place of private bills, it seems to me that would be an important advantage. The bill in my judgment ought to pass.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I wish to say simply a word in favor of this bill. I have personal knowledge myself that many men who were promoted from the ranks to serve as commissioned officers were unable to be mustered in consequence of the absence of a mustering officer. They served long months as officers, and up to this day have not received a single dime for compensation over and above the rank of sergeant.

This is an absolute act of justice. It comes, it is true, at a late date; but in the face of the facts which I know from personal knowledge, I say that justice will be done to these men by the passage of this bill, and it ought to become a law.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to know whether there has ever been any report from the War Department or any official recommendation of any Department of the Government?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Ohio. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I will answer my friend by saying that the House has uniformly passed bills of this character for the relief of individuals.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. STEELE] a question if he will yield to me.

Mr. STEELE. For a question, certainly.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I notice that the first section of this bill provides that if an officer was commissioned before the 20th day of June, 1863, and was not mustered but performed the duties of his rank, he shall be entitled to pay during that period, regardless of the number of men in his command. In other words, his company or his regiment may have been reduced below the minimum, but if his commission bore date prior to that time he is nevertheless to be entitled to his pay. If subsequent to that date he was commissioned and performed the duties of his rank, but was not mustered in and could not be mustered because his command was below the minimum, he can not receive any pay whatever. The question I want answered is, why this discrimination?

Mr. STEELE. The answer is this——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I know what the answer will be. The answer is this, as I understand it, that prior to that time the War Department had fixed no minimum, and the officer was entitled to his muster regardless of the number of his command. But about that time the War Department fixed the minimum, and consequently the officer was not entitled to a muster and could not receive pay although performing the duties of his rank.

Now where is the justice of that? Why is not the one as much entitled to be paid as the other? That is the question I want to have answered. And if we may disregard the law and the rules of the War Department in giving pay to officers of a particular class, why may we not disregard the order of the War Department by which officers were prohibited from a muster, although, as my distinguished colleague [Mr. STEELE] says, they took their commissions, performed the duties of their rank, rushed into battle, put in jeopardy their lives, and perhaps lost them? I am in favor of paying all these men without discriminating against any.

Mr. STEELE. The principle is right, and I am in favor of it. But after the date of the order of the Secretary of War in obedience to the law of March 3, 1863, a great many States ceased to commission officers under such circumstances. Now you can not fix the status of those men. You would say to those States who commissioned in disobedience to the law that their officers should be paid, while those States who in obedience to the law did not commission are not to have the benefit of this bill. It would be almost impossible to frame a law giving equal justice to all, although I believe in the principle and would be heartily in favor of it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. May I not be permitted to move an amendment to the first section of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is in order.

Mr. STEELE. My motion is that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to an inquiry whether the bill is in such a situation now that I may offer an amendment to the first section. I think I have the right to do so, and, if so, I move to strike out all after the word "muster in," in the fourteenth line, to the end of the section; to strike out the following:

> And where the commissions bear date prior to the 20th day of June, 1863, or after that date when their commands were not below the minimum number entitling them to such officers at the date of the commission.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. In doing so I wish to say, in order that the Committee of the Whole may act intelligently upon the amendment proposed, that after the issuing of the order of the date mentioned in the bill it is well known that there were many colonels of regiments who obeyed that order and did not ask the governors of their States to commission men in their regiments when the companies were not entitled to such commissions under the order. I want that to be distinctly understood.

Now, by the adoption of the amendment proposed, you would pay men who were not entitled to be mustered as commissioned officers, under the law, simply because they were commissioned, and you would cut off hundreds of others equally entitled to promotion and pay who were not commissioned because the governors of their States respected and obeyed the law. If you are going to pay men who were not entitled to be mustered in, and who never were mustered in, I think you would have in justice to include those who were entitled to promotion but for the order referred to, but were not actually promoted and commissioned in consequence of the order. I think you had better let the bill remain as it is, and confine it to the men who were lawfully entitled to and actually received commissions, and who after they were notified that they were to be commissioned entered upon their duties as officers, but were not mustered on account of the exigencies of the service. I think that is just and right, and will compensate worthy men who absolutely performed their duties as officers, knowing that they would be commissioned, but had not received their commissions or were unable at the time to be mustered into the service as such officers.

I think the bill is right as it is, and I am opposed to extending it for the reasons I have stated, for if you do so you will do injustice to a great many regiments where commissions were not issued by the governors of the States on account of the order of the War Department confining such promotions to regiments and companies having the minimum number of men.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the objection raised by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON] to the amendment is not sound. The class of persons of whom he speaks would properly be excluded from the operation of the bill, because in the first place they were not commissioned, and in the second place they were not engaged in the service in the higher grades. But there were very many States in which officers were commissioned who did perform the duties of the rank to which they were commissioned, although they were not permitted to be mustered. Now, because this ample justice which my friend from Illinois thinks should be extended to all cannot be extended to a certain class, why should compensation be withheld from those who actually performed the service? I regret that many men were not permitted (as they might have been but for the law of March 3, 1863, and the subsequent order) to render service in the higher grades; but these other men—notably from the State of Indiana and from the State of Iowa—were not so affected, because they received their commissions and performed the duty, although they were not mustered; and they ought to have their pay.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. But they ought not to have been commissioned, in view of the order issued by the War Department; and if you now pay them, you give men from certain States an advantage over those from other States, which I think would not be just, and especially as those whom you seek to compensate were commissioned in violation of the law

Mr. HEPBURN. It is true that to a certain extent these men were commissioned in violation of the orders of the War Department; yet the War Department recognized these commissions, in spite of the disobedience of its orders, by accepting the services of these men. They were permitted to render the service notwithstanding the order of the War Department; and it seems to me that after the Government has had the benefit of their services, has tacitly waived the disobedience of the law and the order, it ought not now to say that because of this nominal disobedience these men shall not have the compensation which belongs to them.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose this amendment. While it is true that officers from Iowa and Ohio, commissioned as colonels in violation of the orders of the War Department, performed the duties of colonels, it is likewise true that lieutenant-colonels of regiments from Illinois and other States that obeyed the law performed exactly the same duty by virtue of military regulations. Where there was no colonel the lieutenant-colonel performed the duty; where there was no second lieutenant the sergeant performed the duty. There were States whose men in consequence of the order of the War Department were deprived of promotions. All of us who served in Illinois regiments know that after the order of the War Department the governor of our State conformed to it, and there were no promotions in Illinois regiments because of that order. All of us know that the governors of some other States did not conform to the order and commissions were issued, but the Government of the United States did not recognize those commissions, and the officers received pay according to the commissions that they held before. I am in favor of this bill, but I am opposed to paying officers whose governors violated the law while we deprive of pay officers whose governors obeyed the law.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. The answer to my colleague [Mr. ROWELL] is that if soldiers went forth from other States and performed this service they ought to be paid. If the governor of Illinois did not commission the men from that State but they rendered the service, I say bring in a bill to pay them for the service they rendered. But do not deprive these other soldiers who have rendered service of the pay to which they are entitled simply because the governor commissioned them in violation of an order of the War Department. They rendered service and the Government accepted their services, they are entited to pay; and the Illinois soldier, if he rendered similar service, is entitled to the same pay.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. What evidence has my colleague that the Government did accept their services? I think it can not be justly claimed that the Government accepted the services of these men when it refused to muster them in under their commissions and to pay them. They were commissioned in violation of law.

Mr. DAVIS, of Illinois. They rendered service; they were on the rolls and performed under their commissions the service for which it is now proposed to pay them.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I know very well that orderly sergeants from the State of Illinois in some cases, who could not under the order be commissioned and mustered in as second lieutenants, commanded companies, and they are as much entitled to be paid as these men who were commissioned in violation of law.

Mr. MOREY. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill and in favor also of the proposed amendment. I am unable to see the force of the argument which would withhold justice from a class of officers and soldiers who were commissioned and performed the service of their rank, while other soldiers equally but no more meritorious receive the benefits of this bill, simply because the governors of some States failed to promote soldiers to fill the vacancies occurring in their organizations, and who, never being commissioned, do not come within the provisions of the bill and amendment. Every man who served in the war knows that it took but a few months after a regiment went into the field for it to get down to its "fighting weight."

Every man knows there were in the ranks of every company and every regiment men who were competent to fill any office which might devolve upon them. We all know that one of the best incentives to the soldiers of our Army was the hope their gallant services would be rewarded by honorable promotion. I am glad the governor of my own State of Ohio, who, as the ranks of our regiments became depleted, as the roster of our troops showed vacancies, issued commissions therefor to men who were worthy and every way fitted to discharge the duties of the offices to which they were appointed. To those men who went forward and commanded companies, battalions, and regiments we simply propose by this bill to do an act of justice, not only to pay the pecuniary wages their office entitled them to, but to bestow upon them the tangible evidence of their honorable promotion.

I am in favor not only of the bill but of the amendment. Let it extend to every officer who falls within its provisions, to every one who bore a commission and actually performed the service of his rank. If there were in the State of Illinois any sergeants or private soldiers performing the duties of commanding officers, I regret there is not opportunity here now to render some sort of justice to them.

Mr. STEELE. We want to do justice to men commissioned according to law.

Mr. MOREY. I want to do justice to the men all over the country who rendered service [applause] and who were able to do it.

Mr. STEELE. If you want to load this bill down so it can not pass, very well, and put officers on acting duty with other officers. I am against loading it down. At the last session of Congress this bill was loaded down and sent to the Senate. If you wish to kill the bill again, load it down with these amendments.

Mr. MOREY. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana I have not consulted my fears in my advocacy of this bill. I will allow no such consideration to prevent me from doing what I consider but simple justice to this class of men. I believe it is the sentiment of this House to so pass this bill as to extend its provisions to every man coming under its terms, including the proposed amendment. It simply provides for the muster and pay of soldiers who were commissioned and who actually performed duty as such officers for the time they so performed such duty. It is true the War Department refused them muster when their commands were reduced by the ravages of war. We propose by this bill to give to these brave men the emoluments and honors which they had won on the march and in the battle.

Mr. HOUK. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, this is not a question of whether men were mustered or not, but is purely a question whether the men who rendered the service to the Government have been paid for it or not. Suppose the governor of one State did commission and the governor of another State did not commission, why should that deprive the man of pay for services actually rendered?

And suppose this bill does not do all that should be done; it is a step in the right direction. It does justice as far as we can go by the bill and amendment. If there are parties this bill does not reach, then let the gentlemen who have such constituents come forward and bring in a bill that will do justice to them. I suppose every man on the floor is willing to admit the soldier should be paid according to the service he rendered, and if gentlemen will bring in such a measure, gentlemen here will as cheerfully vote for that as for the pending bill and amendment. Let it not be said the House of Representatives refuses to do justice as far as it may be able to do it because it does not do justice to everybody else at the same time.

Mr. GEDDES. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to offer a substitute for the bill and amendment now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE], and for the present he is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I have but few words to say upon this bill. I concur with, and I am in favor of, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE]. The bill that has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs was intended to cover a large class of cases. There is not a single individual case that has come before the Committee on Military Affairs that would not have been favorably reported by that committee and passed, as I believe, by unanimous consent, if it had been presented on its individual merits. The cases embraced in this bill are such as have had gross injustice done them by reason of the order of the War Department, which, under the act of 1863, permitted a large number to be mustered into the service who were near a mustering officer and got their commissions through the mails, while those who were out in the service and had not an opportunity of being mustered or receiving their commissions through the mail were deprived of this advantage.

But there are many other officers who served as captains of companies, majors, lieutenant-colonels, and colonels of regiments who actually rendered the service and had companies or regiments that fell within the minimum number. These men are entitled to consideration, and I do not believe that there is a man on this floor who would refuse to say that those men who actually performed the services, who had actual commissions from the governors of their States, should be relieved. I do not believe that there is a gentleman here who would be prepared to deny to a man the pay and compensation which he earned while serving in a rank and having a commission for that rank because his company happened to be one or two men less than a given number, which was an arbitrary number fixed by the War Department. Therefore I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana will prevail and that justice will be done to these men, who, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MOREY] has so well stated, are entitled to it as much as any men who served this country during the war.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. GIBSON. I wish to ask a question for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BAYNE. I have not yielded the floor; I will hear the question of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GIBSON. So far as I am individually concerned it is my desire to do exact justice, but what I wish to ask is how it happens that during the eighteen years that this wrong has been allowed to exist there has not been some official action on the part of some Department in this Government upon the subject? If there were any such regiments in existence the records of the War Department will show when they were mustered in, and will also show when they were mustered out, and so it seems to me that some information upon this subject could be received and ought to be received from the War Department.

Mr. BAYNE. I can answer the question of the gentleman from West Virginia, and in a word. We have simply been doing this thing by piecemeal. Congress after Congress ever since the war has been granting relief in individual cases, and the gentleman can refer to the Statutes at Large and will find the opinions and sentiments of one Congress after another upon the subject. It has been done no matter what party was in power or whoever was in power. He will find act after act to remedy this wrong in individual cases.

Mr. STEELE. I have made a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman can not make his motion while I have the floor.

Mr. STEELE. Who has the floor?

Mr. BAYNE. I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course the gentleman from Indiana can not take the gentleman from Pennsylvania off the floor while he is speaking. The Chair was of the opinion that the gentleman had yielded the floor.

Mr. BAYNE. No, sir; I have not yielded the floor. I only yielded for a question.

Mr. GIBSON. I would like to ask another question.

Mr. BAYNE. I was going to say that many of these acts of Congress giving pay to these officers who served the Union—a large number of these cases—refer to officers who served with companies having less than the minimum number, doing precisely by these special acts what the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana proposes to do by general legislation. In all you will find, I have no doubt, that as many, perhaps more, cases of that kind have been relieved than where the officers had the requisite numbers in their command. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. GIBSON. The Secretary of War can still furnish information in time for this House to act understandingly upon the subject.

Mr. BAYNE. We know all of these facts.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee determines to rise.

Mr. STEELE. I understand that all the debate that this bill will probably call for has already taken place, and therefore, if in order, I call for a division on the last vote, in order to have my motion voted down so as to save time.

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point that the committee has determined to rise and that nothing else is in order.

Mr. STEELE. And I make the point of order that I have called for a division on the last vote, in order to have my motion voted down.

Mr. McMILLIN. In other words, Mr. Chairman, he is anxious for the House to hold him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is too late to call for a division. The motion has been already agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COBB reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 355, had come to no conclusion thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn has precedence.

H. V. BOYNTON.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question on the motion to adjourn the Chair will announce the following as the select committee to investigate charges against H. V. Boynton, Washington correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette: Mr. J. H. HOPKINS of Pennsylvania, Mr. T. B. WARD of Indiana, Mr. J. J. ADAMS of New York, Mr. L. P. POLAND of Vermont, and Mr. JAMES WILSON, of Iowa.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were—yeas 36.

Mr. McMILLIN. I do not insist on further count.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

MUSTER AND PAY OF CERTAIN OFFICERS, ETC.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to resume consideration of the Private Calendar; and pending that motion I move that all debate on the pending bill and amendments be limited to one minute.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know whether general debate on the bill has been exhausted.

Mr. McMILLIN. It has not.

The SPEAKER. That is all the House can do at this stage.

Mr. STEELE. Is it in order to ask unanimous consent that all debate be limited to one minute?

The SPEAKER. On the bill and all amendments?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar; and pending that he asks unanimous consent that debate upon the pending bill and all amendments thereto may be limited to one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House, Mr. COBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 355) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces. By order of the House all debate on the bill and amendments thereto is limited to one minute.

Mr. STEELE. I yield half a minute to my colleague [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I yield back my time to my colleague. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEELE. I call for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] to strike out all after the words "muster in," in line 14 of section 1, to the end of the section.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 91, noes 19.

So (further count not being called for) the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is it necessary to vote on the amendment which was offered subsequently to the time the bill was originally reported and which was printed with the bill?

Mr. BAYNE. That has to be voted on.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was not a substitute offered?

The CHAIRMAN. No substitute has been offered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood a substitute was offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES].

Mr. GEDDES. I offer as a substitute for the bill that which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to pay certain officers of the Army for services actually rendered during the late war.

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, directed to pay to officers of the Army during the late war the pay and allowances of the rank of their commissions from the date when it shall appear to them that such officers entered upon the performance of the duties of the rank of their commissions, notwithstanding that they were not mustered in until a later date, deducting therefrom all pay and allowances already received for the same period: Provided, That any such officers prevented from entering upon actual service under their commissions by being prisoners of war or in hospital shall be paid from the date of their commissions.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask if that is a bill already pending in this House?

Mr. GEDDES. It is; and it is a good deal better one than the bill now pending.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then it can not be offered as a substitute.

Mr. MORRISON. If it is a better bill, why do you not take it?

Mr. STOCKSLAGER. I believe it is a better bill.

Mr. GEDDES. The inquiry having been made as to the matter of fact, I will say this is the bill which was considered by the Committee on War Claims and by that committee reported unanimously, and it is now on the Calendar, but farther on.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I make the point of order that the bill can not be offered as an amendment or substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order under the admissions of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES].

Mr. GEDDES. I believe the point of order can be made against the bill now pending that it is a general bill, and should not now be on the Private Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made too late, the bill having been considered.

Mr. GEDDES. I am in favor of the principle of these bills. I think some bill should pass. I believe the substitute I have desired to offer is an improvement on the bill under consideration.

Mr. HENDERSON. I want to say I am in favor of the original bill, but as amended I can not vote for it.

Mr. STEELE. I move that the committee rise and recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COBB reported the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 355) to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces, had directed him to report the same back to the House with amendments.

Mr. STEELE. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. GIBSON. Would it be in order to make a motion to recommit the bill?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GIBSON. If in order, I desire to make a motion to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. Not at this stage; but when the question is on the passage of the bill the gentleman from West Virginia can make that motion. The Chair does not intend to decide that the gentleman could not make that motion even at this stage. But it is more usual to make it when the question is on the passage. The question is on ordering the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole. The first amendment will be read by the Clerk.

The amendment was to strike out of section 1, after the word "muster-in," the following:

And where the commissions bear date prior to the 20th day of June, 1863, or after that date when their commands were not below the minimum number entitling them to such officers at the date of the commission.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole was to insert after the word "commissioned," in line 8 of section 1, the following:

Or were prevented from performing said duties under their respective commissions by reason of wounds received in the line of duty, or by sickness in hospitals, or by being prisoners of war.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEELE. On that I demand the previous question.

Mr. GIBSON. Pending the demand for the previous question, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, for the reason that the Committee on War Claims have already reported a bill on this subject.

Mr. GEDDES. I desire to move to recommit the bill with instructions to report as a substitute bill that which I offered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman had better reduce his motion to writing.

Mr. STEELE. I demand that it be reduced to writing.

Mr. GEDDES. It is to report as a substitute bill that which is now on the Calendar as House bill No. 3935, reported from the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. STEELE. If the general is sincere in his desire to benefit the soldiers——

Mr. GEDDES. I am not a general; I never was in the war at all; but I want justice done to the men who were in the war.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is this debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. While the motion to recommit is being reduced to writing, I ask that the bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The rules require that on the demand of a member every motion shall be reduced to writing. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] has demanded that the motion to recommit be reduced to writing.

Mr. BAYNE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] will, I have no doubt, admit that the bill which he proposes as a substitute for the pending bill is at present on the Calendar of this House. Will not a point of order lie against putting that as a matter of instruction to the Committee on Military Affairs?

The SPEAKER. It has been frequently decided, and correctly decided, that an amendment which would not be in order in the House can not be incorporated into a bill by instructions to a committee, because that would be doing indirectly what could not be done directly on the floor of the House.

Mr. BAYNE. Then I raise the point of order against the motion of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. If it be the fact that the proposed substitute is the same as a bill now pending before the House the Chair sustains the point of order. The question, then, is on the motion made by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] to recommit this bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion to recommit was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the demand for the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. STEELE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GOFF. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to introduce a joint resolution for reference.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to that.

RELIEF FOR SUFFERERS BY THE OHIO OVERFLOW.

Mr. GOFF, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 154) making an appropriation to relieve the sufferers by the overflow of the Ohio River and its tributaries; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

OFFICERS OF THE NAVY.

Mr. CALKINS. The naval appropriations bill is to be taken up next Tuesday, and I ask permission to submit a resolution of inquiry in order to obtain information for the use of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I am willing to yield for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to furnish to the House immediately the following information:

I. The number of commissioned and warrant officers who at the date of the compilation of the last Naval Register were employed on sea-duty, the statement to specify the number in each grade and to show the number on each ship.

II. The sea and shore service and unemployed time of the commodores during the last ten years, including a full, specific statement of all sea-service.

III. A list giving, in order of rank, the name of every commissioned and warrant officer at the date mentioned on shore-duty, with a description of the service on which he was employed, supplemented by a recapitulation giving the numbers at each navy-yard and each other locality, and a further statement giving the names and number of the officers on shore-duty in Washington, with a memorandum of the service on which each was employed.

IV. A statement of the number in each grade of commissioned and warrant officers who at the same date were not upon sea or shore duty.

V. A statement showing the names of the sea-going officers who, having held their present commission more than three years, have not had more than one year's sea-service under such commissions, with the amount of sea-service in each case.

The Secretary is also requested to inform the House whether he has complied with the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, requiring him to certify in all orders for shore-duty that the same are required by the public interests, and to specify the term of service, and whether or not the number of officers now so employed can be reduced without injury to the public service; and what total number of officers on such duty will probably be sufficient during the next fiscal year, unless extraordinary emergencies should arise.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read?

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I object.

Mr. CALKINS. Then I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred accordingly.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], that the House adjourn.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As many gentlemen seem desirous to present propositions for reference, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HATCH, of Missouri. I renew the motion.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, if there be no objection, will lay before the House several personal requests of members.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HEMPHILL asks leave to withdraw the papers in the case of the alleged election contest of James vs. Hunt, which have been placed in petition-box.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, this request will be granted. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] rise?

Mr. HEPBURN. I rise to interpose objection to this request for the withdrawal of papers.

The SPEAKER. As objection is made, the request is not granted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CABELL, for three days from to-morrow, on account of business; and

To Mr. SENEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, that the House adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 11, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

JAMES T. FARLEY, a Senator from the State of California, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. PENDLETON presented the credentials of Henry B. Payne, chosen by the Legislature of Ohio a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1885; which were read and ordered to be filed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the 10th ultimo, a report of the Adjutant-General, showing the number of soldiers in the late war who served one year, the number who served two years, the number who served three years, and the amount of bounty paid to each class respectively; also an approximation of the amount of money which would be required to equalize the bounties of all; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the surveyor-general of Arizona Territory, recommending the confirmation of the private land claim "Tres Alamos," No. 17, George H. Howard, claimant; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of L. Somborn & Co., of New York city, praying that a duty of 1 cent per pound on glass bottles be substituted for the present rate; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GARLAND presented the petition of E. C. Bunch and others, citizens of Apache County, Arizona, praying that certain railroad lands in that Territory be opened to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOLPH. I present a memorial of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oregon, urgently calling the attention of Congress to the necessity of providing a navy which in numbers, tonnage, and armament shall be fully equal to those of the other great powers of the world; reciting that they are more immediately interested in and are bound by closer commercial ties to the cities and towns in the States and Territories lying on the Pacific Ocean and upon the Columbia River, Puget Sound, and in Alaska. When it is stated that the ocean shore of Alaska, Oregon, and California is over 2,000 miles in extent, that the coast of Alaska alone, including its bays and inlets, is greater than all the balance of the sea-coast of the United States, something like 25,000 miles in extent, that the shore of Puget Sound alone is from 1,800 to 2,000 miles in length, the importance of protection to the commercial interests of the Pacific coast will be seen. I ask that the memorial be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the memorial? The Chair hears no objection. It will be read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the Board of Trade of Portland Oregon, would most urgently call your attention to the following facts: The coast-line of the United States extends for thousands of miles along both oceans. Throughout its entire extent it is dotted with wealthy and populous cities whose defenseless condition invites attack. The destruction of even one of these seaboard centers of wealth and population by the naval force of a hostile power would be a calamity the moral and physical effects of which would prove a heavy blow to our national prosperity, and would inflict a lasting stain upon our national honor. We are entirely without those means of offensive and defensive naval warfare with which other peoples, taking advantage of the vast improvements in the arts of war, have provided themselves. It therefore behooves us, in this time of profound peace and unexampled prosperity, to provide for ourselves a navy which in numbers, tonnage, and armament shall be fully equal to those of the other great powers of the world. Your memorialist is more immediately interested in and is bound by closer commercial ties to the cities lying upon the Pacific Ocean, the Columbia River, Puget Sound, and in Alaska, extending a distance of over two thousand miles, all of which are unprotected against attack and easily accessible to modern vessels of war. Your memorialist therefore prays that such steps as to your wisdom may seem best be taken, with the view of attaining the general end above set forth.

And, as in duty, &c.

[SEAL.] FOR THE BOARD OF TRADE OF PORTLAND, OREGON, DONALD MACLEAY, President.
F. K. ARNOLD, Secretary.

PORTLAND, OREG., January 31, 1884.

Mr. DOLPH. I have a communication from Charles F. Powell, captain of engineers, in charge of the engineering department at Portland, Oreg., which is addressed to my colleague, Hon. J. H. SLATER, and myself, and to Hon. M. C. GEORGE, Representative from Oregon, THOMAS H. BRENTS, Delegate from Washington Territory, and Hon. THEODORE F. SINGISER, Delegate from Idaho Territory, urging a special appropriation for prompt use upon the Cascade Canal. I ask unanimous consent that I may present it and that it may be referred to the Committee on Commerce, as it relates to a public matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent to present a paper, the nature of which he has described, for reference to the Committee on Commerce. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the paper is received and so referred.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of J. J. Barkley, Joseph Wheeler, and other citizens of Alabama, praying that the Mobile, Alabama, and Cincinnati Air-Line Railroad Company and the Saint Louis, Alabama, and Atlantic Railroad Company may have the privilege of purchasing public lands along their routes at the rate of $1.25 an acre; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PALMER presented a memorial of citizens of Holly, Mich., remonstrating against any change in the present law permitting vinegar-makers, by a vaporizing process, to separate the alcoholic properties of the mash produced by them and to inject the same into water for the purpose of making vinegar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SLATER presented a petition of citizens of Oregon and Washington Territory, praying for the forfeiture of the land grant of the Oregon Central Railroad Company; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CALL. I present a petition of citizens of Monroe County, Florida, praying for the improvement of the Caloosahatchee River. The petition states that this improvement is of very great importance to the commerce of the country, and that the Caloosahatchee River, a stream flowing southwest from Lake Okeechobee to Punta Rassa, on the Gulf coast, is naturally the main artery of commerce through the interior of South Florida, connecting now with the Saint John's River. This river, now making almost an entire water route from the Saint John's River to the Gulf of Mexico, presents an important subject for the consideration of the committee and the Senate. The value of the land and water routes from the Atlantic to the Gulf of Mexico, and the importance of the harbors of the State and its inland channels on both the Gulf and Atlantic coasts to the commerce both of the United States and of the countries on the Gulf of Mexico and to the military and naval defense of the country, demand the consideration of the committee and the Senate. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present a statement of Lieut. Commander J. K. Winn, United States Navy, made in support of a bill which I have heretofore introduced providing for the sale and purchase by the United States of the Mallory lot, Key West, Fla. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I also present a similar paper in regard to the survey and construction of a railway from Key West, Fla., to the mainland. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL presented a memorial of citizens of Apalachicola, Fla., remonstrating against the establishment of a port of entry at Carrabelle, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. I present the petition of Eliza A. Cutler Jones, of Monroe County, New York, accompanied by the affidavit of Abram Cutler in support of the same, praying for certain relief; which I move be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

A. Mulligan Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Lexington, Mo., and a petition of the Albert Chandler Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Macon City, Mo., praying for general legislation in behalf of ex-soldiers; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.
